VOL. III.

Winchester House, St. James's Square, London, S.W.

THIRTY-SIXTH DAY.

Tuesday, 25th October 1910.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HON. LORD GORELL (Chairman).

His Grace THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF YORK.
The LADY FRANCES BALFOUR.
The Right Hon. THOMAS BURT, M.P.
Sir FREDERICK TREVES, Bart., G.C.V.O., C.B., LL.D., F.R.C.S.
Sir LEWIS T. DIBDIN, D.C.L.
Sir GEORGE WHITE, M.P.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.
EDGAR BRIERLEY, Esq.
J. A. SPENDER, Esq.

The Hon. HENRY GORELL BARNES (Secretary).

Dr. JAMES SMITH WHITTAKER called and examined.

34,014. (Chairman.) You are a member of the Royal College of Surgeons, and licentiate of the Royal College of Physicians, and medical secretary of the British Medical Association?—Yes.

34,015. I think you have had before you the request received from the Secretary of the Commission, which is as follows:—The 9th March this year— saying that the King had appointed this Commission, and giving the reasons for it; and the Secretary says in that letter:—"I am directed by the Chairman on behalf of "this Commission to communicate with you in order to "ascertain whether your Association would feel disposed "to take into consideration the points which form the "subject of the inquiry of this Commission, and to "depute a member thereof to give evidence upon them "or upon such matters connected with them as, in the "opinion of your Association, their experience and "knowledge enables them to give useful assistance to "the Commissioners by so doing. For your guidance "I may mention that those upon which the Commis-"sioners themselves apprehend that the evidence of "your Association would be of interest and assistance "to them are the questions affecting insanity as a "ground of divorce, and any other medical matters "which, in the opinion of your Association or its "representative, bear upon the questions being con-"sidered by the Commissioners." As medical secretary of the Association, have you been instructed to explain the way in which this Association, as a body representing the medical profession, can render assistance to the Commission?—Yes.

34,016. Would you just state what it is?—"It "appears to the Association that the questions stated "in the reference to the Royal Commission do not "involve any points upon which it would be advanta-"geous to attempt to collect and analyse the opinions "of members of the medical profession generally, and "that the most useful service which the Association "can render is that of nominating medical practitioners "who would be recognised by the profession as com-"petent in respect of their experience and general "qualifications to represent to the Commissioners, not "their individual opinions only, but the present state "of medical knowledge upon subjects within the pur-"view of the Commission which have a medical aspect. "The only subject which the Association has felt able "to deal with in this way is the one specifically named "by the Secretary to the Royal Commission, that is to "say, the question of the recognition of insanity as a "ground for divorce," and we have named for that purpose Dr. Clouston, Dr. Robert Jones, and Dr. Hyslop.

34,017. Then you say at the end of this little memorandum that it is to be understood that the evidence that these gentlemen give "has not been considered by "the Association but rests upon their own responsibility "as representing medical opinion in the branches of "knowledge with which they are specially familiar?—Yes.

34,018. That is to say you consider these gentlemen come as really through the British Medical Association?—Yes.

34,019. For them to give evidence on those points which they have special knowledge of, and on those points which the Association thought they would be of assistance to the Commission upon?—Yes, my Lord.

Sir THOMAS SMITH CLOUSTON called and examined.

34,020. (Chairman.) You are Doctor of Medicine, Edinburgh, Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, Edinburgh, and a Doctor of Laws. Are you Ex-President of the Royal College of Physicians, Edinburgh; Ex-President Medico-Psychological Association; formerly Medical Superintendent Cumberland and Westmoreland Asylum; Physician and Superintendent Royal Asylum, Edinburgh; Lecturer on Mental Diseases, Edinburgh University, and Editor of the "Journal of Mental Science"?—That is so.

34,021. I think those qualifications, Dr. Clouston, are sufficient to enable you to give us a great deal of valuable assistance upon the questions you have dealt with in your memorandum. Now I think, if you do not mind my suggesting it, the shortest way will be to ask you—as this has been most carefully prepared, I gather—to read to us the statement you propose to make, and then any of us can ask you some questions which strike us after that has been done. Will you kindly do so?—I will, my Lord. The first paragraph is merely about certain things I have done.

34,022. May we take it it will be transcribed into the print as it stands?—If the Commission likes, certainly.

(The following is the paragraph referred to.)

"(a) I have had over forty-five years' experience as the physician to two mental hospitals, one being the Royal Edinburgh Asylum, which has a population of over 800 patients and receives over 400 new cases of all classes of society every year. I have had in this way under my care over 15,000 cases of mental disease of every variety, and, in addition, have seen hundreds of cases in consultation. I taught the subject of mental diseases in the Edinburgh University for thirty-five years. I have also written largely on the subject of mental disease. I am the author of 'Clinical Lectures' on mental diseases, which has passed through six editions, and also of 'The Hygiene of Mind,' now in its sixth impression. I have devoted some attention to the subject of the divorce of insane persons. It has been my duty not only to treat my patients but to keep myself up to the most recent advances in clinical and pathological knowledge in regard to mental disease."

"(b) I am of opinion that there are certain forms of mental disease where the law should be so altered as to redress the present hardships to husbands and wives, but especially to make the better care and guardianship of children possible and prevent the birth of children with an undue liability to mental disease.

"(c) I am of opinion that the curability or incurability of such persons should be by far the most important test as to whether the question of divorce should be entertained or not. Divorce should only be applicable to persons who can be proved to labour under incurable mental disease, except in certain cases to which I shall afterwards refer.

"(d) The crux of the whole matter is whether medical science is now able with reasonable certainty to pronounce that any case is incurable, and to assign reasons for that conclusion that would be satisfactory to a suitable court of the realm. The second factor, next in importance to incurability, to be taken into account, is that one of the main proofs of such a condition of incurability must be held to be the length of time during which any patient has continuously suffered from mental disease. There are very few cases indeed where I should feel justified in giving an opinion that any case is incurable within 12 months after the onset of the disease, whatever the symptoms may be. In my opinion no divorce proceedings should be allowed in most cases within from three to five years after the commencement of the mental disease, the symptoms having been continuous during that time.

"(e) The symptoms present, taken along with their duration, which would prove incurability are in a considerable number of patients so definite, as proved by modern knowledge of the study of mental disease, and confirmed by recent pathological investigations into the state of the brain after death in such cases, that physicians of experience would have little difficulty in such cases in giving a definite opinion.

"(f) The largest class of such cases consists of persons who suffer from what is called 'secondary' or 'terminal' dementia. In the majority of such patients the disease has begun between the ages of 15 and 30, with acute symptoms at first, which have gradually passed into a state of mental enfeeblement where all the mental faculties are affected, where the patients are 'silly,' have no proper interest in life, and are quite unfit to care for themselves or to manage their affairs. This condition, when fully established, is absolutely incurable, while most of those patients live for many years. It is found to result from two causes: (1) the predisposing cause of a bad mental heredity; and (2) a gradual deterioration in the cells of the brain, which are the vehicle of mind. In a marked case of secondary dementia it is found after death by modern microscopists, working with the most recent methods, that at least one-half of the brain cells have either disappeared altogether or have undergone processes of disease which render them quite unfit to be the vehicle of normal mental activity. It is now a proved fact that a brain cell when it has undergone a certain degree of such disease or degeneration has quite lost the power of renewing itself or becoming again fit for its purpose as a vehicle of sound mind.

"(g) Such cases of secondary dementia have so lost the power of proper feeling that the fact of their divorce would make no painful impression on their minds or no impression at all. I have met with large numbers of such cases who have become insane soon after marriage; some have had children, and both those children and the sane husbands or wives have suffered extreme personal, social, and family hardship thereby.

"(h) I have seen cases where the early symptoms of such dementia were threatened and the patients recovered, but I have not seen any such case recover where the symptoms are well developed after five years' duration. A new method of treatment is sometimes effectual towards recovery in those early stages, but not after five or even three years' duration.

"(i) There are 170,000 registered insane persons."

34,023. You say "registered." Is it necessary all should be registered?—I mean in the books of the Lunacy Commissions; that is in the United Kingdom, England, Scotland, and Ireland; there are about 20,000 each roughly in Scotland and Ireland, and nearly 130,000 in England and Wales: "not including the imbecile and idiots from birth, known to exist in the United Kingdom, and no doubt several thousands must be added to this number who are under private care and not registered. It is a low estimate in my judgment—and I have looked into the question statistically so far as the information can be got from the reports of mental hospitals and the lunacy Blue Books, the figures being compared with my own—that there are 50,000 patients, or about one-third of the whole number of insane persons known to exist, who labour under secondary dementia of an incurable kind. Estimating one-half of those to be married, it produces the actual number of this class which would be possibly affected by any change in the law of divorce at 25,000 persons of both sexes.

"(j) The hardship is greater where the married women are so affected than in the case of the husbands, on account of the care of the children coming in. I think any facilities for divorce in those cases would be likely to be taken advantage of more by husbands than wives. This whole class would not feel or suffer injury by divorce proceedings.

"(k) The next class of incurable mental disease which would come under the scope of any new Act permitting divorce in such cases would be those suffering from what are called 'gross organic brain diseases.' These are usually accompanied by paralysis or aphasia, and are, in the great majority of cases where mental symptoms have developed, quite incurable. The numbers of such are not easily estimated, but my own experience would point to there being in the United Kingdom 3 per cent. of the whole of the insane, or over 4,000 persons, half being married. Most of those patients are past middle-life, and the question of divorce would not be likely to come up in most of them."

34,024. Would you explain to me what is the difference, physically speaking, between the second class of case and the one of dementia?—The second class, my Lord, have all of them paralysis of the muscles conjoined with the mental symptoms. The secondary dementia cases are mental primarily and altogether. The others have the bodily disease of paralysis superadded.

"(l) There is a specific brain disease with mental symptoms called general paralysis, different in its essential nature and causes from the other cases of gross organic brain disease to which I have referred, which has hitherto been found to be incurable. It is thought to result from a specific poison (syphilis), this probably followed by a specific microbe, but its average duration from the beginning till the patient dies is only about three years."

I put in the word "average"; it does not exist there, but it is important because some last much longer: "and divorce would not probably be sought in many of those cases. It is one of the forms of brain and mental disease where we are looking forward to a means of cure, in fact, several recent workers have affirmed that they have cured some cases of general paralysis by the use of special vaccines and serums. My estimate from the reports of institutions is that about 5 per cent. of the new cases sent to mental hospitals suffer from general paralysis, and that there are about 2,000 or 3,000 persons labouring under the disease, half being married.

"(m) The next class to whom any change in the law of divorce would be likely to apply are the persons who suffer from epilepsy. In most of those there are mental symptoms present or a tendency to mental deterioration and dementia. Epileptics frequently marry, of which I absolutely disapprove on medical and eugenic grounds. It is a very hereditary disease, and epileptics almost certainly propagate insane, epileptic, and idiotic progeny. The disease appears first, in by far the largest number of cases, during the early years of life, before the age of 25. In every one of those which I have called the 'developmental' forms of epilepsy marriage should not be permitted, and if it is contracted a remedy should be possible to the partner by means of divorce. There are about 100,000 epileptics in the United Kingdom, according to statistics obtained by the recent Royal Commission on the Feeble-minded, of whom 32,000 have not as yet become mentally affected. Excluding the same epileptics and those under puberty and the manifestly imbecile and idiotic, there are perhaps from 7,000 to 10,000 epileptics to whom any change in the divorce law might apply, the disease being practically incurable, probably one-third of these being married.

"(n) There is a large class of persons, a few being in institutions for the insane, others in special institutions, and others under private care, who suffer from a congenital weakness of mind. Those, the Commission referred to divided into three classes, to one of which only would any change in the divorce law possibly apply. This class are the high-grade or 'congenitally feeble-minded' of the Commission, as distinguished from the 'imbeciles' and the 'idiots.' A considerable number of such cases of mild mental enfeeblement contract marriage and a large number of the females produce illegitimate children. In my opinion divorce should be obtainable in all such cases who have married, and, although this may be irrelevant to the inquiries of this Commission, the most stringent means should be taken by legal enactments to prevent the occurrence of pregnancy in all such feeble-minded young women. They are, in my opinion, and by general experience, the source of a vast amount of insanity, epilepsy, and general imbecility, crime, pauperism, and mental inefficiency in the community. The tendency of medical and scientific opinion at the present time is strongly in this direction. The Commission referred to estimate that there are 125,000 of the weak-minded persons of the higher grade, and I think a moderate estimate is that one-third of this class, amounting to 30,000 or 40,000 persons in this class, one-half being females, would come under the scope of any new divorce law.

"(o) There are certain forms of insanity charactised by 'fixed delusions, 'delusional insanity,' or 'monomania,' or 'paranoia,' persisting in the same form from year to year during the life of the patient, and mental physicians now regard such persons as being incurable. Those are persons who would most deeply resent divorce proceedings, and their disease might be aggravated by the fact that divorce proceedings were taken in their cases. I would make the time limit from the beginning of the disease until divorce proceedings were possible to be 10 years in such cases, because many of them are caused by various poisons, and a few of them do recover after long periods of mental disease."

34,025. Might I ask on that, if it does not interrupt you, assuming a law was passed allowing divorce, would you specially schedule those as not being allowed within a limit of time?—I would.

34,026. Are they sufficiently indicated for the purpose of definition in that paragraph?—In my judgment they are, my Lord.

"(p) There is a large class of the insane where the disease is brought on by the excessive use of alcohol and certain drugs, and who have become incurable thereby. Such incurable alcoholic insane are of two classes: (1) Those where the poison has so damaged the cells of the brain that they are in the condition I have described those of secondary dementia to be; (2) the second class are those where an uncontrollable craving for alcohol has existed for many years in despite of treatment and has become an incurable disease. In the first class, which may be called those of 'alcoholic dementia,' I would strongly recommend that divorce proceedings should be applicable, because not only are they incurable, but because another element comes in, namely, that they have brought on their disease through their own acts. I would also recommend, but not with such confidence, that the second class, alcohol cravers that is, which are commonly called 'dipsomaniacs,' should also come under any Statute which may be passed to alter the divorce laws, but I would give them 10 years in which to have a chance to recover. The actual misery that may be caused to wives or husbands, the ruin to families, and the hardships and injury to children are such in all the alcoholic cases that they seem to me urgently to demand a remedy by the State. At a low estimate there are 20,000 incurable alcoholic cases to which divorce proceedings might apply, half of them being married.

"(q) There is a class of the incurable insane to which it would probably be more difficult to apply any changes in the divorce laws than to any other. This consists of those who are subject to regularly recurring attacks of mental disease persisting during the whole life, with intervals of more or less duration of what is or looks like sanity. Those are called the 'recurrent' or the 'alternating,' or Folie Circulaire. The recurrence of such mental attacks, which often come on gradually, is so extreme a hardship, and the procreation of children so frequently goes on in such cases that in my opinion a remedy in some of them should be obtainable through divorce. Looking to the proportion of those recurring cases in asylums there are about 1,000 of them, half being married.

"(r) The last class of the incurable insane existing in any great numbers, to whom by possibility in a few cases divorce proceedings might apply, are those who become insane in old age as the result of arterial or other disease. A few of such cases of the milder type are curable, but the most are incurable. Probably it would be considered contrary to a reasonable and philanthropic view of mental disease to make divorce applicable in any such senile case.

"(s) Summing up cases of those persons to whom in my opinion any changes in the law of divorce could possibly apply on account of incurable mental disease or defect, I think they may be put down as 41,000. I have no means of forming an opinion as to how many of the husbands or wives of those would be likely to apply for divorce, probably only a few.

"(t) The question, to which I have referred, of what number of the insane may be said to have brought on their disease by their own acts, conduct, and course of life, is a different one from the mere curability or incurability of the disease, and is one in regard to which it may be said that a medical man can express no more authoritative opinion than anyone else in regard to nullity of marriage or divorce. At one time I made a careful inquiry on this point, and my conclusions were that in not more than one-third of all the persons who became insane could the disease be attributed to their own acts or course of life. Excess in the use of alcohol, the syphilitic poison, and dissipated courses of life I found were the three chief causes, but there is an evident fallacy in coming to any certain conclusion on this important question. It consists in this, that the mental heredity is so much stronger in some cases than in others, that there are many people in whose cases a very little alcohol or dissipation will upset their mental working, and in many of them it is certain that if such causes had not been brought into operation in their youth, they would have become insane all the same as time went on."

This is a point, my Lord, on which there is much public error. It is a very common thing with many people to attribute nearly all mental diseases to the patient's own fault—to vice or alcohol. It is not so. At least two-thirds are, as it were, by the Act of God and not by their own conduct.

"(u) In regard to the tests for curability, I am in the habit of saying to my students: 'Never pronounce any case incurable while morbid mental depression or morbid mental exaltation, or morbid stupor and lethargy, persist as part of the symptoms. You may sometimes have such patients getting better.' Those are the cases that sometimes recover after many years of insanity. I have known a few such recover, even after twenty years."

I interject here a short paragraph: "To show statistically the actual chances of recovery in mental disease after three years' duration of the illness, I took the 13,172 patients who were sent to the Royal Edinburgh Asylum in the 35 years 1874–1908 inclusive. Of these 4,794 or 36·4 per cent. recovered. Of these recoveries 139 or 2·9 per cent. took place after three years' duration; 59 or 1·2 per cent. after five years; 20 or 0·2 per cent. after 10 years; 10 or 0·1 per cent. after 15 years; and only 4 or 0·08 per cent. after 20 years. The percentages in the total number of patients treated (13,172) were only 1·05, 0·48, 0·16, 0·08, and 0·03 after these five periods of years."

34,027. What class of case was that?—All classes, my Lord, and all conditions of society; from the highest grades of society to the lowest; and every class of insanity except congenital weakness of mind, of whom there were only a few.

34,028. (Archbishop of York.) What was the total percentage of recovery of the 5,000?—About 36 per cent., your Grace. You mean of the recoveries of those in the institution?

34,029. Of those you examined?—All my patients together; all those under my care; you can put them at about 36 per cent. of the total as recovering.

34,030. (Chairman.) The times of recovery you have mentioned?—Yes.

"(v) Then the same time limit, as I have pointed out, is not applicable to all classes of the insane. The age of the patients comes in too. There is, in most cases, a better chance of recovery and less risk of incurability in the young.

"(w) Then the question of heredity comes in. The whole class of patients who have sunk into the secondary dementia that I have referred to and whose disease began before 30 years of age have a strong heredity towards mental disease which comes on during the great process of brain development. There is in them a latent something wrong in their brains from the beginning. I have called that form of disease 'adolescent insanity,' and Kraepelin of Munich includes most of them under what he terms Dementia Præcox. They are all liable to procreate children who are liable to become imbecile or will become insane. It is the case, however, that a strong heredity to mental disease does not necessarily mean incurability, and I should be disposed, while not excluding it from the reasons which should be held as pointing to or confirming the conclusion of incurability by any medical man before the Divorce Court, not to make it a sine qua non or indeed to insist too much on its importance. Few families have a clean bill of health in regard to a bad mental heredity, and even with the worst heredity very brilliant men and women frequently are met with.

"(x) Should the divorce laws be so altered as to provide for nullity of marriage or divorce on account of mental disease, I think the chief evidence should be given by two medical men experienced in mental diseases, their reasons should be fully stated with a history of the mental disease in the case in question, that evidence should be given on oath, they should be subject to an examination by counsel, or agents, or relations of the persons in regard to whom the divorce proceedings are taken, and of course by the judge of the court who would finally decide the issues.

"(y) In regard to this question, some persons advocate the remedy of divorce in cases where mental disease has existed and been recovered from. I think this difficult question should be considered by the Commission. There is a risk of the recurrence of the disease in almost every case, and the question of children being procreated comes in as the strongest consideration in such cases. In most such cases I am in the habit of advising that no more children should be born.

"(z) It seems to me an important fact, and relevant to this enquiry, that in almost all the persons who labour under secondary dementia, not only is their own affection for relations perverted or dead, but it is commonly seen that the affection of their relations, especially that of husbands and wives, is gone, and they are neglected, and not visited. Perhaps I should except from this general statement the affection of mothers and maiden aunts and a few other pathetic examples where the whole life is devoted to a mentally dead spouse or relative. To eliminate the cases where there is mental deterioration following paralysis, ordinary senility and bodily diseases, there might be a difference provided for between primary mental disease what may be called technical insanity and mental deterioration, which is secondary and sequential to bodily disease.

"I am not prepared to state that all my professional brethren would agree with me in detail in the opinions I have given, but I think I can safely say that the general trend of medical opinion is now in the direction to which I have given expression. I and a very considerable number of the medical profession and of scientists, interested in what is now called eugenics, regret that the scope of the enquiry of this Commission could not have included questions relating to the marriage of persons with an extremely bad mental and nervous heredity, with criminality, and with positive signs of degeneration, and the prevention of fatherhood and motherhood on the part of those almost certain to produce a diseased and bad stock of citizens in the future. Many of us feel that the prevention of mental disease and of imbecility would also imply the prevention of much vice, criminality, and ineffectiveness among our citizens."

34,031. I was going to ask you this. Fortunately we have here a most distinguished man in the profession, but to most of us who are not in the medical profession some of this is a little difficult to appreciate. I was going to ask if it would be possible for you at the moment to put yourself into the position of any one of us who had to formulate a clause, assuming that insanity was made a ground for divorce by the Legislature; to express in that clause exactly what your view would be—I do not want you to do it now. I do not know whether you could do that in a way which would cover the whole of your points?—It would be an extremely difficult matter.

34,032. For instance, a clause would be that a petition may be presented for divorce on the ground of insanity which should be so and so. If you could do that?—One might try. It would be extremely difficult.

34,033. You observe if we accept the view you present we shall have to do that?—Certainly. I can only say I will try, my Lord.*

(Chairman.) Now perhaps you will commence, Sir Frederick.

34,034. (Sir Frederick Treves.) Your great experience is largely derived from insane poor; is that so?—No, Sir Frederick; in the Royal Edinburgh Asylum one half of the patients are private patients. It is an institution rather peculiar to Scotland, where both classes are combined in different parts of the institution.

34,035. So that your conclusions are not solely derived from your insight of insanity amongst the poor?—They are not.

34,036. It applies to all classes?—It applies to all classes.

34,037. You are quite emphatic that no opinion should be given as to the incurability of the insanity within 12 months from the onset?—Certainly; I am quite clear on that point.

34,038. You spoke of three years. Secondary dementia is that which is secondary to some primary mental disease?—That is so.

34,039. It is not clear whether you date your three years from the commencement of the primary or the secondary disease?—I am sorry; but from the commencement of the primary disease.

34,040. Speaking of the secondary dementia of three years' duration, one rather gathers it would be from that date——?—I was not sufficiently specific, I admit.

34,041. Then you are convinced that there is, as you express it, little difficulty in stating that a case is incurable?—Little difficulty in giving an opinion with reasonable certainty. I do not claim absolute infallibility in that matter.

34,042. And I do not suppose anybody could in dealing with the insane?—I do not think any sensible man would.

34,043. With regard to these 25,000 patients with secondary dementia, do you think that the dread of divorce proceedings would aggravate their condition?—No, they are emphatically the class who would not feel it.

34,044. Who would not appreciate it?—From the very nature of their brain and mental condition it would make no difference to them.

34,045. Then another point is this: it has been said that the insane derive comfort from the visits of their friends, and the visits of their husbands and wives. Do you think these 25,000 people would suffer by being deprived of such visits?—Some of them might undoubtedly.

34,046. Because on page 5 of your proof you say that in persons who labour under secondary dementia not only is their affection for their relatives perverted or dead, but it is commonly seen that the affection of their relations, especially that of husbands and wives, is gone?—You see, I qualify the absolute statement by the word "commonly" with regard to the relations; I do not mean to say in all relations; very far from it; but commonly.

34,047. You say almost all, speaking of secondary or terminal dementia only?—I would restrict myself to the word "commonly" in a large number of cases. There are so many cases to the contrary that it would not be fair to the relatives of such persons to make an absolute statement.

34,048. And you say you have not seen a single case recover when the symptoms are well developed after five years?—That is so.

34,049. This leads to a very important fact. You speak of 25,000 people of whom one can say this: They are married; they are incurable; they are unable to appreciate divorce proceedings; and they are for the most part incapable of deriving any comfort from the visits of their friends?—That is so. As a kind of illustration I should like to say what I saw in the visiting room of the institution once. I saw a case of secondary dementia brought in, and her child was there, perhaps four or five years of age; and the mother of the patient who brought in the child had some apples or cakes. The patient went for the apples and cakes, and took no notice of her own child. I only mention that as an instance.

(Chairman.) Would you mind asking how to the ordinary lawyer he would distinguish secondary dementia?

(Sir Frederick Treves.) I think, my Lord, the position is this. It is not a question of the wording of a clause, but the question of an answer to this question. Is this individual person, in your opinion, suffering from incurable insanity. That is the position, Dr. Clouston is it not?—Yes.

34,050. (Chairman.) Is there any special definition of secondary dementia, or rather explanation of what it is?—Well, we people who have written on mental diseases are very chary of giving verbal definitions of things. We may describe cases, as Sir Frederick Treves has asked me just now to do; but a verbal definition, apart from it, might be tried; but I think you would find a good many difficulties.

34,051. Sir Frederick suggests it would be covered by the word "incurable"?—I think so.

34,052. (Sir Frederick Treves.) Then I take it you would exclude general paralysis of the insane?—I should.

34,053. That is a very common trouble?—Yes.

34,054. I suppose it is nearly always due to syphilis?—Commonly; but it has such terrible bodily accompaniments, and it may be said this is a bodily disease, and it may be misconstrued in that way.

34,055. With regard to your third class—the epileptic—and with regard particularly to the developmental epilepsy which appears very early——?—Oh, sometimes from birth.

34,056. Do not you think that is rather a matter for nullity of marriage than divorce?—Nullity certainly. The case I had in my mind was a young woman who looks nicely and well, and perhaps bodily attractive, and it is not apparent on the surface that she is an imbecile; but when you come to study her life and take notice of her faculties she is really an imbecile. That is the class of case that I mean with regard to divorce proceedings.

34,057. Or nullity, I take it?—Yes, nullity; probably nullity would be more logical as she was not fit to get married from the beginning on account of her mental condition.

34,058. I see you say these unfortunate people propagate insane and epileptic progeny, but I do not know that the divorce of the epileptic prevents the epileptic marrying again; or do you follow it up?—I think if divorce did not prevent him marrying again it would not fulfil the purpose I have in mind.

34,059. In other words you would follow that clause on by saying that if an epileptic is divorced he or she is ipso facto prevented from marrying again?—Certainly.

34,060. You are very emphatic on that?—Very emphatic on that point. I have seen so many evil results.

34,061. Then as to the congenital feeble-minded, you have no hesitation in saying that these cases can be proved?—Well, feeble-mindedness is like light and darkness; they run into each other and there is no line by which you can tell a mildly feeble-minded person from the person who has the right to enjoy his civil rights. There are borderland cases that would present considerable difficulties, I admit.

34,062. There would be difficulty there?—There would be difficulty there.

34,063. Do not you think it might be argued that in some of these feeble-minded cases you would cause them great distress by instituting divorce?—Yes.

34,064. And by divorcing them do not they lose a guardian?—That is a legal point.

34,065. But they might lose a very good friend?—They might. If it is the wife she would lose her husband's relations, such as her husband's mother and so on—who would look after her; she would not do so any longer, naturally.

* Communications have been addressed to the British Medical Association with regard thereto, but no draft clause has been received.—H. G. B.

34,066. And she would be made miserable by that?—Certainly, but the misery would not be so deep-seated and would not be the same as in the case of a sane person; it would be shallow misery.

34,067. Then if you do divorce these persons they could marry again unless you added the same clause as in the case of the epileptic?—Yes.

34,068. The congenital feeble-minded person divorced on such a ground should not be allowed to marry again?—No.

34,069. And unless that was done you think your suggestion would be almost null and void?—I think so. At all events it would not be so effective.

34,070. Then the fifth class, the delusional insanity. They would resent divorce?—Yes, it would add to their cases. It would add to their suspicions; they are, of course, very suspicious.

34,071. It would be the one thing that would make their suspicions tangible?—Yes, beyond a doubt.

34,072. But you think that 10 years in such a case would enable you to say the man was incurably insane?—Yes, the delusionally insane are worse to be dealt with by their parents and guardians because they have suspicions against them, and if divorce proceedings were to take place it would aggravate such feelings.

34,073. With regard to alcoholic dementia, I daresay the Commissioners would like to know this. You are speaking of a condition very much beyond that of an habitual drunkard?—Certainly.

34,074. You are speaking of a person who has to be confined?—Who has no mind.

34,075. I thought the Commissioners might not realise it?—A person who very likely at dinner time could not tell you what he had for breakfast.

34,076. And those cases would be easy to prove?—Yes.

34,077. They would be incurable?—Yes.

34,078. And they would not suffer from the idea of divorce, or the visits of their friends ceasing?—No, and many people would say in some cases that if they did so it served them right.

34,079. Then with regard to this most unfortunate class of person, the subject of alternating insanity. I suppose they are often very dangerous?—Very dangerous, and especially very dangerous in this way: at the beginning of the periods of excitement I have known case after case spoil their reputation, lose their fortune and reduce themselves to penury by their acts.

34,080. Many witnesses have brought forward cases which are no doubt cases of alternating insanity where a man has been in an asylum and then come out and beaten his wife, and gone back to the asylum again?—Yes.

34,081. Would you think that three attacks——?—No, I would go for more than that. There are many cases of adolescent insanity where there are three or four or five attacks and that then get quite well. You know when one states a number one merely wants to give an idea, and to be on the right side I would say 10 recurring attacks.

34,082. You would rather leave it at 10?—Well, I have no great ground for that; but more than three, sir.

34,083. Then with regard to senile dementia, you would exempt that altogether?—I would exempt it altogether.

34,084. Because a young woman might marry an old man for his money and make use of the fact that he was suffering from senile dementia to get a divorce?—Yes.

34,085. You would exempt it entirely?—Yes, on the ground that the disease is primarily bodily, not primarily mental.

34,086. Then in making insanity a ground for divorce do you lay any stress on that form of insanity which may be said to be due to misconduct on the part of the patient or not?—Well, sir, as you see that is more a question of public policy—more an ethical and social question than strictly medical; but I do attach considerable importance to it as being an extra reason for altering the divorce laws. Say in the case of alcoholic cases, the fact that those people had brought it on would strengthen the opinion in my mind that a remedy ought to be provided.

34,087. With regard to the test of incurability, you think three years in the case of secondary dementia would suffice?—Yes.

34,088. In Germany and Sweden it is three years?—Yes.

34,089. In New Zealand it is 10 years for all cases of insanity?—Yes.

34,090. What do you think of that?—I think 10 is too long—misery prolonged over 10 years. You do not get your remedy soon enough.

34,091. Then many points have come up which the various witnesses have raised. What do you think of this? It has been said that while lunacy might be a ground for divorce in the early years of married life it would be very improper that it should be a ground for divorce after the marriage has continued for a period; one witness giving a period of 15 years. Do you make any distinction on that head?—Well, that is a point, I confess, I had not thought of, and one would require to think about it. It is also a question of public policy rather than a strictly medical question. The hardship would certainly be greater and the public feeling against it might be stronger.

34,092. You think those that oppose insanity as a ground for divorce would not oppose it so vigorously if it were not applicable, say, 15 years after marriage?—That is the view I take, precisely.

34,093. Then with regard to the machinery for this matter. Sir George Lewis thinks that the decision as to incurability should be based on the evidence of the superintendent of the asylum and three doctors. Do you think that is excessive?—Three other doctors?

34,094. Three other doctors, making four in all?—I should think that two competent doctors should be quite sufficient, giving the judge an absolute power to call in other evidence if it were necessary; but I do not know any fact in law that requires the evidence of four competent witnesses. Why should this require more evidence than any other fact that is to be proved before a court?

34,095. Then many witnesses have said this: If you include insanity why not include any other disease, such as paralysis. Perhaps you would tell the Commissioners your feeling as to the difference between hopeless insanity and a case, say, of paraplegia?—Well, there is an essential medical difference between that and a case of technical insanity; taking secondary dementia, the disease from the beginning has been a disease of that part of the brain which is the vehicle of mind. It has bodily symptoms in most cases, but those bodily symptoms are not necessary. It is a unique disease. In those cases where I have expressed the opinion that mental disease should come in, but where bodily symptoms are primary, there must be mental symptom superadded. But they are not essential concomitant parts of the disease.

34,096. A man with helpless paraplegia may be a brilliant man and be a great comfort to his wife and friends?—Yes. I confess that point would require to be very carefully guarded in any law on the subject so that public sentiment did not squash the whole thing.

34,097. And you would say from a medical point of view that those cases are absolutely distinct?—Yes.

34,098. The helpless subject of secondary dementia and the intelligent man who has paraplegia?—They are absolutely distinct in 99 cases out of 100, but in surgery and medicine there are certain borderland cases which bother people. I would give them the benefit of the doubt and would not divorce them.

34,099. The point that these witnesses argued was that all these troubles are exactly the same?—No, that is not so.

34,100. Then there has been some anxiety by some that you might include what they call nervous debility cases. I do not know that we know much of that?—No.

34,101. But there would be no difficulty in defining what you call incurable insanity?—No reasonable difficulty.

34,102. It has been said that you should not grant a divorce for insanity if the petitioning party had committed adultery?—I have not thought of that point. That is purely a legal question, of course.

34,103. What would be your feeling in the matter of criminal lunatics detained during His Majesty's pleasure?—Divorce them.

34,104. Absolutely?—Absolutely all of them.

34,105. Some of those are the worst cases you can think of?—Oh, the very worst cases—most dangerous. You will have public sympathy with you there.

(Chairman.) Would you ask, Sir Frederick, how many there are of those.

34,106. (Sir Frederick Treves.) How many are there at Broadmoor?—I would say there are certainly 800 in Broadmoor; 150 in the Perth Prison in Scotland and about 200 in the Dundrum Lunatic Asylum in Ireland. If you put it at 1,000 in the United Kingdom you would be under the mark.

(Sir Frederick Treves.) A witness has drawn attention to a case where the man was sent to prison for life as a criminal lunatic who was married to a woman of 22.

(Chairman.) That was an instance given?

(Sir Frederick Treves.) Yes, my Lord.

34,107. Then it has been said that in what may be called a borderland case the knowledge that the subject may be divorced is calculated to drive him or her out of their mind. In one of these suspicious cases the man knows that he may be, or the woman knows that she may be, divorced on the ground of unsoundness of mind, and it has been said by two or three witnesses that that is likely to drive one of these uncertain-minded people into actual insanity. Do you lay much stress on that?—I should not lay much stress on that. People who are actually getting into insanity—it is the unreal things that have more weight with them than the real ones.

34,108. (Archbishop of York.) May I take it that one great object you have in view in the suggestions you have made is to prevent the birth of children with a tainted heredity?—That is so as far as it can be reasonably and rightly done.

34,109. Would it be going too far to say that that is your main desire in the suggestions you have made?—No, your Grace. I have seen so very much of the hardships of those secondary dementia cases. It was a motive in my mind undoubtedly—a determining motive—a strong motive. I would not say the main motive.

34,110. With regard to these cases of secondary dementia or terminal dementia I presume after the disease begins to manifest itself, in such a case there would be very little danger of cohabitation between the parties?—I have known such cases being taken out by their husbands or wives, as the case may be, and such procreation of children actually occurring.

34,111. Even in case of——?—Commencing secondary dementia, and going on when the patient was weak minded. I admit those cases are exceptional, but I have known it occur.

34,112. You agree that the cases are very exceptional?—Yes.

34,113. Where one who had secondary dementia would cohabit at all?—That is so.

34,114. So that the danger of children arising from such a union is small?—Yes.

34,115. Then with regard to cases of what you call gross organic disease, I think you agree that there, application for divorce would not be likely to be very common?—No, and the question of progeny scarcely occurs.

34,116. And there, too, the question of progeny would scarcely occur?—That is so.

34,117. In any case that amounts to only about 3 per cent. of the whole of the cases?—That is so.

34,118. Then with regard to general paralysis?—In these cases we may take it a man or woman affected is really a dying man or woman from the beginning, although children are, unfortunately, procreated in the early stages. I do not say it is a practical question to deal with—that early paralytics procreate children.

34,119. That might be eliminated?—Yes.

34,120. And it would be very hard where a man or woman was really dying that divorce should be permitted?—Yes, I have brought that out in my evidence.

34,121. But it would be a case of very pronounced insanity?—Of pronounced insanity. In short, general paralysis has this feature, that it is not general paralysis at all unless you have mental symptoms. You cannot call any case general paralysis without mental symptoms.

34,122. Then with regard to dementia and gross organic disease and general paralysis, the point of public policy preventing the birth of children scarcely arises?—Not compared with the other cases.

34,123. With regard to epileptics I think you said that the disease very usually manifests itself before 25 years?—Yes, in the largest number of cases.

34,124. But it might be compatible with a considerable degree of good health at other times?—Yes. There is the danger so far as procreation is concerned.

34,125. But at present anyone thinking of marrying, say, a woman who had some epileptic tendencies, would hesitate to do so because he would be aware he is tying himself for life?—If he were a wise man; but men are not always wise on the marriage question.

34,126. I quite agree; but would not the natural tendency be to say: Well, it is worth while to take the risk?—That is what they say.

34,127. And they would say it more if, when the risk occurs, they may procure a divorce?—Well, that view of it did not occur to me. A man who took that view—you would not think much of his ethical character.

34,128. No, but I think a man might say, might he not—not in so many words, but he hears of a girl he is attached to having some really epileptic tendencies—well, I will take the risk of its reappearing, and if it does there is a limit?—From a certain point of view you might say so. I do not think it would practically occur to many ordinarily constituted men to take such a view.

34,129. I only say it might increase such short-sightedness and folly as exists sometimes?—It might, but in very few cases.

34,130. Then with regard to the large and distressing class of the feeble-minded. I gather you would couple any divorce with a legal prohibition to re-marry?—Certainly.

34,131. Then might I ask again about the position that would lead to. Take the feeble-minded girl or woman. She would be, as I think was suggested before, without natural guardians?—Yes.

34,132. She would be without power to re-marry, but she would not necessarily be always detained under restraint?—That is so.

34,133. But she would also retain all those unfortunate physical tendencies which feeble-minded people have?—I presume her own blood relations would not cast her off necessarily. She would still have them. And I think the tendency, looking at the report of the Feeble-Minded Commission, is to involve the future care of such persons by the State to a much larger extent than is the case now. I concur entirely with that report.

34,134. You would couple what you have said about divorcing the feeble-minded with an earnest hope that provision might be made for permanent control of these women?—Certainly. You asked me if the question of progeny was a dominant motive. I say it was a dominant motive in forming my opinion with regard to the feeble-minded.

34,135. With regard to the case of paranoia and delusions and the like, may I take it that in those cases there are very often most surprising cures?—A few of them; after many years a very few.

34,136. It has been suggested that in cases of paranoia the cures are sometimes of the most remarkable character?—The remarkable cures being so very rare make a tremendous impression on one's mind, and they are talked about, but there are very few of them.

34,137. In the case of delusion, delusional cases; would not those be cases in which the knowledge that divorce proceedings might be taken would be, if not an aggravation of the disease, at least a continuous distress?—A continuous blister?

34,138. Yes?—Certainly.

34,139. So that a man might divorce his wife because she had delusions and marry somebody else?—Yes.

34,140. And make himself comfortable and happy and leave the poor woman for no fault of her own with abiding and lifelong distress?—I think such cases would occur.

34,141. Under which of these categories of insanity would you place the distressing case of insanity produced after child-birth?—Well, they are fortunately the most curable of all classes; they recover in the proportion of 80 per cent., and they recover also from all the symptoms of their disease, and do not exhibit any traces of them. There are only 20 per cent. of them that you have to deal with and they usually fall into secondary dementia after a few years—the 20 per cent. that do not recover.

34,142. Then how long would it take in every case to recover?—In most cases the puerperal woman recovers in about six months. We look upon it as a poison—that a toxin has caused it.

34,143. Might it increase it if she was thinking that she would not get better and her husband might divorce her?—But she would be told by the doctor every day that she would get better.

34,144. Have you heard that one of the reasons why insanity has been eliminated from some of the homes in the United Kingdom is that the public sentiment does not propose to subject a woman to divorce because of something that happened really through her husband?—I was not aware of the fact.

34,145. Then with regard to alcoholic dementia; you lay stress there on the fact that the mental disease has come through the man's own act, but there are many other most painful diseases that have to be put up with in married life which have been brought about by the person's own fault?—Certainly.

34,146. Then lastly with regard to those that have what you would call recurring attacks, of which Sir Frederick was speaking. They only amount to about 1,000?—About that.

34,147. An almost inappreciable number?—Looked at from the population point view; but a thousand cases in the Divorce Court would amount to a great deal in the year. But it is not possible that they would all come, of course.

34,148. But you would say it is almost impossible even for an expert like you to say how many recurring attacks would prove a case incurable?—That is so.

34,149. Then that difficulty would be vastly more felt in the case of two ordinary medical witnesses brought before the court?—I should have at least one of the witnesses an expert, your Grace. We are all getting specialised in medicine and surgery now, and you must have a man who has had experience.

34,150. I will go on with that now as you have brought up the point. It is a little difficult always to decide who are experts and who are not, is it not?—Well, you might put it in that way. We do not ticket ourselves as experts, but we are experts notwithstanding. If one of us had anything wrong with his eyes one would know quite well that an ophthalmic surgeon is an ophthalmic surgeon, and one would go to him.

34,151. It would be left to the judge to decide if a man were an expert or not?—An expert would have to prove he was an expert by the experience he had had.

34,152. To the satisfaction of the judge?—Yes.

34,153. In a comparatively small number of cases, though, it would be difficult to say which would recover?—Undoubtedly, and yet when fully developed they are quite well marked.

34,154. With regard to criminal lunatics I think you said there were about 1,000 out of the 150,000?—Roughly speaking.

34,155. Almost a negligible quantity comparatively?—But a very large number of cases.

34,156. Out of those suffering from secondary dementia, gross organic disease, general paralysis, there may be cases that arouse pity, but there is not much danger as to children?—No, the progeny question is a minimum in those cases.

34,157. But in cases of paranoia and delusion and recurring attacks it is very difficult to decide whether a case is curable or not?—The difficulties are greater in them than in the other cases.

34,158. That rather narrows the problem?—It narrows the problem somewhat.

34,159. With regard to the point of recovery I think you said that the chances of recovery in mental disease were much greater in the cases of the young?—That is so.

34,160. Would you put any limit when you speak of the young; say 30 or 25?—Well, about 30.

34,161. Would not it be just, in case of the younger married couples, if mental disease showed itself that there would be a greater desire for divorce?—Naturally.

34,162. Therefore just where the recovery was most likely would be where the divorce would be most pressed for?—Well, I take incurability as the crux of the whole business. That is assumed in any case before anything is done—incurability.

34,163. But there would be a greater tendency to try and get incurability proved by some expert in the case of young married couples than if they had passed middle life?—Naturally.

34,164. With regard to the distinction between bodily disease and mental disease, I should like to ask this question. Is the basis of your desire to give relief to spouses who are troubled with mental disease of one of them, that the happiness of their intercourse should be secured—that the happiness of the marital intercourse should be secured?—I would put it in this way, that the great object of marriage would be better fulfilled if divorce were permitted in certain cases; marriage is a great social institution.

34,165. May I put it to you that in marriage there is very often a very strong desire for physical as well as mental and social intercourse?—Certainly.

34,166. Therefore the case may well occur where one of the spouses is quite prevented by gross physical disease, or painful diseases like locomotor ataxy or otherwise, to give any possibility to the other spouse of the pleasure of any physical intercourse?—Yes. Still, if the mental condition of both is a condition of sanity you entirely remove such a case from what I am talking about.

34,167. Yes, in your mind; but the principle is that persons who are prevented by disease from fulfilling the hopes of their married life; where is the difference in principle between mental and physical diseases from that point of view?—It seems to me there is a very distinct principle in fact: that in the case to which I have referred one of them is dead mentally, socially, and as to civil rights. He or she is a cipher—is not to be taken into account with regard to any civil bargains, and even the responsibility for crime. Those things constitute an entirely different principle.

34,168. But they are still capable of arousing affection?—But I would say that that case is in a different category altogether from the case I have been thinking of and giving evidence on.

34,169. In your mind, precisely; but we have to consider the bearing of these questions on the whole public attitude towards marriage, and if a person chooses to think they are wronged because the physical part of marriage is not possible, may not they say: Why should I be debarred from a remedy when another person who is shut out from the mental and social side of marriage is able to get it?—Would your Grace allow me to say that that does not concern me as a doctor. That is an entirely different question from those to which I have devoted my attention or can give any opinion upon.

34,170. That leads me to one last question that I ought to ask. I take it that in the evidence you give you have not felt it necessary to consider the bearing upon your suggestions of the teaching with regard to divorce in the New Testament?—As your Grace very well knows, in Scotland we have somewhat wider ideas of divorce, and I have been brought up under the Scotch idea that divorce may be pronounced for desertion and other causes, and I confess that motive to which you allude has not influenced my mind.

34,171. (Mrs. Tennant.) Can you separate into classes the kinds of insanity liable to transmission?—Not in a scientific way. I may say roughly that all kinds of insanity are liable to transmission, but there are some varieties of mental disease which are much more hereditary than others. You cannot have a cut line of demarcation between one that is transmissible and one that is not. Some are more transmissible than others.

34,172. Do you think the progress of scientific knowledge will enable such a line to be drawn?—We hope everything from the progress of science, but as yet we are not able to do it.

34,173. In the interests of the children it is important that you should not allow the marriage of insane people even though their insanity be curable?—I do not quite follow your question.

34,174. I am sorry. You say that "there is a risk "of the recurrence of the disease in almost every case, "and the question of children being procreated comes "in as the strongest consideration in such cases"?—Yes.

34,175. Then the question of children may arise in cases of that kind, which may recover, as in other cases?—Yes, that is one of the difficulties. Medical men see the extreme difficulty of marriage of people who have had attacks of insanity. Scientifically we say no, but practically we know it could not be carried out.

34,176. You do not range yourself then with the persons you speak of, who advocate divorce in those cases?—No, it would be too hard.

34,177. Do you include the case of insanity after childbirth in what you have said about recurring attacks?—They very seldom recur except in subsequent childbirth. It is not a recurring form of insanity as a rule. There is a liability to recur at subsequent childbirths, but not necessarily.

34,178. I should like to ask you a question on the proceedings which you outline on the last page of your proof. What protection would you provide for the person against whom a divorce action is being brought? If he or she wished to call witnesses, and succeeded in calling witnesses of as much eminence as the two called by the person wanting the divorce ——?—I would give the court power and the duty to provide evidence of as good a character on the one side as the other. I believe it is the fact in the divorce proceedings in Scotland that any evidence is paid for by the court.

(Chairman.) You may take it, I think, Mrs. Tennant, that there are cases in England where the Official Solicitor is called in where the persons themselves have no means of fighting it.

(Mrs. Tennant.) I was thinking not only of persons who had no means, but of persons who had ample means, and of persons whose relations might help.

(Chairman.) I remember, speaking of poor cases, where a person has been in an asylum, and where the Official Solicitor has been directed to take up the case.

(Witness.) I assume that the onus being on the person wishing to come for the divorce, the interests of the other party would be very fully protected by the court.

34,179. (Mrs. Tennant.) May I take it you would like to see officials of the State whose duty it would be to investigate, and give evidence in such cases?—Naturally a special court.

34,180. I mean independent scientific evidence?—Well, many of us believe that expert evidence would be given to more satisfaction to the courts if certain persons were appointed as judicial official advisers to judges. But about that there is a great deal of difference of opinion.

34,181. (Chairman.) There are at present in a certain class of cases in the Divorce Court specially selected medical men nominated to inspect?—I have long held, my Lord, that that would be a very improved means of getting reliable expert testimony by the court.

34,182. That is what is done now in a certain class of case that we all know about?—Yes, I have always thought that kind of calling of evidence would be an important addition in the carrying out of justice, as the personal element would be eliminated.

34,183. (Mrs. Tennant.) It would be important to eliminate the cross swearing of ex parte expert witnesses; you can imagine the position of a judge being more than ordinarily difficult in cases of this kind?—Yes.

34,184. Particularly if it were a borderland case?—Yes.

34,185. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I just want to ask you, as an ignorant person, on what basis do you say, taking the first class of secondary dementia, that one half of the persons are married. What is that founded on?—Oh, founded on a rough experience of the asylum reports, about one half. I believe if you take the general population about 62 per cent. are married as against the others unmarried; and of course some of them come in young. It is a rough statement; it is sufficiently accurate.

34,186. It would not be obviously the case, would it, that the proportion of married people amongst the insane would be the same as in the general population?—I take it they are somewhat fewer, but not so very markedly as you might imagine.

34,187. But that is the experience of your hospital, that about half are married?—About half. You may put it at a little less than half, between one-third and a half.

34,188. In the case of epileptics they are not all confined. You say one-third; is that based on anything more than a guess?—A third married?

34,189. Yes?—That is a guess.

34,190. That is a pure guess?—Yes, but then I have had a lot of experience and it is a guess founded on one's experience. I mean, you may know a thing pretty nearly accurately and yet not be able to put your hands on statistics and put them in percentages.

34,191. I am asking for information?—Yes; that, if you like, is a guess, but it is a guess founded on experience.

34,192. Then with regard to epileptics, your ground, as I gather, for thinking that epilepsy ought to be a ground for divorce is the danger from the chance of there being children?—That was my primary reason with regard to epileptics, it being a most hereditary disease. But epileptic insanity in itself is a deteriorating insanity and they become demented if the epilepsy lasts more than a certain number of years.

34,193. Then they come under one of the other classes, perhaps?—Yes, but epilepsy is still the dominating factor.

34,194. You think that epileptics ought not to be allowed to marry?—If I had the making of the laws that would be so.

34,195. And that is on the ground of the children?—The children.

34,196. I believe until there has been that mental deterioration, which comes on gradually—until that has become marked—between the attacks there is no particular reason why epileptics should not be married, is there?—Scientifically there is every reason, but I admit practically it is an extreme hardship. But from a scientific point of view an epileptic is as liable to procreate insane children before he becomes insane——

34,197. But apart from the children?—No, it is the progeny alone.

34,198. As far as the children are concerned that is more a marriage problem than a divorce problem?—Yes, I felt that in my memorandum.

34,199. It is a marriage problem?—Yes, and public policy.

34,200. If you did make epilepsy a ground for divorce it would only be for those who chose to take advantage of it?—Oh, of course, I assume that.

34,201. And there would only be probably a small portion of those who might take advantage of it?—I think so.

34,202. So that in the sum total there would be only a small fraction of epileptic people who would be prevented having children by divorce?—In the present state of public opinion, but I expect that in no very long time we will necessarily have laws preventing those who labour under such a disease as epilepsy from marrying at all. But that is not the present question.

34,203. Then it would not be necessary to make it a ground for divorce?—Then it would be a nullity of marriage instead of divorce.

34,204. I wanted to ask you about that. In your Bill that you are thinking of you propose not only that it should be a ground for divorce, but that there should be a disabling clause preventing the epileptic from marrying again?—Certainly.

34,205. And I think you say without that disabling clause it would be very little good to make it a ground for divorce?—It would give individual relief in some cases, but it would not fulfil the object that science has in view of preventing a deteriorating posterity.

34,206. Supposing you had that Act of Parliament, how would you prevent epileptics bringing children into the world either as males or females?—If you have a law against any particular thing it is the duty of the law to provide the machinery by which that law is carried out.

34,207. But what do you propose? Could such a law be practically effectual?—I think it could.

34,208. How?—It would come to this. You would have to segregate a considerable proportion of epileptics during a considerable proportion of their lives.

34,209. Confine them in some sort of asylum?—Colonies. The way to deal with epileptics now is to send them to a colony. The report of the Commission on the Feeble-minded indicates such a way of treating all weak-minded people.

34,210. Then your point is that all epileptics should be confined?—Should be segregated from their fellow beings, that they should not have the opportunity of transmitting to posterity a bad stock. That is the scientific ideal position.

34,211. And in order to make your proposal as to divorce practicable that would be necessary?—Meantime certain people who have married epileptics would get the benefit of relief through any Divorce Court before such a sweeping measure as you indicate came in.

34,212. You observe, though there would be relief to the party, there would be no prevention of bringing children into the world?—Of course, very many epileptics are confined in asylums. When the disease is worse they are kept in asylums for the remainder of their lives and in the case of a male epileptic his wife would get a divorce, he staying in an asylum all his life.

34,213. I do not see any difficulty in those aggravated cases, but with the great majority of cases in the earlier stages; and I am trying to appreciate how your proposal, which is really based on the danger of bringing children into the world, is going to be really operative unless your further proposal of segregating epileptics is adopted?—Well, at the present time the lesser proposal is the only one in the wind. The other one is a counsel of perfection perhaps.

34,214. Unless your counsel of perfection is adopted I think you have told Sir Frederick, and me too, that the adoption of the other would have a very partial result indeed?—That is so.

34,215. (Chairman.) May I ask you one or two questions which have been suggested by the interesting questions raised, and by your very wonderful answers. Does that last point on which Sir Lewis was asking lead to my rightly asking you whether before marriage at all there should be some investigation of fitness?—I think, my Lord, it would save much unhappiness in life if there were more investigation than at present takes place; and if you have a primâ facie case, that investigation should be conducted on more thorough lines than it is at present, by the help of science——

34,216. At present there is no State interference at all?—No.

34,217. Have you thought at all whether it is within practical—I will not say politics, but practical action at any future time that that should be done?—I would like to see such a law as this if there were a plain fact such as epilepsy present in one of the persons proposing to be married—I would like to see a law passed that no clergyman or registrar should be allowed to marry such a person or register the marriage.

34,218. Are there any other classes of cases?—It applies also to the congenitally weak-minded.

34,219. Do you know yourself, or have you come across cases in your investigations, whether any other countries have legislated in that way?—I know in a general way that other countries have done so, but my memory and my knowledge of the facts is not such as I should be justified in giving any information on that point As a matter of fact I was only asked about this last week and never had any time to investigate it.

34,220. We have had some evidence about America in that respect?—I know it prevails in some of the States, but my deposition of facts would be worthless; it is incomplete. I have not the necessary information.

34,221. I should like to ask you one other matter. You have had a large experience; you have told us about the number; many thousands of cases have come before you?—That is so.

34,222. Of married people being confined in an asylum?—That is so.

34,223. To what extent have you found with regard to the partners left outside—the sane partners—any real demand amongst them for relief?—I have in a large number of instances—in casual conversation with sane partners—found that the idea of divorce had crossed their minds and sometimes they have complained of it to me that it was an extreme hardship to them and their children. But I take it that the knowledge that divorce was not practicable has prevented it being spoken about. That came forcibly to my mind last week, talking to a professional man whose wife had become insane within a year after marriage; and I knew him well enough to ask—I never heard a syllable about divorce—and I found out he had actually taken legal advice in the early part of his life with regard to divorce, a fact he had never made known to anybody else.

34,224. One other point. If I follow your distinction between bodily ailments producing a bedridden patient say, and one of insanity, you treat insanity almost as if the person were dead?—That is so; certainly in incurable insanity which one advises should come before the Divorce Court.

34,225. One other matter which I am not quite sure I understand. The case of secondary or terminal dementia; that, if I follow it, putting it in a way that I understand, is where the brain has become thoroughly deteriorated physically?—That is so.

34,226. Does that arise from a variety of causes?—No, it arises essentially from a very strong hereditary predisposition which has affected that brain in its course of life and that brain has not lived its time; the man has died at the top storey, to put it roughly, before elsewhere.

34,227. Is there any cause for that particularly?—Alcohol and dissipation will accelerate it and bring it on in some cases where it would have not come on.

34,228. Then it produces an actual structural change?—An actual structural provable change.

34,229. Then if you would be so kind as to formulate what you would suggest as a clause. Does it roughly come to this, that you would advocate divorce being granted in cases of incurable insanity, but that the case should not be started until after three years from the discovery of the illness or of confinement in an asylum?—That would roughly express my present views with the exception that I have mentioned where the dipsomaniac and the recurrent case and the delusional case come in. I would give them all a longer time.

34,230. But it would not be called incurable then?—No. I would put three years as a minimum.

34,230A. There is one question I want to ask you, Dr. Clouston. Have you been able to form any view yourself as to whether the recognition of insanity in a proper case as a ground for divorce would have any general detrimental effect in encouraging imprudence in marriage or the shaking of the regard in which the marital state is held?—I am of opinion it would not, but on the other hand it is a problematical question about which one would not express a very dogmatic opinion. But in my opinion it would not.

(Chairman.) May I thank you on behalf of the Commissioners and myself for the very interesting and helpful evidence you have given.

Dr. ROBERT JONES called and examined.

34,231. (Chairman.) Would you kindly tell us your qualifications?—I am Doctor of Medicine of the London University; Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, London; Fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons, England; Lecturer, Mental Diseases, St. Bartholomew's Hospital Medical School; Resident Physician and Superintendent, London County Asylum, Claybury; Ex-President of the Medico-Psychological Association. For thirty years I have practised as an alienist physician; I was formerly Resident Physician and Superintendent, Earlswood Asylum, Surrey; also Medical Officer at Colney Hatch Asylum; I have visited Asylums in Russia, Poland, Norway, Germany, Austria, Switzerland, Italy and France, and written reports; I was formerly Lecturer on Mental Diseases to the Westminster Hospital and to the Post-Graduate Courses in London; I am a Justice of the Peace for the County of Essex, and have had experience in regard to maintenance and separation orders; I have given evidence before the Departmental Committee on Physical Deterioration; and am the author of numerous articles in medical, psychological, and social periodicals.

34,232. You have been good enough to prepare a Paper which contains the views you wish to present. If you do not mind my suggesting it, if you would read it, it would be the shortest and simplest form perhaps?—Yes, my Lord. It begins with a précis published at the head of my report and which is an analysis of what I am about to read—

"1. Regarded from the biological standpoint the chief function of the individual is reproduction, and the instinct of sex is a primary one in man and as fundamental as is the instinct of self-preservation.

"2. Relying upon this instinct the institution of matrimony implies the conserving of two especial principles, viz., the mutual support of two individuals and the procreation of healthy children for the State.

"3. For the sake of public morality, of purity in the family life, and the care of innocent children who are dependents, the Church in Christian countries ruled that this tie, performed by the clergy, should be a solemn and religious contract to be regarded as the most binding, and not to be lightly set aside.

"4. Except in Protestant countries the rite is a sacrament of the Church, but in this country the Legislature, owing to the advance in education and with the progress of civilisation, has taken away much of the power from ecclesiastical control, and has altered the cognisance of the Ecclesiastical Courts in regard to the marriage ceremony.

"5. The Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice now exercises the power under certain circumstances of annulling the marriage contract. In 1836 it became possible for Dissenters to perform the ceremony of matrimony, and later the same power was given to superintending registrars of districts.

"Further, the law now permits marriage with a deceased wife's sister.

"6. Sympathising with this extension of liberty to the individual, in so far as this is towards the maintainance of public morality, to the advantage of the individual, to the benefit of the family and serviceable to the interests of the State, I purpose, on grounds of public and general interest and for the immediate relief of the poor, who, in contra-distinction to the rich, are severely handicapped and driven into bigamy by convention, sentiment, and restricted means, to place the following facts before the Royal Commission for their consideration, basing my arguments (1) upon the nature of marriage, (2) upon the injury (a) to the individual, (b) to the family, (c) to the race through incurable bodily disease, and especially through irrecoverable lunacy, (3) the burden to the State involved by the disability of mental disease, (4) the great relief afforded by recognising chronic or permanent insanity as legitimate ground for divorce, (5) the definition of incurable insanity.

"(1) Nature of Marriage.—It implies a contract, but in the insanity of one party to the contract, that party is unable to fulfil its obligations, and is moreover unable, owing to derangement of reason, to consent to annul the contract. The State steps in and 'restrains' the sufferer against his will. It takes its own will and imposes it upon him, it disposes of his property, releases him from certain obligations, but binds him in matrimony to the detriment of his family and the State.

"Under analogous conditions the State consents to the nullity of a marriage, when by physical infirmity one of the parties to the contract is unable to perform its required duties—bodily incapacity existing at the time of the marriage and proved to be incurable.

"Insanity is a physical disease and it implies mental disabilities also; it is moreover, one which deprives the sufferer of his liberty, of his civil rights, of his social, financial, political, and even of his domestic rights, and a person united in the bonds of matrimony to a chronic and incurable lunatic is for all practical as well as legal purposes one united to a dead person, for by the nature of his physical condition he is not only unable to direct the life of another, but is unable even to control his own. The marriage contract is ended by death, and should similarly and for the same reason be ended by confirmed insanity, which is social and domestic extinction. The insane to-day are under better hygienic conditions and live longer, the grievance is, therefore, all the greater.

"It is against the interest of the struggling partner and of the family to be thus bound. They should have the option by law of another chance of mating with a healthy person.

"(2) Injury to the—(a) Individual.—Is it conducive to chastity and purity that persons whose wives or husbands are shut up in lunatic asylums, most of them suffering from incurable insanity, should be compelled by law to pass through life without the chance of mutual help and comfort and mental companionship derived from a sane and healthy partner? This is an injury to the health of the struggling partner, and if a lesson from the practice of the Church were needed, enforced celibacy among the clergy has long since been given up. From a large experience"—(that of 14,000 cases of insanity which have been treated in the London County Asylum at Claybury during my term of office as Resident Physician, and which at present contains beds for nearly 2,500 cases)—"I know numerous instances (which I could quote) where either the husband or the wife has become insane within a few weeks or months (in some instances within a few days) of marriage, and in whose case there is not the slightest prospect (humanly speaking) of ultimate recovery. It is looked upon as a personal debasement and stigma to have married one who is or was the inmate of a lunatic asylum. In some of these instances, the party outside tries to forget the one within, and lives a life of immorality with some other partner, and children are born who are illegitimate—a factor, even among the very poor, which is some sort of disqualification.

"In other instances the wife outside seeks employment, but, in order to obtain and retain it, she dare not admit that her husband is in an asylum. She has to assume a false character and pass through life under a cloud, until and when her secret is disclosed, and she then probably loses her situation and her life is further rendered miserable and insecure. If she disclosed the facts, employers would refuse employment, and she would be compelled to resort to some other means for a livelihood,

"There are probably no less than 70,000 widowed and married people in lunatic asylums, and is it right that men and women should be driven to immoral relations, that innocent children should be handicapped at life's start and punished for what they are unable to remedy?

"Something may be said to help the individual who is insane by granting powers of divorce. It frequently happens that the wife demands the bread-winner, or the husband demands his wife's release to look after the home before convalescence is fully established, with consequent relapse, re-admission, and possibly children born in the asylum (in two years at Claybury nearly 30 babies were born)."

34,233. Born in the Asylum?—Yes.

34,234. Do you mean that those were cases of people let out for a time, or after they had been incarcerated for the first time?—In some cases for the first time; the illegitimate children of young girls who received mental shock in finding out their condition; but in many cases, of people who had been in the asylum before and were married women——

"If relief by divorce after a certain fixed time were legalised and recognised, there would, I think, be a greater tendency to patience and a better convalescence would be ensured, instead of, as at present, frequent relapses ending in chronic insanity.

"Against the granting of divorce on the ground of insanity, it is maintained that many wives and husbands among the poorer classes would be driven to insanity by cruelty, continual annoyance, and strife, but in order to secure such separation it has not been found that the circumstances attending other causes of divorce have been used to loosen the bonds of matrimony.

"It is further considered that should divorce on the grounds of chronic insanity be legalised, it would work great hardship in the case of poor married women recovering after many years (as we shall see later that some do), who would find no home after leaving the asylum and who would be tempted to immorality thereby, but I maintain if the State intervened in the private life of a married woman it would be the duty of the State so to 'mother' such a person as to keep her from want and temptation thereafter. Furthermore, the interest of the individual must not be urged against that of the majority in the State.

"(b) Injury to the Family.—When the mother of a family becomes insane—and insane married women in asylums predominate over insane married men—the husband has, day by day, to leave the home and be out at work, and must have someone to look after his young, helpless, and motherless children. His wages do not permit of his having a proper housekeeper, and most often he cannot afford the rent of an extra room for the caretaker engaged. Two alternatives are left in consequence:—

"(i) A life of immorality with the hired woman brought in to care for the children, whom she often neglects.

(I once sent a woman who had been my patient for some years, with a nurse, to visit her family. The door was opened by the concubine dressed in her (the patient's) clothes! The house was filthy and her children unattended to. She received such a shock that she had a fit, which later caused her death.)

"To drown his grief the husband not infrequently takes to drink when the good influence of his wife is gone.

"Immorality and drink contaminate and degrade the family and harden its members against all sense of decency and right thinking:—

"(ii) In the alternative, the husband breaks up the home, sells his furniture and the children are brought up or rather 'dragged up' by unwilling relatives or friends.

"In either case the neglected children may eventually get into the workhouse—not a fit home for any child—or they may grow up with the inborn tendency to inherit insanity becoming each year more manifest through neglect, and they finally swell the list of the juvenile delinquents, the unfit, or the unemployable, or as is too often the case they join their mother in the lunatic asylum."—

(The father in this instance, and in several instances I have known, has become a general paralytic himself).—

"Instances of each of these are not uncommon in the experience of those in charge of large asylums for the insane.

"I have had the mother of a large family admitted into the asylum under my care at the age of 29—among the poorest early marriages and large families are the rule—and she died 35 years afterwards, being incapacitated from looking after any of her children. Surely the father of such a family should be legally allowed the chance or option of securing the discipline and support of a good and healthy woman over his children and home.

"Let us take the case of the father of a family who becomes insane. The breadwinner is gone, 'stick by stick' the furniture goes. The mother at last gets some work for herself, but at the most"—(and I can speak from experience of many cases)—"she cannot earn in London more than 10s. a week, even at the 'least sweated' industry, and even if her whole time were given to the work. In the end (she often refuses to go to the workhouse) the children are starved, or are sustained upon the proceeds of her own immorality; as she cannot remarry, and from the want of proper nourishment and care, coupled with the hereditary instability of her children, they become a permanent burden upon the ratepayers, and they also swell the ranks of the unfit, or they are mercifully removed through tuberculosis.

"It appears to me a crime not to allow the mother to obtain a divorce and marry again. Even if successful in obtaining a lodger she is faced constantly with temptation and shame—the result is a second family—all illegitimate.

"Another case is known to me. The young father of a large family is in the lunatic asylum. Mother able to get a living, but would lose her only help if the authorities knew she had an insane husband who might return to her. For the sake of the children she never mentioned the husband. After 20 years in the asylum"—(and most of it in Claybury Asylum)—"he returns to home and family. None of the family knew he was their father, but he had to be supported, and the stigma remains a constant sore and prevents the family taking the position which would be theirs if the mother had been legally free from him many years before.

"These are a few of the many instances in which poor women are driven to prostitution, and a life upon the streets might be avoided if only the law were altered.

"(c) Injury to the Race.—If the children of families in which one parent is incurably insane were properly looked after, and a chance of divorce affords such an opportunity, their better care would be for the benefit of the race. Although I do hold that a good heredity is a great factor in the physical well-being of a family, I am of opinion that good surroundings, good food, cleanliness, and education are also to be considered"—(that is, the environment). "Also, a healthy woman divorced from an incurable lunatic has a fresh chance of adding a healthy stock to the race."

May I quote the case on the last page here? It really has more relevance. I shall not refer to it again. It is at the bottom of the last page. "I have at present a patient under treatment who has been in the asylum eight times, each time with the birth of a child, and two of the children have been in asylums; one of them is married, and with what consequences may be correctly anticipated. It would have been better for her husband and her family and the race had divorce been possible after three attacks." Now, "The Burden of Lunacy to the State." I am afraid you have had this all over and over again; it is probably in other statistics.

(Chairman.) It is very conveniently put here; we had better have it; we have not had it before, I think.

(Witness.) "(3) Burden of Lunacy to the State.—It is acknowledged that physical betterment is an intellectual as well as a moral thing, and when the health of the people falls below a certain standard of efficiency it entails a loss to the State. The health and strength of the individual is a greater asset to the State than material wealth. We recognise that no person need starve in this country, and it is incumbent upon us to maintain our feeble and mentally defective, but there is no reason why the burden should grow so as to be a bar to national progress. Registered insanity has increased by 255 per cent. since 1859, whereas the general population has only increased by 83 per cent. The cost of maintaining insane persons, exclusive of State inspectors, legal officials, and a numerous staff, is three and a half millions a year, and this apart from the cost of land, buildings, and furniture."

May I say I have been most careful in furnishing these statistics; they have been taken from Blue Books or those statistics which I have myself compiled, or from other reliable sources. With regard to this question of increase of lunacy in the London County Council asylums, there are probably 1,000 families related in the ten asylums in London. Possibly one of the big asylums with 2,000 beds might be used only for relations of those families.

34,235. Do you mean that 1,000? — There are 1,000 families related to each other. If there are two members in each family liable to insanity—and there are often more—for not infrequently you have mother, two daughters, father, sons, two brothers, sisters, and so on; if you take the 1,000 families that are inter-related; the brother may be with me, the father at Hanwell, the sister at Colney Hatch, another son perhaps at Banstead, and so forth; and if all were summed up they would probably be equal to the accommodation of one big asylum.

34,236. You say 1,000 families?—The accommodation of one asylum would be over 2,000 beds.

34,237. What is the total accommodation?—The total accommodation in London is 20,000.

34,238. About a tenth of the whole?—Yes; is taken up by the relations probably of the 1,000 families. The cost of one asylum is half a million. I am speaking of my own asylum; it cost 530,000*l.* The cost of maintaining this asylum is 70,000*l.* a year.—

"The insane and the paupers have to be maintained at the expense of the thrifty and the industrious, and it is often forgotten that the majority of the ratepayers are themselves only just above the pauper line. Pauperism, apart from lunacy, costs the country nearly twenty millions a year, and I maintain that the granting of divorce for 'incurable insanity' would greatly tend to lower the number of families which are dependent on the ratepayers, as well as indirectly to lower the number of the insane.

"The great bulk of the insane population consists of those who have been in asylums over three years, and the statistics of a modern asylum like Claybury" —(Claybury has been open 18 years, so it has not yet been silted up with chronic cases as have most of the old asylums in this country, but I take it as fairly representative)—"give a proportion of 72 per cent. of incurable cases; the true proportion is probably higher,"—(at the present moment, or the 1st January 1909, which is very like what it is now) "of 72 per cent. of cases who have their insanity over three years' duration, that is to say, who have been in the asylum over three years and are practically incurable. The following table shows the duration of insanity in 1,784 cases out of a total of 2,476 patients who have been in residence in this (Claybury Asylum) or some other asylum over three years:—

4. "Relief afforded.—By legalizing divorce for cases of incurable insanity we shall have an educative force as to the dangers of inherited disease and to some extent prevent the marriage of the unfit, for incurable insanity in a family will then be seriously viewed in regard to matrimony. We shall likewise control immorality on an extensive scale. The children of many families will be legitimised, and prejudice will thus be removed from many helpless children and irregular homes. Facilities for divorce, in the cases under review, will materially impress upon people the responsibility of parentage, and will, in many cases, be a re-endowment of motherhood, because it will permit many healthy mothers to remarry. At present, the destiny of the race rarely enters into the consideration of matrimonial alliances, but the effect of public opinion will force this to the front, and it will be the means of attaining a better ideal as to the value of health. The extent of this relief will be more appreciated if a few figures are given. There are over 130,000 insane persons to-day mostly in the asylums of England and Wales."—(This is from the Commissioner in Lunacy's Blue Book to the Lord Chancellor.)—"In the general population the proportion of married to single is roughly one to two. In insanity the proportions are reversed, for there are more widowed and married in asylums than there are single. In one year, the last we have for statistics, viz., in 1909, there were 12,000 married and widowed persons and 9,000 single admitted into the different lunatic asylums of England and Wales, and there are more married women insane in asylums than married men. If all the asylums of London are taken, their insane population is nearly 20,000 (19,823), and the numbers and ages of those who have been more than three years in residence are given in the following table" which gives, roughly, 8,000 between the ages of 20 and 50; that is, if you include women.

34,239. Does it show how long they have been there? —No.

34,240. It only shows the cases of people who have been in more than three years?—Yes; this is a table really giving the cases that have been under treatment over three years; and if the two totals on the right-hand side are added up it gives 13,802—approximately 70 per cent. of the total, who might, roughly stating it, be considered incurable, and giving their ages quinquenna.

"From this table is seen the magnitude of the relief which would be afforded to families in London alone, should the struggling partner care to exercise the option, and avail himself or herself of the opportunity for divorce. There are over 8,000 persons, more than one-half of whom are married, between the ages of 25 and 50, incurably insane in the County of London. The number of mothers, during the child-bearing periods, whose breadwinner is permanently incapacitated, is probably over 2,000, and it is seen by the same table that chronic insanity is not limited to the latter periods of life, there being only a slight numerical difference between the totals under 50 and over 50 years of age, a matter to which reference will be made when dealing with the next point, the definition of 'incurable lunacy.' The benefit to those women would be in the direction of prudence and morality, as well as in the deepening of parental responsibility.

5. "Definition of Incurable Insanity.— To define such would be an impossible task. It has become an axiom in the study of prognosis as to mental disease that 'anything may happen in lunacy.' Except in what we call 'dementia,' which I use to mean both terminal weakmindedness and that occurring primarily in young adolescents of both sexes, the most unlikely and unexpected recoveries take place. It would be assumed that in young persons, with the vitality and recuperative powers of youth at their full, the chances of recovery would be better than among the old. The reverse is, however, often the case, and 'it is better to be sixty than sixteen' in regard to recovery from insanity.

"It would also be assumed that the chances of recovery from an attack of insanity would be less in cases where there was a bad heredity, but the cases with the worst histories often make the best recoveries, although they subsequently relapse.

"The course of the most fatal of all forms of insanity, viz., general paralysis, is sometimes marked by remissions, the disease may be arrested for several years with periods of useful citizenship between the remissions."

34,241. I want to get that clear. I understand from Dr. Clouston that three years generally put an end to those cases?—In the statistics I have collected of over 300 cases (I agree with Dr. Clouston entirely, there are exceptional cases) the average duration has been one year and four months.

34,242. Of life?—Of life, from the time of coming into Claybury.

34,243. That they die?—Yes; but some have been there for 10 years or more, and some die within a fortnight of coming in.

34,244. We may take it that general paralysis is quickly fatal?—Yes.

34,245. But there are certain exceptional cases——?—Yes, with long remissions between the insanity, though now in the Wassermann reaction and the lymphocytosis, we have means of diagnosing the general paralysis which are most serviceable, yet cases in which these methods have made the diagnosis positive may live on for several years.

34,246. Is that always due to venereal disease?—You might say that the more accurate and correct statistics are obtained the more will be the numerical proportion per cent. About 80 per cent. are said to be so, but it may be in not a few cases the result of parental syphilis. Even epilepsy associated with insanity is recovered from and epilepsy occurs to the extent of 8 per cent. of men and 6 per cent. of all women coming into the asylums, but 10 per cent. is the proportion of epileptic cases which remain in the asylums of the London County Council, and 16 per cent. in all the asylums throughout the country, showing that they live longer than the other types. Instead of being 8 per cent. remaining in asylums, which is the percentage on admission, it is 10 per cent. to-day in the London County Council asylums. In asylums throughout the country it is 16 per cent. "Even epilepsy associated with insanity is recovered from, as the latest statistics of the County of London asylums testify. That fascinating variety—paranoia"—(delusional insanity or monomania)—"which takes 30 years to develop, sometimes terminates in recovery; and it is safe to say that each of the varieties above named, viz., epilepsy with insanity, general paralysis with insanity, and paranoia or systematised delusional insanity, may end in recovery. Insanity is so full of paradoxes as to its prognosis that the most accurate observer and recorder may be mistaken when prophesying the future. What is then the criterion of incurability?

"In my opinion it is the duration of the disease—the longer its duration the less the curability. Indeed insanity is curable in the inverse order of its duration. In order to place a fixed time I would suggest three years as a valuable guide of incurability. I should like to say two years, because the qualifying period for divorce should not be made too long, for it would lessen the utility of changes in the law, yet there must be a reasonable limit to avoid possible abuses. I should like to add to my list qualifying for divorce cases of recurrent insanity which have suffered from three attacks, even if the period of detention in each case were less than three years. In these recurrent cases would be included possibly all the alcoholic cases. If ordinary drunkenness resulting in three convictions in one year can be dealt with by a sentence of three years in an inebriate reformatory no similar supervision is possible to the lunatic who is insane through drink, for he quickly recovers in the asylum and is quickly discharged. I think that such cases should be included for divorce. Alcoholic cases are the most relapsing kind and they are a burden upon the family. Twenty per cent. of all insanity among men and 10 per cent. among women is caused through excessive drinking.

"The recoveries last year in the asylums of London numbered 1,220. Of these 117 were discharged recovered after an interval of more than three years under treatment. The duration of residence in those who were discharged recovered was as follows:—

2 were over 20 years in residence.
2 were between 15 and 20 years in residence.
14 ,, ,, 10 ,, 15 ,, ,,

a proportion of 9·6 per cent. (of whom more than one half are married women) of all the recoveries having been over three years, so that some hardships are bound to occur"—I mean if divorce were granted in cases over three years these would come in—"but it would probably occur in less than 2 per cent. of all cases admitted into asylums, even if all accepted the chances of obtaining a divorce.

"I believe it would be easier to detain persons suffering from various forms of mental defect in colonies if it became a part of public opinion that incurable insanity, i.e., insanity of three years' duration or three separate attacks, were a bar to matrimony, and I think a divorce on the ground of insanity would be a prelude to the prohibition of marriage with one who had been insane, just as I consider the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill to be a necessary prelude to the one I now anticipate, for it recognised an evil which affected the individual, the family, and the State. I may state that in Germany there is such a time limit for incurable insanity, and I have myself given the necessary evidence for obtaining divorce before the German Consul-General in London."

34,247. May I just ask how you propose in this to treat alcoholic cases?—To treat them?

34,248. To treat them for divorce?—Well, I should make it possible for the applicant when she chooses, after three attacks of insanity, to go either to the local justices, as they do now for separation orders, or to the county court.

34,249. Even though the three years had not run?—Even if the total duration of insanity were less than three years.

34,250. Even if they had not been under treatment the full period?—Yes.

34,251. And obtain a divorce?—Yes.

34,252. And would it be your view that if action were taken as you indicate, there would be any tendency to encourage imprudence in marriage, or conduce to the instability of the matrimonial tie?—No, I think not.

34,253. What do you think would be the result?—I think it would result in a very much healthier family. It would result in the woman (it would be mostly women probably that would apply for divorce) being able to remarry and possibly produce a healthy stock.

34,254. Then your opinion is it would rather encourage morality?—I think so.

34,255. (Sir Frederick Treves.) There is one point that might a little mislead the Commissioners on page 4 of your proof—paragraph 3. You say that insanity has increased by 255 per cent. since 1859, whereas the general population has only increased by 83 per cent. I take it you mean registered insanity?—Yes; before 1859 there was practically little registration.

34,256. Then you do not think the disease has increased?—Oh yes, I think so.

34,257. But nothing like this proportion?—No; but I think with the progress of civilisation—and civilisation fixes a higher standard each year—there is no improvement in the physical standard of people; they are unable to get to the higher standard, except perhaps a few, and the rest are left behind; and I think civilisation produces its own insane cases and its own paupers.

34,258. Then perhaps you might use the word "registered" cases?—Yes.

34,259. Perhaps it is five or ten per cent.?—Oh, more than that, I think.

34,260. But nothing like this shown here?—It is very high.

34,261. Now, your opinion and experience of the care of the insane is derived from the poor?—Not alone; there is a private asylum at Claybury Hall for private patients.

34,262. A small asylum?—Yes.

34,263. But I should be right in saying the bulk of your experience, which must be enormous, is amongst the poor?—Yes.

34,264. And your arguments are based upon your experience amongst the poor?—Yes, and territorially in the east of the County of London.

34,265. Then you can say from your own personal knowledge, that as regards the sane partner great distress has resulted, great misery, and a good deal of immorality?—Yes, that is so. I have visited their homes.

34,266. You say that from personal knowledge?—Yes, from personal knowledge.

34,267. That to the sane partner there has been all that distress?—And a great deal of immorality, yes.

34,268. Then, not to confuse the issues with terms, you would limit divorce to cases of incurable insanity without mentioning any name—dementia, or what not?—Yes.

34,269. I take it, when you have isolated the class of patient you have in your mind, you have people who are mentally dead?—Yes.

34,270. Who are totally unable to carry out the obligations of matrimony?—Yes.

34,271. Who are unconcerned with any question of divorce, and are incapable of deriving comfort from the visits of their friends?—Yes; if one recognises insanity as it is, it is a shedding of all those latest acquired altruistic qualities; all those are gone, only the instinct of life is left. They may be able to fulfil the function of marriage, as far as the physical instinct goes—that is often quite strong——

34,272. But mostly they are unable to fulfil the obligations of matrimony?—Quite.

34,273. And they would not be disturbed by the idea of divorce, nor would they lose the comfort of visits from friends?—That is so. There are a great many cases that would not feel the separation. But if you take the paranoiaic or the person with chronic delusional insanity, he fixes his ideas on those nearest and dearest, and personally, I do not think he would feel the strain of being separated from his wife. It was only yesterday I had to break the news of the wife's sudden death to a case of paranoia, who had been so for 17 years; and he said, "Oh, I quite expected it." They are only "cracked" or mad on one point, and I do not think it would be a great strain upon their emotions to separate them from their partner.

34,274. So if you isolate this class of patient there would not be any great strain upon them?—That is so.

34,275. Then it is said, if you allow divorce for insanity, why not for other incurable diseases? I take it your distinction between the two is brought out in this paragraph on page two, paragraph one, "Not only "is the party unable to fulfil its obligations, but is "moreover unable, owing to derangement of reason, to "consent to annul the contract"?—Yes.

34,276. That is your distinguishing point?—Yes, most emphatically. I look upon marriage as an institution for mutual mental companionship.

34,277. I see you distinguish insanity from any disease such as paraplegia?—Absolutely. He is cut off from social, civil, domestic, official, political—all his rights: he is practically dead, and he would not be able to direct even his own life or the life of anybody else. He is practically dead.

34,278. And you make this a very great point, that you can say now that on account of the present state of the law a good many healthy people are unable to produce healthy children from the fact that they are debarred?—It is a definite bar.

34,279. That women may be mothers of healthy children but under these present circumstances they are debarred?—Yes.

34,280. There is one point that I think the Commissioners may be a little uncertain about—on page 3 about the middle of the page you say: "It frequently "happens that the wife demands the breadwinner's "or the husband demands his wife's release to look "after the home before convalescence is fully estab-"lished." Is that really possible?—Yes; and it occurs very extensively and largely in all the pauper asylums throughout the country.

34,281. In defiance of medical opinion?—Yes. I have to sign the discharge of a patient under conditions like that, and I am tempted to do so before the process of annealing has taken place, before the convalescence is established.

34,282. And that has to be done?—Yes, you cannot help it. The Lunacy Act permits that—that if a case is not one of actual danger to himself or to others, the Committee or the Asylum—which are paramount—can discharge in spite of medical opinion, and the Lunacy Law permits people like that to go home.

34,283. And children may be born?—Yes, and are not infrequently; and they come back again.

34,284. And then go out again?—Yes.

34,285. That is obviously a very important matter?—Yes. I should like to say, in connection with that, that the request for discharge has come upon you often as a surprise before the convalescence is really established. There is a way of meeting that, to an extent, that the Committee have power from time to time, of sending a person out "on trial"; and out of 300 discharges that go out from Claybury I venture to say that over 200 go out like that—on trial for a month sometimes, or two months and sometimes three months the patient is still on the books of the Asylum, but living outside with their relatives or friends.

34,286. (Chairman.) And during that two or three months——?—They live together and he goes to his vocation and the wife looks after the home.

34,287. (Sir Frederick Treves.) Then as to "mothering" a person, as you say, so as to keep her from want and temptation. Is that really possible?—That opens up another point as to the colony treatment; whether there should not be colonies for those people who have been sent out of the asylums more or less weak-kneed after many years' detention.

34,288. Would that be in addition or a rider to the points you urge as to insanity being a ground for divorce?—If a divorce were granted to the husband of an insane woman, and she should recover after many years' detention in an asylum, I think there should be, in addition to our present means of discharging lunatics who have recovered, some legalised place into which such a patient could be sent, i.e., some intermediate institution between the asylum and the outside world, possibly some after-case institution or colony, for which the guardians or the proper authorities under a new Poor Law would be responsible, and into a place of this kind a woman could be sent who had been divorced so that she should be kept from temptation and from the necessity to lead an immoral life. I meant "mother" in the way of being provided with necessary means of obtaining subsistence such as would be provided in such a proposed colony.

34,289. Then there is this point, which is capable, perhaps, of another interpretation. In one of your arguments in regard to the family you say the husband may be induced to drown his grief by taking to drink when the good influence of the wife is lost. That might as well happen if she died?—Yes, but that is the point. I want the law to be so altered that insanity should be considered equivalent to death in its consequences.

34,290. But as far as his giving way to drink it would be just the same if she died?—Yes, but he knows then that he has the power of getting attached and united to somebody else who may be a healthy strong-minded woman.

34,291. You think a divorce would be a remedy for that one specific?—I think so.

34,292. I think it would be very valuable if you will look also at the bottom of page 4—the very last paragraph. It is an important statement. Perhaps you would explain that more fully: "I maintain that "the granting of divorce for 'incurable insanity' "would greatly tend to lower the number of families "which are dependent on the ratepayers as well as "indirectly to lower the number of the insane"?—Yes, I mean there are a large number of families now, owing to the man being in the asylum, where the mother is unable to obtain a living; consequently this family becomes chargeable to the ratepayers. The mother, if she goes to the workhouse, is there with her six or seven children; if she were allowed to marry, a strong man would probably come in, for she would have had previous experience of the necessity of being prudent with regard to matrimonial alliances, and she would marry somebody that could look after her. I know of cases I could quote where a marriage has taken place even where there have been five or six or more in the family.

34,293. Then the second point: "To lower the number of the insane"?—If the family of such a person is neglected all the hereditary tendencies tend to come out if it is a bad environment. If these seven or eight children are provided with a proper environment they will in all probability be able to discharge their functions as citizens. I look upon environment as quite as important in a way as heredity, or, at any rate, not a negligible item.

34,294. And I take it you would not include general paralysis of the insane at all as a ground for divorce, on account of the fact that it is so rapidly fatal?—I think in many cases among the poor, if you take my experience as representative of other alienists, there may be a considerable hardship in long-continued general paralysis. You know we have now the Wassermann reaction for identifying cases of general paralysis, and also the examination of the cerebro-spinal fluid; even after these tests have yielded positive results I have known patients discharged from the Asylum.

34,295. Well?—Yes.

34,296. (Chairman.) How do you propose to deal with them in a divorce law?—If they came into my category of insanity lasting over three years I should include them in that.

34,297. The definition of the incurable would come in there?—Yes, it would.

34,298. (Sir Frederick Treves.) Then, with regard to recurrent insanity you still think that three attacks—— ?—I think it is most imperative in my opinion. I have sat at Dr. Clouston's feet, he is my teacher; but I also have had very considerable experience, and especially among the poor; I have had 14,000 cases of insanity under my care at Claybury, and numerous cases of women who have been confined some eight times—eight children; puerperal insanity each time. If there had been the possibility of divorce, and a section that no such person could marry again, you would save a not inconsiderable number of children who would be subsequently born and become insane. Out of these eight children one is at Claybury and one at Hanwell, and the one at Hanwell has been discharged and is married.

34,299. (Chairman.) Would they come under incurable cases?—If the number of attacks is taken, three attacks, I should take it as incurable.

34,300. Supposing you have three attacks and after that are perfectly well?—They get well after each attack and go home perhaps for six months.

34,301. Would you at the end of three years say that those persons who had had three attacks should be described as incurably insane?—Well, a great number get well; but a certain residuary is left in the asylum, like the patient I quote. I do not quote her as covering every case.

34,302. But suppose we have to draw a section (I do not say we shall) saying divorce shall be granted for incurable insanity if it has existed for three years, then would it be possible for the case you have just mentioned to come into that?—Probably there would be a hardship, but I maintain that the individual must suffer for the sake of the State.

34,303. But I am talking about the drafting of the clause. Does it cover cases you are speaking of?—Could not it be alternative that it should be three years' duration or three separate attacks? Incurable insanity covered by three years' duration in an asylum, or a patient who had been subject to three previous attacks of insanity and had been certified. There are a large number of people among the class from which the private or paying patients are recruited who are not certified and live in the houses of doctors. But I speak with regard to the poor, and I think it is right in the case of the poor to get relief from recurrent cases, and I fix my clause to cover incurable insanity as either three separate attacks or one attack lasting three years.

(Sir Frederick Treves.) Dr. Clouston would make ten years, and he has certain cases of insanity where he would make it three years to ten.

(Chairman.) If the medical profession could frame a clause it would be very useful.

(The Witness.) After all, it is the individual's opinion which is the key of interpretation as to the meaning of insanity, but it is the Commission that have to decide whether sufficient grounds have been advanced for recommending a divorce in cases of recurrent insanity or in fixing a time limit.

34,304. (Sir Frederick Treves.) There are a few other general points perhaps you would express an opinion about. A point is raised by some as to whether lunacy occurring as late as 15 years after marriage should be still a ground for divorce, or whether only on occurring early after marriage?—Of course, one feels very much, if you take the State point of view, that it is a great hardship to bring a divorce against a woman over the child-bearing age, and I am very much tempted to be moderate to women over the child-bearing period. After recovery—three years even—they may be quite companions to their husbands. But, as I said before, the hardship will occur, and in 9 per cent. of all cases discharged from the asylums in London recovery has occurred after an interval of over three years, yet these would come under my category of "incurable insanity." The 9 per cent. is not a very high percentage if you take the admissions—31 per cent. of the 1,220 recoveries, and that is 9 per cent. of the 31 per cent., which is really only 3 per cent. of the total admissions into asylums, so that if they were divided between married and single it would probably be under 2 per cent. of the total cases admitted into asylums who would find a hardship in divorce after these years.

34,305. Would you exclude or include senile dementia as ground for divorce?—I really have gone more upon duration than upon sub-varieties. It is very difficult for the general practitioner, for example, and a fortiori one who is not a doctor to appreciate niceties in mental diagnosis, and for that reason I have avoided going too much into sub-divisions of insanity; I have taken duration as the best criterion of incurability.

34,306. So you would admit senile dementia?—Yes, I would.

34,307. Then, with regard to the criminal detained during His Majesty's pleasure?—Yes; you know there are a great many of these cases in county asylums. There have been a large number also who have not been looked upon as criminal lunatics who have yet been in prison more than three times, but whose insanity did not occur during the time they were undergoing sentence or before sentence was pronounced.

34,308. Criminal lunatics you would include?—Yes, I would, though I think there are a larger number than adumbrated in previous evidence.

34,309. Then do you think that if insanity was made a ground for divorce it would have any material effect in damaging persons in borderland cases. It has been said that many of these cases might be driven out of their minds by the knowledge that in developing insanity they might be divorced?—I have been in communication with a great many social workers, and I have asked them, and my opinion is really theirs, that it would have no effect in the way of precipitating insanity from borderland cases.

34,310. And in your experience, which I suppose has been almost unique, do you know of persons who have been eager to be separated from the insane partner?—I am at home every Sunday afternoon to about 600 visitors. Frequently I am asked, "Is there " a law so that I can be separated from my husband " 'or' my wife?"

34,311. You think there is a demand?—I should not say a demand, but a strong desire, and I have been asked frequently about the law in the matter. Of course, they do not know, and they ask. They would, no doubt, make use of the privilege if it were allowed.

34,312. (Mr. Brierley.) I am not quite clear about what you propose, Dr. Jones. I understand you would not distinguish at all, except in cases of recurrent insanity between different types of insanity as a ground for divorce?—I have not done so, but there is very good ground for suggesting that there should be a distinction, but my great point was to include those absolutely hopeless recurrent cases. I had Jane Cakebread at Claybury. She had been convicted 400 times: only once in an asylum. In alcoholic cases the mental state gets well quite soon, and they go out and repeat the offence and come back.

34,313. With the exception of those recurrent cases the test would be incurability simply?—Yes, as appreciated by duration.

34,314. With the condition that every case should be presumed not to be incurable until three years has passed?—Yes; and also I should add a clause that the patient should have three separate attacks.

34,315. After that, assuming the patient had been under care for three years, you would then make it a question of evidence as to whether the individual case was incurable or not?—Yes.

34,316. Without any legislative provision that a certain type of insanity should be considered incurable or not?—I do not say I should exclude three attacks, even if they were puerperal insanity. I should not exclude them in granting divorce for incurable insanity.

34,317. (Mrs. Tennant.) You give statistics of the number of babies born in Claybury. Is it possible to obtain similar statistics of other asylums?—Oh, yes; most of the asylum statistics are printed in the Lunacy Commissioners' Blue Books and issued as a report to the Lord Chancellor, and printed by the authority of Parliament.

34,318. In respect of all asylums?—Yes, a summary of all asylums is printed in the Blue Book, but not all the tables that we have at Claybury. The tables we have at Claybury are used throughout the country, and every asylum issues similar statistics, and most of the tables are summarised by the Lunacy Commissioners, but not all; but all these that I have given are quite accessible, I think, with regard to all the asylums in the country.

34,319. Do you keep any record of the other side of married life, of the number of husbands who are released from time to time, and whose wives have babies born outside the asylum?—Yes, some record is kept with regard to the two sexes in the official case books.

34,320. Can you say if this is shown to be a serious question by statistics?—Yes, I maintain it is. It is more serious, of course, for the woman, but I think it is a very important thing for the man also.

34,321. It is a very serious thing for the woman?—Yes.

34,322. Now I want to ask you about the person who has had three attacks, who should therefore be, you suggest, liable to divorce. If a partner be divorced you would not let that partner remarry. On the other hand, if he should recover you would not keep him in the asylum. What do you propose should happen, because the State is not being well served if a person not fit to be remarried, be yet allowed to go free?—That is a very difficult question. Once a man or a woman is sent out of the asylum, and has had his or her discharge, he or she is practically a free man or a free woman.

34,323. But you take away the freedom of remarriage; and you consider the case to be so bad that the other partner should be entitled to a divorce——?—I agree there are individual hardships, but there are not many of those cases—only under 2 per cent. practically of all those admitted into asylums—and last year there were admitted into asylums in England and Wales 21,000. There would be only 400 perhaps a year who would come into the asylums and would remain in the asylum for the three years, and would be sent out afterwards.

34,324. I am not thinking of three years, but of three attacks?—Three previous attacks?

34,325. Yes?—These would be mainly cases of alcoholic insanity; that is to say, people who are habituated more or less to the use of intoxicating liquor and are mentally affected. As soon as the liquor is withdrawn they get well; they go out of the asylum; they promise that they will not touch it when they go. I very often get them to sign the pledge. Our chaplain has a large number of those who sign the pledge before they leave, but very frequently they come back again.

34,326. I am sorry if I am pressing you unduly, but the point I want to put to you is this, if a man is in such a diseased state that he is not fit to have legitimate children, should he be enabled to have illegitimate children?—Of course, that is a possibility, and I do not see, apart from actual segregation of those who are discharged recovered from lunatic asylums, how illegitimacy is to be prevented. They are detained in the asylum for mental conditions arising out of loss of self-control from drink in many cases and when well mentally they go out again.

34,327. I mean these people are released——?—Yes, and I think that when released they are from the public standpoint a positive danger.

34,328. Is there anything to prevent a man who is released——?—Nothing to prevent him physically.

34,329. Then it may happen?—Well, except that he would be convinced innately that it would be against religion and against morality. I think the fact of having a divorce would be an educative force to enable him to realise his position.

34,330. You do not go so far as to say that a man who is a danger to society to that degree should be removed altogether and isolated in a colony?—No. I think public opinion is going that way, but I do not support surgical measures or——

34,331. I am suggesting only a colony. It seems illogical that a man who is not allowed legitimate children—or a woman, who is especially a danger—if feebleminded, should be set free to be that danger and be exposed to that temptation?—I quite recognise that point, but I am afraid I am not capable of suggesting a remedy.

34,332. (Mr. Burt.) There is only one point, on which I should like to put a question or two, and that is excessive drinking—intemperance—as the cause of insanity. You mentioned that in the case of men the proportion is 20 per cent.?—Yes.

34,333. And in the case of women 10 per cent.?—Yes.

34,334. I suppose I may take it that that is a general statistical fact?—Yes, throughout the whole of England and Wales it applies, and it is a fact that is reported in the Lunacy Commission's Blue Book.

34,335. Would you say, as a result of your own experience, that cases of the kind are curable to any great extent?—No, I think they are the most hopeless of all the cases as to relapsing. They are curable when they come under treatment; that is to say, when they do not get drink they get well; but they go out again—a large number of them—and they come back. It has been suggested, in fact, that if the London County Council were to start a hospital which would act as a sieve, so that all lunatics in London should be detained for 14 or 28 days before removal to the lunatic asylum, you would remove from the asylums their most recoverable cases, and that the statistics of recovery would very much go down. I only make this statement to show that those in the asylum from the effect of alcohol get well very quickly.

34,336. Have you had any experience in connection with Inebriates' Homes?—No, none except sitting as a Justice, and finding that some of these people are ordered to Inebriates' Homes under the Inebriates' Act as habitual drunkards.

34,337. Have you found any beneficial results from these Homes?—Only so long as they are detained there. That is their only cure. I think very strongly about the colony? that it should be a place which is self-supporting, and that many of these uncertain cases should not be discharged continually from asylums but should be detained and made to work, if that is possible. But they will be perfectly well and help to defray the expense of maintenance in the colony.

34,338. I gather your experience has been largely amongst the poor?—Yes.

34,339. Have you known cases also of fairly well-to-do people becoming insane through excessive drinking?—Yes. The proportion is less because there is more self-control among the educated classes. I think instead of 20 per cent. the proportion of alcoholic insanity is 17 per cent. among the educated mental patients, i.e., the private class.

34,340. I do not know whether yon have formed any opinion. In the case of men the percentage is double that of women?—Yes.

34,341. We have heard a good deal with regard to the intemperance of women in recent years?—Yes.

34,342. However, yon have the fact that it is only one half in the case of women?—Yes. Men are, of course, much more convivial than women and drink much more, but when you get a woman who is a drunkard she is a very helpless and hopeless person.

34,343. And she will probably often drink in secret?—Yes, and a large number of them get it through the grocers in my experience; it comes into the house through the grocers.

34,344. (Sir George White.) There are two paragraphs in your evidence I want to ask a question about; with regard to the difficulty of women getting employment. Are these matters of your own experience—that a woman has to assume a false character and pass through life under a cloud, and that employers would not employ her if they knew her husband was in an asylum?—Yes, I have had experience of not one but many similar cases.

34,345. One knows there is an objection with many employers to employing married women as such, but I can hardly conceive there would be an objection to employing a woman who needs employment because her husband is in an asylum?—What employers fear would happen is that the husband might come back; it would dislocate the employer's arrangements. The man would want his wife at home to keep house and make a home for him. It is not an infrequent experience.

34,346. Then you say that a mother can get a living but would lose her help if the authorities knew that she had a husband?—That is the same thing again—the employers.

34,347. I thought you meant the guardians, or some public authorities?—No.

34,348. It is on page 4— the 5th paragraph; "Mother able to get a living but would lose her only "help if the authorities knew she had an insane "husband who might return to her"?—That would occur no doubt, as I said just now, if she had a post as caretaker——

34,349. Yes, but it is the same thing?—I do not mean public authorities.

34,350. May we take it, with regard to the paragraph on page 3, that Mrs. Tennant has asked some questions about, that you would say, as a corollary to your position that divorce should occur at the end of three years or three attacks, that the State should pass a law to prevent such a man or woman marrying again?—Yes.

34,351. That is a corollary to your position?—Yes, a necessary corollary from my point of view.

34,352. Yes, I understand. There is one question with regard to the statistics that I want to follow. It is constantly occurring that local authorities make statements that insanity has increased 3 or 4 or 5 per cent. Now you say there are 130,000 insane persons now in the asylums?—Mostly in the asylums, some are in the workhouses. That is in England and Wales only.

34,353. In making these comparisons do you compare the number of insane persons in the same institutions, say 20 years ago or in 1859?—Yes.

34,354. The gross number?—Yes.

34,355. Is not the increase to be largely accounted for by the fact of the way they are treated and the longer time they live?—It would to some extent. As already has been said, registration has a good deal to do with it; the fact that the asylums are now all under the control of County Councils and representatives of labour are on the Committees and are on terms of friendship with many of the friends; the fact also that there is more confidence in the management of asylums now that the public have more access to them may account for some of the increase. That is one point. There is another point also, viz., that the conditions of competition are so great and so keen with the advance (on each quinquennium let me say), and that the demands are unfortunately more than they were without any corresponding advance in the physical conditions of the individual, who consequently breaks down. It is a curious thing there is no insanity in barbaric countries except, such as we have here, from the effects of alcohol. You get idiocy and imbecility, but you do not get the varieties of insanity we have been speaking about to-day. That is the experience of those who know.

34,356. But I want to know why we cannot get an absolutely accurate figure based upon those persons who are in asylums as insane, say, this year as against ten years or twenty years ago; the number of cases that there are—absolutely fresh cases?—We have those.

34,357. Is not that possible?—Yes it is possible and it is done—ever since 1859, when the Lunacy Commissioners issued their Report. These figures are taken from their Report this year presented to the Lord Chancellor; they repeat year by year the number of new cases that occur———

(Chairman) Might I say we are going to have three representatives from the Lunacy Commissioners, and they will give the exact figures.

(Sir George White.) Thank you, my Lord. We have the same thing repeated locally again and again; though it seems to be inaccurate, it is put before the public.

(Witness.) I admit there are a plurality of causes for the increase in appearance, but Sir Frederick has referred to one and that is registration, another is that the diagnosis of cases by medical men is more accurate, the intolerance of affliction in the community is another cause, the growth of flats with the consequent impossibility of looking after sick persons, especially the mentally unfit, and so on.

34,358. But one feels if there are a number of ameliorative causes at work there should be a decrease?—I believe this year has been the only when there has been a decrease in the increase.

34,359. (Mr. Spender.) I should like to ask a question to get to the bottom of the recurrent insanity. We are speaking of cases under the name of recurrent insanity in which there is an attack of insanity lasting three or six months, and then a perfect cure, and then another attack and then again a perfect cure until the third time?—Yes. Might I qualify that by saying as perfect a cure as a medical man thinks may justify him in sending a patient out of the asylum. Each attack of insanity leaves a "scar" on the brain; the brain is weaker each time.

34,360. But we are dealing with the person after the third time who is according to all legal tests sane?—Yes.

34,361. May I put that specially with regard to the case of the woman. Supposing a woman has had a child and an attack of insanity at the birth of one child. That is one attack. Then she has had a second child and another attack of insanity, and a third child and another attack. You would hardly suggest, would you, that that should be a ground for divorce on the part of a husband?—At the wish of the husband?

34,362. Yes?—I do think so, and I feel it very strongly. I feel that a child born in this manner is going to be a burden to the State. It is a potential lunatic.

34,363. After the woman had had one attack of insanity at child-birth do not you think the remedy was in the husband's hands, and if she bore three children with the same result it would be a hardship to her that that should be a ground for divorce?—I would suggest that it would be at his discretion whether he would like to have an action brought, but I would not insist on it.

34,364. You would grant him the remedy of taking action in those circumstances?—I should on public grounds, for there is no possibility of stopping the issue. I have told such cases repeatedly when they leave the asylum that they should have no more children. It happens every discharging day almost, and that is 26 times a year, yet the family almost invariably increase afterwards.

34,365. Is not the remedy for that as much in the husband's hands as the wife's?—Yes, but you are dealing with human beings with a very strong instinctive feeling which is fundamental and rules his life.

34,366. Yes, but we must also think of the hardship on the same lines. If the husband is unable to take that remedy, would you say still he should have the power of taking an action for divorce?—Yes, I would. I think it is such an important public point that this woman should not bear any more children; and I think separating her from her husband by divorce would have an educative effect in that direction.

34,367. I have put a most crucial case?—It frequently happens; the husband is warned that he is producing his own wife's lunacy and yet the woman comes back pregnant. She is as unfit to bear children as if she suffered from epilepsy. She has a taint to transmit. If you are going to give a divorce for epilepsy I think, a fortiori, a divorce should be granted for these three recurrent attacks which are definitely known to have been in the asylum, who are a weight and a burden on the ratepayers, and they would be likely to procreate again.

34,369. Would you go so far as to say (I am not sure if I understand what you said to Sir Frederick Treves) that there are no patients in asylums, who have been there three years or over, who were capable of feeling the pain of a divorce?—No; Sir Frederick was asking about cases of dementia, those second or terminal dementias; and I agree with Dr. Clouston that the whole mind in such cases is shed. There is no altruism, but there is intense egoism. The great thing one notices in an asylum garden is that there is no fraternising; they all keep separate and apart, and it is a sign of recovery when they begin to make friends. These cases of dementia are incurable and none of these would feel the pain of a divorce.

34,370. But you would not only deal with those who are certified, but with those who are uncertified?—I think it is difficult to touch those who are uncertified. I am dealing with those certified, there must be a certificate. There must be certifiable insanity; there are cases of neurasthenia, and so on, and people do things which their friends will not tolerate, but when the medical practitioner certifies them, he deals with actual certified insanity.

34,371. Are there not a number of cases in asylums at the present moment whose cure might be affected by the knowledge in the first three years of their residence in the asylum, or even a few months in the asylum if they went in with the knowledge that if it lasted they would run the risk of forfeiting the wife or the husband?—In insanity I do not think there is any thought beyond the next discharging day or the possibility of getting out day by day. I think three years hence very rarely, if ever, enters into consideration.

34,372. A great many of the cases mentioned in your Proof would hardly be touched by divorce after two or three years. The home would be broken up and the conditions of poverty would have taken place?—For these reasons I would personally ask that the period qualifying for a divorce should be reduced to two years, but so as to do away with abuses or anything that would aggravate them, and to give them every chance of getting well, I think if you fixed three years you would fix, in my opinion and that of many others, an extreme limit.

34,373. And with regard to racial effects; I think you hold that divorce laws on this line would be the first step?—I think a most important step. One of the gentlemen asked me about the arrangements in America. I am told by those who have lectured at the Eugenic Society (I am on its Council) that though there is a law in some States prohibiting epileptics marrying, 20 per cent. are married. The epileptic has no recollection of his fit; he would be quite true if he said he had had no fit; and I quite agree saying what to his own knowledge would be that epilepsy is strongly hereditary; but it is very difficult to deal with epilepsy unless it is associated with insanity. You would interfere with the private life of some of the most clever men, the most able and serviceable citizens; but I do think personally it is a very great injustice to the poor people to lengthen the period after which they can get release from an incurable case.

34,374. (Chairman.) Just one question to sum up this matter as far as I am concerned. Those cases of puerperal insanity which you have spoken about; are they curable?—Very curable.

34,375. By the cessation of intercourse for instance?—Yes, very curable.

34,376. And what happens at the time when she gets over it?—If she has a large number of attacks each attack leaves the brain weaker, and she becomes an incurable resident in the Asylum.

34,377. Is it not sufficient, then, to deal with those cases by saying that if the insanity is of so long a duration, and pronounced incurable?—I do not quite follow.

34,378. If you were to sit down to-morrow to draw an Act to carry out your views, you would have to express in writing exactly what the Court was to do, and a question would be, what would you express to meet a case such as you are putting of recurrent insanity. If that is not curable I understand it would come within your definition of an incurable case; but if it is curable, and only produced by childbirth from time to time, it might be considered perfectly curable, might it not?—I think, my Lord, I did suggest that you should have two clauses. I am not a lawyer, but that if it were possible to draft such a suggestion that those who had been three years in an asylum should be considered absolutely incurable, and a second clause.——

34,379. That is not exhaustive, because they might never have been put in an asylum, but been kept at home, insane?—I should not take any notice of that; I am really dealing with the poor. I think it is wanted for the poor people, whose insane friends and relations must be brought into the asylum; the friends of the well-to-do classes remain at home, and I do not consider there is hardship here, yet permission or sanction for divorce might be permitted to them also.

34,380. Well, that is your first clause?—Yes. Secondly, those who had been in an asylum three times and had had three definite attacks of insanity. I think on public grounds, for the sake of the race, that I should endeavour to prohibit that person having more children, and the only way you could do that would be to bring a divorce action.

34,381. But suppose the doctors said it was curable?—I should still consider it in the light of epileptic insanity. The person would be comparatively well between the attacks, yet there is an inherent defect which can be and often is transmitted. A recurrent condition of mental disease is one that would need strong dealing with, and I am of opinion that divorce is justifiable.

34,382. Does it need it if it is pronounced curable?—Yes, a certain number of those are cured, and it is quite possible to have a patient who has been three times in an asylum owing to puerperal insanity having other babies subsequently and being perfectly well, and also making a good wife to her husband, yet with each infant she has transmitted the possibility or probability of insanity to the child. I do recognise there are individual hardships, but I maintain from the standpoint I take that the individual must give way to the good of the community.

34,383. You see in one or two countries this matter has been considered, and I find the definition in Sweden is "Insanity of three years' duration and pronounced incurable." That would not meet it?—Well, it would not meet recurrent attacks.

34,384. It would include recurrent cases if it was insanity that lasted three years and was so liable to come again that it was pronounced incurable. Then in Switzerland they have "Insanity rendering married life " impossible and after three years' duration pronounced " incurable." It is very similar in Germany too. You think that will not meet your recurrent cases?—I think in Germany it is inability to render mental companionship that is ground for divorce.

34,385. In Germany; insanity, of three years' duration destroying intellectual communion between parties and holding out no hope of recovery?—Yes.

34,386. Those would not meet your view about these recurring cases?—No it would not meet the puerperal cases I admit and there would be some others. Take the case of a girl who had a great disappointment with regard to marriage. It is possible she might have three shocks and be well after that to all intents and purposes; but from my point of view, from the point of view of the benefit to society, she is not fit to be a mother. I have avoided dealing with these cases from a surgical point of view. I represent a large number of medical men and they are and I also am very much against surgical interference. That is a way out of it if they consented to an operation.

34,387. That would be classed as curable though they would not be physically perfect?—Yes.

(Chairman). May I say how very much obliged we are for your evidence and the way you have dealt with this very difficult subject.

Adjourned for a short time.

34,388. (Chairman). I understand you want to add something to what you have already said?—Yes, I just wished to state this, that when I advocated the idea that there should be a relief after three separate attacks of insanity, I did mean that those three separate attacks should cover especially alcoholic insanity, but I was asked whether this would apply to puerperal insanity. I feel that divorce is a relief granted to the individual. My point with regard to incurable insanity generally is for the relief of the individual. My point with regard to puerperal cases was more on national grounds, and it is a question whether that could be separated from the relief of the individual. I would like to try to make it plain if I could.

34,389. As I follow it you mean that in the case of alcoholic insanity that if recurring might be left to the individual; but the case of the puerperal insanity it might be a question for the State?—Yes. It was for the benefit and advantage of the State that I advocated divorce in the case of recurring puerperal insanity. Puerperal insanity was mentioned, but it might be any kind of recurring insanity. I think she or he should have a separation by divorce from an incurable drunkard, from a person who had been in the asylum, say, three times, and had had three separate attacks and brought on by his own act. And when I stated the three years' duration I meant three continuous years' duration under treatment.

34,390. How does that meet the case of three short periods?—I separate those and I really wanted to make it clear that I draw a distinction between the two. I draw a distinction between the three years' continuous duration under treatment and three separate attacks. In the one case I call it incurable insanity and that the person ought on private grounds for the sake of the individual to get a divorce. But the other is a wider question, more or less eugenic in character, and depends more on general or national grounds, and more especially from the point of view of reproduction as regards propagating the unfit.

Dr. THEOPHILUS BULKELEY HYSLOP called and examined.

34,391 (Chairman.) You sent in a short memorandum, but you have amplified that since, and just handed to me a typed copy?—That is so.

34,392. Then I propose to ask you if you will kindly read that. First of all I will just ask you about your position. You are a doctor of medicine, and a member of the Royal College of Physicians, Edinburgh, and you are senior physician at the Bethlem Hospital, and lecturer on insanity at St. Mary's Hospital and the London School of Medicine for Women; lecturer on mental diseases and mental physiology; lecturer on mental diseases Royal Free Hospital, and president of the section of psychological medicine and neurology at the annual meeting of the British Medical Association 1910, and President of the Society for the Study of Inebriety, and so on?—That is so.

34,393. Have I exhausted the list of qualifications?—There are many other things, but of minor importance.

34,394. Those are sufficient?—Yes.

34,395. Will you kindly take up your type-written proof then? — "I have been twenty-three years as Medical Officer at Bethlem Royal Hospital, during which time about 6,000 patients have passed through it. The recovery rate has been about 50 per cent. The incurability of the remainder has been in great part due to causes such as heredity plus alcohol, syphilis, &c., and (excluding such conditions as secondary dementia and organic brain lesions from apoplexies, &c.) the incurable malady has been caused mainly by errors or faulty habits in the individuals. Types.—There are various types of incurable insanity in which divorce might be advisable. Chronic melancholia.—In some cases of chronic melancholia which have lasted many years and in which there has also been loss of brain power. It is difficult to define the time limit as to curability in some melancholiacs and especially where there is no dementia. I have seen a case of chronic melancholia in which recovery took place after 35 years of residence in Bethlem (1844 to 1879). The patient remained well for seven years but was readmitted (in 1886) suffering from a relapse from which he died 13 years later. In another case of a woman who had been melancholic for 30 years recovery took place on the return from Australia of her brother for whom she had long mourned as dead. I have also seen several cases of recovery from melancholia with agitation, automatic repetition of actions and words, and even hallucinations of hearing, after periods of from five to ten years. Chronic mania.—Chronic mania may also continue for lengthy periods, but I cannot recall having seen a case of recovery after five years. Delusional.—With regard to delusional states. It is sometimes difficult to determine that delusional states are incurable, especially in the earlier stages when the physical health is impaired. I have seen many cases of apparently systematised delusions yield to time and treatment. The method of onset and the features of the stages of evolution of the delusions (the physical factor being excluded) will enable one with a fair degree of certainty to prognose as to the curability. In some cases at least five years should elapse before considering the question of divorce. Dementia.—With regard to dementia secondary to acute attacks of mania, it may be merely a temporary or protracted sequel to the acute brain disturbance. In some post-febrile states, as, for instance, after influenza or typhoid fever, the mental disturbance may be of an anergic form and last for several years, to be followed ultimately by recovery. When there has been a definite apoplexy, or other focal lesion with destruction of brain tissue and mental devolution, recovery is of course scarcely to be looked for. In many such instances the viability appears to be but little interfered with and they may live for many years."

34,396. What is exactly understood by viability there?—The probabilities of life. "With regard to general paralysis of the insane I would say that although as a general rule the disease terminates fatally within two or three years from the onset there are cases in which there may be either a prolonged remission or an indefinite protraction of the symptoms. In the exceptional cases of protraction the question as to the advisabillty of divorce might be considered after the disease has lasted three years, provided that it could also be said that not only is there no possibility of recovery but also that there is little likelihood of the viability being diminished, i.e., the patient might live for years."

34,397. We are told that as a rule it ends fatally in a few years?—But there are exceptions. Some are protracted and last for a considerable number of years. Usually by the end of three years one is able to determine whether the patient is in any immediate danger of death.

34,398. Three years from the disease manifesting itself?—Yes, and also as to whether they are likely to recover.

"Epilepsy.—With regard to epilepsy. The mental degeneration resulting from epilepsy is not only apt to be very deep and lasting, but it may also be a source of continual anxiety and even danger. Of the graver forms of epilepsy much is already known, and it is fully recognised how the taint is apt to be transmitted by heredity and even intensified in the progeny. Another type is not so well known and but imperfectly recognised in law, I allude to those conditions known as mental automatism, larvated epilepsy, double consciousness, alternating or multiple personality. They furnish us with the types somewhat akin to Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. Of these I have seen and recorded many examples. The condition is sometimes unrecognised even by near relatives and friends. Such states are sometimes heralded in youth by the occurrence of convulsions, nocturnal delirium, night-terrors or somnambulism, and are later followed during adolescence by alternating conditions of sanity and mental automatism. Sometimes these cases are taken care of in asylums, but more frequently they commit some crime and are committed for trial. During the last year I have examined two criminals of this type who had committed murder. In both instances they were acquitted on the ground of insanity, and in my opinion in both instances they were incurable. Such instances will always be difficult to deal with, inasmuch as the relative durations of the normal to the abnormal periods cannot be gauged with any degree of certainty." With regard to criminals I would state here that my experience does not quite agree with that of Dr. Clouston and Dr. Robert Jones inasmuch as they stated, and I think they advocated, that all persons who had committed crimes and had to go into Broadmoor or kindred institutions should never have a chance of returning to their married life. I would merely mention that the only way in which I differ is that it would in my opinion be a great hardship to one class of individuals, namely, the young puerperal woman who, through no fault of her own, but because she is suffering an acute delirium and has no consciousness of the act, may through delusion or delirium commit infanticide and be found to be guilty of the act, but insane, and be committed to Broadmoor, where in the course of a few months she recovers her mental faculties; she wishes to return home to her husband who may be devoted to her and also wishes her return. There are several instances in which I have seen this, and appeal has been made to the proper quarters for a reprieve so that she may be allowed to return to her home life. It seems to me in those cases that a very considerable hardship might ensue.

34,399. That would not be an incurable case?—No; but the statement referred to all criminals.

34,400. I do not know that they were speaking of criminals who were curable?—In Broadmoor. I understood so.

34,401. I understood their mind was directed to the question of whether the case was incurable. However, it does not make much difference. We shall see. At any rate, that is an exception, because that would be curable?—Yes. "Alcoholism. — Extraordinary recoveries from alcoholic mental disturbances are met with. I have seen patients extensively paralysed, demented, and even apparently moribund, yet they have recovered. Formerly I was inclined to believe that even deep destruction of memory might be recovered from. My later experiences, however, have led me to believe that alcoholic amnesic defects, when extensive, are very rarely recovered from. It is now known that alcohol, if given in excess, destroys the trophic or nutritive functions of the nerve cell so that the cell dies and becomes incapable of regeneration or further functioning. In this somewhat common type of alcoholic amnesia the viability is not much impaired, and they may lead useless vegetative existences for many years. They become quite incapable of managing themselves or their affairs, they neither know nor feel any responsibility, and as by their own acts they have incapacitated themselves it would appear advisable to grant a divorce after a period of at least three years has elapsed. Another type of alcoholic insanity, in which much hardship is encountered by the husband or wife, is that in which the will-power has been destroyed. In such instances there is defective inhibition for which neither time not treatment can do any good. I have seen many individuals of both sexes who have had to suffer life-long misery on this account, and divorce would appear to be advisable as a humane method of relief. Recurrent mania.—Recurrent mania due to alcohol causes many difficulties. Sometimes the recurrences are numerous, and each attack appears to cause but little degeneration, but ultimately brain destruction is bound to ensue. I have seen recovery take place after the 37th attack of mania with delirium, but each recovery was productive of nothing but misery to friends and relations. One danger in such cases is that between the attacks they may beget children, and I know of several instances in which such children have turned out to be epileptic, nervous, or defective. As a result of my experience with alcoholics I have come to formulate a proposition that any individual who is unable to resist a habit of taking an excess of alcohol, even though he or she may be capable of attaining to a certain degree of power in mind, body, or pocket, biologically considered, so far as evolution is concerned, the world would be better had he or she never been born into it. For such an one divorce is but a part of the aid we should give to the process of eliminating the degenerate and unfit. Morphinism, cocainism and other drug habits.—Second to alcohol there is in the whole history of the insane no type of degeneracy, either inherited or acquired, more painful in its social aspects or more productive of human misery than that due to morphia, cocaine and kindred drugs. The types are too well known to need description. The lying and deception resorted to by them and the tendency to recurrence after lengthy periods of treatment, have rendered these types not only difficult to deal with but also sources of unutterable hardship and misery to their wives or husbands respectively. Many an instance have I seen in which, to my way of thinking, divorce might with justice be granted. I see quite a number of degenerates who in their excesses run through the whole gamut of narcotics and other drugs. Abstention from one drug merely means indulgence in another. From such cases nothing is to be gained or even hoped, and they drag others with them down to the lowest depths of degradation. Of these, I have seen several who have ultimately succeeded in getting their marital partner to acquire the same habits of indulgence. Moral insanity.—Moral perverts who have tendencies to kleptomania and other impulsive states sometimes cause disastrous consequences, and I have been consulted on several occasions as to whether divorce would be possible or justifiable. I have also been frequently consulted as to how to obtain relief from habitual lying and an uncontrollable habit of slandering"—I allude to insane cases —"It is often difficult to decide whether they are insane or merely morally defective. Usually, however, in my experience, such cases are complicated by abuse of alcohol or other drugs. Uncontrollable temper is sometimes of pathological import, and I am sometimes called upon to decide as to whether ungovernable outbursts of passion are in reality symptoms of insanity. Not infrequently such cases are adequately met by prolonged periods of separation, but in some instances of hereditary defect of control in which the recurring outbursts of passion have been precipitated by even small amounts of alcohol the condition has not only become chronic but also a source of personal danger, and, even though they may not be technically or certifiably insane, divorce might in some instances be justifiable. Sexual perversions.—This opens a very large and painful chapter. I have seen dozens of instances in which the insane patient has been the pervert and not only brought about the actual attack of insanity but has also been the cause of much misery, or apprehension and fear on the part of the husband or wife lest recovery from the insanity should bring about a return to the practice of their perverted acts. The anxieties betrayed by the relatives of such patients lest the patients themselves should be allowed to return to their homes is not unfrequently due to the existence of such perversions. It must also be noted that some insane patients are made insane by sexual perversions of their marital partners. I know of many instances in which relapses are not only common but there is actual dread of home relationships owing to the sexual perversions of those who are still at large and presumably sane. In some cases I am of opinion that protection is needed for the patient. There are various types of insanity in which marriage has taken place. (a) As a symptom of insanity.—I have given evidence in one case in which marriage took place in consequence of the exaltation and sexual excitement symptomatic of the onset of general paralysis of the insane. When the disease became more manifest application for annulment was not only made and granted but ratified by the Pope. (b) I have known instances in which alcoholic or bibulous philanderers have contracted marriage with disastrous results to their wives. Sometimes these marriages have been undertaken by the wives in heroic fits and it is therefore open to question as to whether they become entitled to any relief from what they undertook with their eyes open. (c) Senile decay.—Sexual excitement not infrequently heralds senile decay and it may lead to unsuitable marriages and many financial and medico-legal complications. In such instances as I have had to do with divorce is seldom sought. In such cases the testamentary capacity appears to have called for the greatest amount of attention. (II.) Marriage prescribed as a remedy for—Neurasthenia, hysteria, sexual perversions, alcoholism or other drug habit. In my experience marriage is not justifiable under such circumstances and when one contracting party withholds from the other the existence of any such remedial intent and the marriage proves a failure then relief appears to be justifiable. I gave evidence in one such case and the marriage was annulled. Marriage without knowledge of the existence of a bad family history, the occurrence of previous attacks of insanity, of alcoholism, of infection by syphilis, or of epilepsy ought in my opinion to be sufficient to warrant relief for the party from whom the knowledge was withheld. (III.) Types of insanity of somewhat lengthy duration, but in which recovery may eventually take place. In melancholia attacks may last for many years and then be followed by recovery. Females at the change of life not infrequently suffer from sub-acute forms of mental disturbance lasting from two to ten years and yet ultimately recovery takes place. In young women there may be recurring attacks of excitement at regular monthly intervals, and these may continue for several years. Our knowledge of these conditions and their efficacious treatment is increasing so rapidly that it is possible such conditions may ultimately be eliminated from consideration. Similarly with regard to mental disorders due to glandular anomalies and faulty metabolic bodily processes. Our knowledge in the future may enable us to treat successfully many conditions which are now regarded as being incurable." One has to recognise that in males there are states in which there may be accumulation of uric acid sometimes accompanied by acute mental symptoms, and these symptoms may recur periodically. One's knowledge of organic therapentics and of serum therapy is now proceeding at such a rate that it is quite possible we may yet be able to eliminate these cases from consideration." "Summary.—To summarise briefly: there are some forms of mental degeneration which can with a degree of certainty be recognised as incurable and in which much hardship might be relieved by divorce. The factor of self-indulgence as a cause might with justice influence the decision. Suppression of facts of the existence of degeneracy in the family or in the individual might further influence the decision. In my opinion the question of personal relief from the incubus of being tied to a degenerate is of secondary importance to the wider question of the danger to the community and the race of the transmission by heredity of such conditions of degeneracy, and inasmuch as medical advice on such matters is but seldom asked, and if asked, hardly ever regarded, it would appear advisable to aid the right trend of evolution by facilitating the disruption of marital ties which are not only baneful to the individuals but a source of danger to the proper evolution of humanity. In my opinion, the whole question is in great part dependent upon questions affecting the better regulation of the conditions under which marriage is contracted. In brief, I think that divorce might be considered after three years, provided that the patient is incurable, and that there is no immediate prospect of death or interference with viability."

34,402. (Sir Frederick Treves.) There are several different headings under which your evidence comes. I take it that the case mentioned in the second paragraph of your proof would really resolve itself into cases dealt with by nullity of marriage?—Yes, there are some which can be so dealt with.

34,403. That is where marriage is undertaken as a symptom?—Yes.

34,404. Such as in cases of general paralysis of the insane?—Yes.

34,405. In all those cases it is rather nullity than divorce?—In most of them, yes.

34,406. Well, certainly in paragraph A and paragraph C?—Yes, in paragraph C.

34,407. Then with regard to the residue, that is to say, the cases where divorce can be considered, can you separate the pure case of divorce from any question of eugenics? I gather you do not. For example, all your arguments in favour of divorce in alcoholics are based really on consideration of eugenics; that is to say, you would take steps to prevent those persons from producing degenerate children?—Not entirely so. I also stated that in some instances one would consider it very advisable and a humane measure to give relief to the husband or the wife.

34,408. But putting aside any question whatever of children you still hold the view that divorce should be granted for chronic alcoholism or alcoholic dementia?—Yes.

34,409. Quite apart from any question of the offspring?—Yes.

34,410. With regard to other cases and also putting aside all questions of eugenics would you think that divorce should be properly granted for incurable insanity that has existed for three years?—I think that at the end of three years it might be advisable to consider the question. I do not think the question ought to be considered before the end of three years, and only at the end of three years provided there is no possibility of a cure, and also provided that the individual is likely to live—that is to say, that there is no interference with the viability.

34,411. And from your experience, distinguishing the sane from the insane person, you would be disposed to advise that. In other words you have met with cases of such hardship in connection with this matter that you would be disposed to advise divorce?—That is so; I can answer that with perfect freedom. I have met many cases in which it has been a distinct hardship that either the wife or the husband should be saddled with a person for whom there is no possibility of cure. There is no tie so far as feeling is concerned, and there is no possibility of any return to the ordinary normal state. In fact the tie has served as a clog to hamper them in going through life in even a moderately happy way. I have seen abundance of illustrations of this.

34,412. And you would say therefore that insanity of the kind you have spoken of should be a ground for divorce?—Yes. Of course it is difficult to lay down a general law when you are dealing with so many diverse conditions. Each case would be considered on its own merits.

34,413. If you could draw up a clause to deal with this, would you put it under one description of insanity or an incurable condition of three years' duration?—I would say that the question might be considered at the end of three years independently of the form of insanity, and it might be determined on the question as to whether the viability of the individual is interfered with, and whether it could be determined by an expert whether there is any chance of recovery.

34,414. Speaking again from the medical point of view, looking at marriage not only as a contract but as a very serious and solemn contract the individuals in your mind are practically dead?—Yes.

34,415. As far as being parties to a contract is concerned?—Yes.

34,416. They could not understand the obligations of it and they are non-existent so far as parties to a contract are concerned?—Yes.

34,417. I mean such persons as you have in your mind?—Yes.

34,418. You would not say that all criminal lunatics that have been put away during His Majesty's pleasure should be persons from whom a divorce could be claimed. You except puerperal cases?—I cannot recall any other cases.

34,419. Only these cases of puerperal insanity?—Yes. I have been applied to to see if anything could be done to get such cases out of Broadmoor.

34,420. And they are mostly cases of infanticide?—Yes.

34,421. Would you consider the question which has been already asked as to whether the stage in marriage when insanity occurs should have any weight. It has been said, you know, that insanity occurring 15 years after marriage should not be a ground for divorce?—That question depends entirely on what has happened during those 15 years. For those people who have had 15 years of happiness the question of divorce would never arise. On the other hand I have seen an exceedingly deplorable condition in which individuals have lived 15 years in purgatory owing to the faults of drunkenness, recurring attacks of mania, excitement, brutality, and everything that would drag a person down, so that the marital partner is just at the end of his or her tether at the end of 15 years, and then they are afforded some relief by the individual being in an asylum. If after three years the insanity is deemed incurable, then divorce would appear to be advisable. What has transpired during the 15 years preceding the actual attack of insanity should be the guide. I have seen so many who have endured all kinds of hardships until finally the degenerate has found his way into an asylum, and this has been but the climax. The friends have got a respite and they sometimes hope against hope that the patient will never be restored to them and never even recover. It is very unfortunate and very sad, but that is part of my experience. They have reached this goal after a long period of hardship.

34,422. Supposing insanity were made a ground for divorce, and speaking of these borderland cases, do you think the knowledge of that fact would do much harm to those people. It has been said that the knowledge that such a circumstance is possible might drive a man of unstable mind actually out of his mind?—I do not think so. My experience is this that the more people know the harms that are likely to accrue from giving way the more likely they are to avoid them. Nothing appeals to the individual so much as the possibility of anything affecting his own skin. I am arguing by analogy, but one knows with regard to alcohol we have educated the people and they are gradually becoming alive to the fact that they must avoid that which is harmful. So with the recurrence of these puerperal states one knows that the mere expectancy of a breakdown is quite enough to bring it about, so that if women are educated so that they must not expect to break down, one knows from experience there is not the same tendency for the recurrence of these puerperal attacks. There is another very important point in connection with these puerperal states that was not dealt with, namely, that the puerperal insanity is far more likely to occur in connection with the first birth than subsequent births. If the individual has broken down with the first birth or acquires the knowledge that her mother had puerperal trouble after her child bearing it is almost enough to bring about an attack, so that to advise that they should not have other children for two or three years is often quite enough to prevent subsequent puerperal attacks. This is not an opinion of the moment, but one derived from long experience.

34,423. With regard to epilepsy, putting aside again all questions of eugenics, would you make epilepsy a ground for divorce or limit it to epileptic insanity or dementia?—I would limit it to epileptic insanity in which there is either an exceedingly dangerous tendency, or where there is marked dementia.

34,424. You say that without any question of eugenics or possibility of children?—Yes.

34,425. On its merits?—Yes; although I regard these conditions as also particularly bad as far as heredity is concerned.

34,426. (Chairman.) Would you mind informing me what the origin of puerperal insanity is. Is it a germ or some other cause?—It may be due to two factors. The actual shock, causing profound alteration of all the psychical and physical functions, especially in those who are predisposed to instability; it may be a chance condition which is enough to upset the equanimity for the time being, and there may be a profound alteration in the nutrition and metabolism. Then there is the other type which is due to toxic causes; but with our knowledge of toxins these extreme cases of puerperal septicaemia are now but rarely seen.

34,427. You deal with three classes of cases in your evidence. The first class you find incurable, and in that case you think the sane person might be entitled to relief?—Yes.

34,428. Then another class of case. You think there are cases in which the conditions at the time of marriage are such that there might be a decree of nullity of marriage?—Yes.

34,429. That is based upon, for one cause or another, the unfitness to enter into the marriage relationship?—Yes.

34,430. The last branch of your evidence as I understand it is that apart from the right of a petitioner to claim a relief of either of those kinds there are cases in which in the interests of the State something might be done to segregate or to prevent at all events the further procreation of children?—Yes.

(Chairman.) I should like to thank you, Dr. Hyslop, on behalf of the Commissioners for the great help you have rendered us in giving evidence.

Dr. Jane Walker called and examined. (In Camera.)

34,431. (Chairman.) Dr. Jane Walker, would you kindly tell us your medical qualifications?—I am licentiate of the Royal College of Physicians, Ireland, and of the Royal College of Surgeons, Scotland, and an M.D. of Brussels. I am physician to the New Hospital for Women in London, medical superintendent of the East Anglian Sanatorium. I am one of the governors of the Aylesbury Inebriates Reformatory, and one of the visitors appointed to manage the Borstal girls.

34,432. How long has your medical experience extended?—I have been in practice since the end of 1886.

34,433. I believe you also practise at Harley Street?—Yes, I practise at London and in Suffolk.

34,434. I think here you are a representative of the Association of Registered Medical Women?—Yes, I am the delegate chosen by that body.

34,435. And you not only wish to present your own, but their views?—Primarily I am presenting their views. Anything I say, unless I specially qualify it, will be the views of the majority of the Registered Medical Women, and not my own personal views.

34,436. And you go into this because it is of very grave importance?—Yes. Would you like me to read it, my Lord?

34,437. If you think you can express all you wish to say by reading your proof I shall be very glad if you would do so. It would save my asking questions. Begin at the second paragraph because we have really had from you what is contained in the first paragraph?—"Several witnesses, some of them of considerable "public influence, who were heard in the early part of "the proceedings, urged the excusability of adultery "on the part of a husband as a reason for continuing "the present inequality of the law, whereby a woman "cannot obtain divorce solely on the ground of her "husband's adultery.

"We, however, wish to point out that irregular living on the part of married men has disastrous consequences to the health of the women of the country, and to the race.

"It is a recognised medical fact that one act of adultery on the part of the husband may be the means of his contracting venereal disease, and this he may communicate to his wife if they are living together.

"The serious consequences of such infection, when communicated to women, may not be fully understood by those who speak lightly of the act which exposes wives to the danger of infection.

"It is important, therefore, to point out the results of the two diseases most concerned:—

"1. Gonorrhœa, which is the disease most often communicated, is a common cause of sterility, either absolute or relative.

"It is an undoubted fact that a considerable proportion of sterile marriages is the result of this infection communicated to the wife. The national importance of the consequent diminution of the birth-rate is evident, and should be considered.

"The loss of the natural function of child-bearing is not the only penalty which the wife has to pay. Other grave results are the serious and prolonged illnesses from which she frequently suffers.

"It may be urged that the risk of infection would be avoided if the wife refused to cohabit after an act of adultery on the part of the husband, or if the husband always ensured that he was free from infection before returning to his wife. As the law now stands, she has to choose between the alternative of risking her health or of living a single life while ostensibly a married woman.

"2. Syphilis leads also to a diminution of the birth-rate, and is a frequent cause of miscarriage, and children born of syphilitic parents have a heavy death rate during the first year of life.

"Unfortunately the misery entailed does not end here. Of the children who survive a large number become the inmates of blind asylums, and deaf and dumb institutions.

"This disease also exacts a full toll of suffering from the infected wife.

"Medical women are aware of the legal decisions which, in some cases, have made the communication of these infectious diseases on the part of the husband legally 'cruelty,' and so a ground for divorce, when added to his adultery. But a woman runs such risks from the adultery of her husband that they submit that true science, sound morals, and the social well-being of the community alike demand that a married woman should not be exposed to such risks, and that, therefore, there should be equality in the law as between men and women.

"The Association would further point out that the existing possibilities for divorce not only deny to a woman of the poorer classes any redress from the unfaithfulness of her husband, but even when this is accompanied by gross physical cruelty, her poverty is a bar to any effectual relief."

34,438. That is dealing with the question of courts?—Yes, equality between rich and poor.

34,439. The opportunity for bringing a suit?—Yes.

34,440. Does that mean you would advise some scheme to enable the poorer classes to bring their cases before the Court?—If that were possible.

34,441. Has your Association formed any view as to whether that, as suggested by some, would be detrimental to the interests of the country?—I do not think my Association, as an association, thinks it would be detrimental to the interests of the country. "Such infective disease is so readily spread in the "homes of the poor the Association would urge, for "the sake of the whole community, that facilities be "made equal between rich and poor as well as between "the sexes."

34,442. (Sir Frederick Treves.) How many ladies are there in your Association, Dr. Walker?—About 500, I think. Something like 500.

34,443. I suppose you had a meeting?—Oh, a great many meetings.

34,444. And this is the matured result of it?—Yes.

34,445. It may be said to represent the deliberate opinion of the medical women of this country?—Of the majority of the medical women.

34,446. (Chairman.) Might I ask how many medical women there are in England?—Well, they increase so every year. Do you mean counting India as well?

34,447. When you said 500?—Nearly all the medical women belong to the Association, but not quite. I should think there are about 600 medical women practising in England, but there are a good many more if you take India.

34,448. (Sir Frederick Treves.) The main point of your proof is this, that you do not recognise what has been called here "accidental adultery"?—No.

34,449. In other words you would say from a medical point of view one act may be followed by as disastrous results as 10?—Yes, quite.

34,450. And I suppose you would also say, if one act be recognised, you cannot get away from the fact that adultery is legalised to that extent?—Yes.

34,451. That is so, is it not?—Yes, obviously.

34,452. If one act is excused it is legalised to the extent of one act?—Yes.

34,453. From a medical point of view I take it the most important part of your evidence—and a very important point—is the emphasising of the evils of gonorrhœa?—Yes.

34,454. It is the general impression in the public mind that venereal disease always means syphilis?—Yes, the public mind knows nothing whatever but syphilis.

34,455. And it is also a common opinion that gonorrhœa is a mere nothing?—Yes.

34,456. A mere trifle?—Yes.

34,457. And any preventive legislation need not consider gonorrhœa?—That is so.

34,458. It is also a fact that gonorrhœa may lead to most disastrous results in women?—Yes.

34,459. It may lead to lifelong illnesses?—Yes.

34,460. It may lead to very very painful illnesses?—Yes.

34,461. And it may in cases of suppurative troubles lead to operations?—Yes.

34,462. And it is one of the commonest causes of sterility in women?—It is estimated that half of the cases of sterility is due to gonorrhœa, and that half of the operations on the pelvic organs is due to gonorrhœa. It is a much more serious illness to women than syphilis is.

34,463. That is a very important statement?—Yes, much more serious.

34,464. From the point of view of women you regard it as a much more serious illness?—Yes.

34,465. And certainly one involving more suffering and more general illness and distress?—Oh, much.

Syphilis is not a very serious disease to women compared with gonorrhœa.

34,466. And you would add, in speaking of the evils of syphilis, that that in addition to the unfortunate children who are sent to deaf and dumb and blind asylums there will be a large proportion who are very much disfigured?—Yes.

34,467. And prospects of earning a living are much reduced, because they are deformed, and have sunken noses or dwarfed bodies, and so on?—Yes.

34,468. (Lady Frances Balfour.) Of course syphilis is less important to women, but it is very important to the children?—Yes, it is a very great cause of infantile mortality. The figures with regard to it are impossible to get. For one thing, people hesitate to say a child has died of congenital syphilis.

34,469. Is it invariably communicated to the infant?—No, not invariably, but very, very commonly.

34,470. And that makes it very serious?—Yes, for the children and for the community.

34,471. Because it is a double thing?—Yes.

34,472. (Mrs. Tennant.) Has gonorrhœa any bad influence on the children?—Yes, with regard to the sight. I think it is 80 per cent. of the blindness of children that is due to gonorrhœa. Furthermore ophthalmia neonatorum is almost universally due to gonorrhœa. For practical purposes that is the cause of it.

34,473. Is it possible for the husband to convey gonorrhœa innocently. May he do so without knowing he is so suffering?—Yes, he might. There are probably many cases on record where a man has married and given his wife gonorrhœa without his having the slightest intention or knowledge that he was so doing. The disease lasts such a very, very long and such an indefinite time, that he may appear to be quite well, and may think he is, and yet he may infect his wife.

34,474. It is suggested to me by the Chairman he could not do so innocently; when I said "innocently," I meant innocent of knowingly incurring risk?—Do you mean he could give gonorrhœa without knowing he had got it?

34,475. What I meant to convey was this. There is double guilt attaching to the man who in the first instance contracts the disease and then knowingly risks its transmission to his wife. What I wished to ascertain was whether it was possible in the case of gonorrhœa for the husband to have only the one guilt?—Yes, in a very large number of instances he only has the first guilt. It would be a very rare thing in my judgment, and from my knowledge of human nature, that a man would knowingly communicate the disease to his wife.

34,476. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I want to ask you this. Where the misconduct of the man after marriage has led to his wife being infected with gonorrhœa, I quite follow there is an offence committed for which a wife ought to have a remedy. But take the case of a man who by ante-nuptial misconduct has contracted the disease without knowing it and then he marries and infects his wife. Do you suggest any remedy for that, any remedy, I mean, in the way of divorce?—Well, I believe that that has been adjudged in several cases to be legal cruelty, has it not, the husband having communicated the disease to his wife? Or must it be knowingly?

34,477. I am afraid I am ignorant on the subject?—I think that is one of the definitions of legal cruelty if it can be proved that the husband has communicated venereal disease to his wife.

34,478. (Chairman.) Wilfully. That means knowingly, practically.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) We are dealing with a case where it is not wilful in the ordinary sense. I only want to know what your view is as to whether a wife infected by the husband unknowingly, the disease being in him, not as the result of post-matrimonial misconduct, but as the result of prenuptial immorality. Would you give any relief there?—I think each case there would have to be taken on its own merits. It might be a greater hardship to give relief, as you put it, than to leave things as they are.

34,479. If every case has to be judged on its own merits, in that context, that would mean it would be a possible cause of divorce?—I think it might be perhaps, but I remember a case in my own experience where it would have been a very much greater hardship for the wife to have been told, and the marriage to have been dissolved, than it has been for the marriage to go on without any notice being taken of it at all.

34,480. Do you think it would ever be a proper ground for divorce that a man should be divorced from his wife for having unknowingly communicated to her a disease which he had acquired by immoral conduct before marriage?—If we are going to have divorce at all I think almost it ought to be.

34,481. (Chairman.) Would you mind letting me ask you one or two questions which are not fully dealt with in your proof. With regard to gonorrhœa, would you mind telling me whether that is curable within a limited time, or may it last for a very long period?—It may last for a very long period. I believe there is a case on record where infection occurred 13 years after the beginning of the attack. But that would be a rare case.

34,482. Take the normal state of things?—The normal state of things now I think is that a man should not marry for two years after he has contracted gonorrhœa. I think that would be the usual advice.

34,483. And it may be curable in a less time than that?—It might be, but it would not be commonly.

34,484. Your position as representing the Association with which you are connected is that if that accrues through misconduct after marriage the wife should have the option?—Yes, of relief.

34,485. Because you could not anticipate how soon it would be?—No.

34,486. And being a serious matter she ought not to be required to add something to the proof in the way of desertion or cruelty?—Exactly; in other words that the law should be made equal between men and women.

34,487. Now do you think—or if you can say it for your Association too I should like to know—that the levelling of the two would tend to raise the general morality of men?—Yes, I should say it would.

34,488. Has that been discussed?—Yes, and that would be the opinion of the majority of the Registered Medical Women's Association also.

34,489. Instead of having two standards there would be one, and people would be expected to stand to it?—Yes. If I might mention it, in the Society of Friends everything is absolutely equal, and divorce is practically unknown amongst them. Their standard of morality is very much higher than other people.

34,490. But they are subject to our law whatever it is. It may be that divorce is unknown amongst them because they are so proper and good?—Yes, but they regard men and women on an equality amongst themselves.

34,491. And that has tended to raise a higher standard, you mean?—Yes.

(Chairman.) I ought to thank you very much indeed for your valuable evidence, Dr. Walker.

Adjourned.

THIRTY-SEVENTH DAY.

Wednesday, 26th October 1910.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HON. LORD GORELL (Chairman).

The Right Hon. The EARL OF DERBY, G.C.V.O., C.B.
The LADY FRANCES BALFOUR.
The Right Hon. THOMAS BURT, M.P.
Sir FREDERICK TREVES, Bt., G.C.V.O., C.B., LL.D., F.R.C.S.
Sir LEWIS DIBDIN, D.C.L.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.
EDGAR BRIERLEY, Esq.
J. A. SPENDER, Esq.

The Hon. HENRY GORELL BARNES (Secretary).

Dr. FRANCES IVENS called and examined in camera.

34,492. (Chairman.) What are your qualifications?—Bachelor of medicine and master of surgery of the University of London.

34,493. You are also honorary medical officer for the diseases of women, Liverpool Stanley Hospital?—Yes.

34,494. Is that a large hospital?—About 104 beds, but a very large out-patient department in proportion to the number of beds.

34,495. Do you visit the out-cases yourself?—Yes. I have charge of the gynæcological ward and out-patient department.

34,496. You have prepared a proof which contains the substance of your evidence. Would it be convenient to read that and let us ask you questions as we go on?—Certainly.

34,497. Does that contain all you wish to say?—I think so.

34,498. If you will kindly read it that will shorten matters?—"Sex inequality in Divorce a cause of widely-spread Diseases in Women.—It is undesirable from a medical point of view that the present sex-inequality of the divorce law should be maintained. By even one single act of unfaithfulness on the part of the husband, the wife is exposed to the risk of contracting a contagious disease. It should not be necessary for her to submit to the ruin of her health to enable her to obtain a divorce on the additional grounds of 'cruelty.' Such disease, especially gonorrhœa, is common among the poorer married women of the country, although from the reticence necessarily observed by the medical profession, the patient is usually entirely unaware of the nature of this disease.

"An investigation of 1,052 consecutive gynæcological out-patients has shown that 149 cases, viz., 14 per cent., were suffering from gonorrhœa in an acute or 'chronic' form. These patients were, for the most part, respectable women, the wives of sailors and dock labourers."

34,499. Are those in-patients?—No, those were out-patients. "Danger or Chronicity of such Disease.—Gonorrhœa is not a slight ailment, but often the cause of illness, dangerous to life, and productive of life-long ill-health. An analysis of 157 consecutive gynæcological in-patients showed that 39 cases, or 24 per cent., required severe operative measures for this disease."

34,500. We were told yesterday it was a fruitful source of sterility. Is that so?—Yes. That comes later in my proof. "In some of the chronic cases ill-health has been present for years, and many of those sought treatment because their physical condition rendered marital relations impossible, giving excuse for further unfaithfulness on the part of the husband.

"Influence on Children.—Gonorrhœa in women is one of the most frequent causes of sterility. Of 188 cases investigated, drawn from a class where large families are usual, 60 were childless, viz., 31 per cent. In others there was often only one child, the history indicating that infection took place at the time of marriage from the presence of uncured disease in the husband. The wife is usually blamed for this sterility, although she is in no way in fault. The production of 'ophthalmia neonatorum' by gonorrhœal infection is well known, but the accidental infection of older children by mothers suffering from the disease and unaware of its nature is much less frequently recognised."

34,501. Is that communicated by simply living in the same house?—Yes, or by using the same washing apparatus, and things of that sort. "Spread of the Disease.—Reinfection frequently occurs when the wife returns home after treatment directed only to herself. On this account, and for the protection of innocent persons, compulsory notification should be adopted, followed by efficient treatment of both husband and wife. At present the doctor is unable to respect the confidence of the patient and protect the interests of the public at the same time."

34,502. Do you think compulsory notification is within the range of practical politics?—I think there are great difficulties, but they might be overcome.

34,503. Have you thought out how?—I have not formulated any definite plan, but something on the lines of ophthalmia neonatorum which is being notified. I should think it might be done somewhat in the same way. "Conclusions.—That sex-equality in divorce would be to the advantage of the race. That the poor require opportunities for divorce as much if not more than the rich (separation not meeting all cases, but leading to increased immorality and illegitimacy)."

34,504. You also sent us a pamphlet which is reprinted from the "British Medical Journal" of June 19th, 1909. Is there anything more in that that is worth addressing attention to now? I have marked one or two passages, but I rather thought everything in it was covered by what you have said?—I almost think it is. The pamphlet is, of course, more from a medical point of view.

34,505. You say on the first page: "It therefore arises that the medical profession as a whole is somewhat indifferent on the subject of gonorrhœa, from ignorance of its prevalence, especially in the chronic forms." Will you explain the meaning of that a little more fully?—It is a difficult disease, in its chronic form, to diagnose, and unless you have had special experience, the sort of experience one gets in gynæcological out-patient work, I think many of the cases are overlooked or put down to some other trouble.

34,506. I have always heard it said in the court over which I presided that no certain diagnosis could be made without microscopic examination. Is that right?—One could not be absolutely certain. One could not swear to it unless one found the organisms; but if I get a very well-marked case I feel I can be practically certain about it even without the examination. If I look carefully I can find it in most cases; at least that has been my experience.

34,507. You further say, "Cases may be regarded as simple leucorrhœa, cystitis, or pelvic inflammation, unless a searching inquiry is made into their etiology. It follows that the lay public is entirely unaware of the lifelong suffering and chronic ill-health caused to thousands of women annually by this infection." That is your concluded opinion?—Yes. If the doctor himself or herself does not consider that it is gonorrhœa, or think it is, he or she is not likely to tell the patient. They very often do not tell the patient when they know it is.

34,508. Do the figures you have given in your own immediate neighbourhood indicate what one might expect to find in similar circles over the country, or is it peculiar to sailors and dock labourers, whom you mention?—Perhaps it may be a little greater in Liverpool; but when I was working in London, although I made no detailed examination, I am sure from my experience now that a great many cases I then perhaps did not consider were gonorrhœa were, and I do not think there would be very much difference.

34,509. I do not know that there is anything else that struck me in the pamphlet, except at the end, where you come to prophylaxis. You say, "My object in bringing forward these facts is to renew interest in a disease extremely widespread, and the cause of endless suffering to many ignorant and innocent women, and in the hope that practical prophylactic measures will be suggested. I would suggest that, with the co-operation of the medical profession as a whole, further investigations be undertaken to ascertain the extent of this disease, and some attempts made to lessen the incidence. I do not venture to indicate how to deal with the sensitive social conscience of the present day, but it is obvious that ignorance constitutes a grave danger to the community. Loyalty to the patient herself must be the first consideration, and the risks employers and others are running secondary. Apart from education, the only solution of the problem is notification, as has been suggested for ophthalmia neonatorum, so that early and complete treatment could be adopted and if necessary enforced. To this method, unfortunately, there are many grave objections." I have practically asked you about that?—Yes.

34,510. Having regard to your experience amongst these people that attend your hospital, and whom you attend as out-patients, do you think if adultery were placed as a ground of divorce on the same footing between men and women, it would tend to raise the standard of morality amongst men?—Yes, I think it would.

34,511. Have you any reasons for forming that view?—I think, to start with, there is great ignorance among these people, among the husbands themselves, as to the danger of this disease. I do not think many of them realise, when they expose themselves to contagion, that they are likely to communicate it to their wives. They would not wish to do that if they knew it; and if the grounds of divorce were made equal it naturally would follow that they would understand the reason. It would necessarily follow simply from humanity.

34,512. Attention would be more directed to it because of the consequences being possibly divorce?—Yes.

34,513. That would make them more careful?—I think so.

34,514 (Sir Frederick Treves.) I take it you wish to emphasize the fact that in the public mind the venereal disease is syphilis?—Yes.

34,515. That is the general view?—Yes.

34,516. You wish to emphasize that there is an almost more serious venereal disease, gonorrhœa?—Yes.

34,517. You emphasize the fact that this disease may lead to indescribable troubles in women?—Yes.

34,518. And to many distressing operations?—Yes.

34,519. That is the main point?—Yes.

34,520. In answer to a question by the Chairman, you said there was no difficulty in diagnosing gonorrhœa by means of the gonococcus?—No, I do not think so.

34,521. If trouble is taken?—Yes.

34,522. It is not a question of widespread ignorance, it is a question of not applying a test that is tedious but which might be applied?—Yes.

34,523. Otherwise the impression might be conveyed that this disease is difficult to recognise?—It does mean a good deal of trouble in chronic cases.

34,524. You would not leave the impression on the minds of the Commissioners that this disease is overlooked because it is sometimes difficult to recognise?—Perhaps not.

34,525. If you look at your proof, paragraph 2, would you let this impression be left, that one-fourth of the cases of operation on women for what are known as diseases of women are due to gonorrhœa?—I only give this as my experience.

34,526. You see how it stands. It means if you take 100 operations on women for what are known as the diseases of women, obstetric and gynæcological operations, you would say that one-fourth of those was due to gonorrhœa?—I can only say in one-fourth of my gynæcological cases it was. I should not like to say that about other people's.

34,527. You are in rather an unfortunate district, poor people with somewhat loose morality, that seem to hang about a seaport?—The women patients I get are really very respectable women, taking them all round, but, of course, there are a great many sailors among the husbands.

34,528. In the third paragraph, would you clear up that point with regard to accidental infection of older children by mothers suffering from the disease. What form would that take?—In children?

34,529. In older children: you are not speaking of ophthalmia neonatorum?—No. As a rule, it is disease of the external generative organs in little girls.

34,530. You mentioned that?—Yes.

34,531. You do not suggest compulsory notification as an actual detail of any alteration in the divorce laws?—No, I simply wish to direct attention to it. It is a thing which would require a tremendous amount of thinking out.

34,532. So far as the divorce laws are concerned, you would not mention it?—No, I do not think it would quite come into them.

34,533. I take it your real point is this, if adultery were recognised as a ground of divorce equally in both sexes, in your opinion it would greatly diminish this distressing disease?—Yes, I do.

34,534. That is the one great point of your argument?—Yes.

34,535. The disease has very lamentable consequences, and if adultery were granted as a ground of divorce equally in the two sexes, this disease would be materially lessened, you think?—Yes.

34,536. You use the figures of 30 and 33 per cent. with regard to sterility. How does that compare with the general figures of sterility in women?—I am afraid I could not give you that.

34,537. That is essential?—I could not give accurate figures, but my impression, judging from the other patients not suffering from this disease, is that, as a rule, they had very large families—the same class of patient.

34,538. Taking 100 married women, would you say that 10 per cent. are sterile?—I could not answer that question off-hand.

(Chairman.) I am sure we are very grateful to you for coming here.

Dr. MAY THORNE called and examined.

34,539. (Chairman.) What are your qualifications?—Fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons, Ireland; licentiate of the Society of Apothecaries, London.

34,540. And a doctor of medicine?—Yes; that is, an M.D. of Brussels.

34,541. Where is your practice or field of operation?—My practice is a private one and I practise in Harley Street.

34,542. How many years have you been engaged in professional life?—The last 15 years.

34,543. Is your evidence given in connection with any association, or entirely on your own?—My evidence is entirely on my own.

34,544. You have been good enough to prepare a memorandum of the points to which you wish to call attention?—Yes.

34,545. I think it will be convenient if you would read it?—"If divorce is necessary, it should be able to be obtained equally by both sexes and by rich and poor. As adultery is the cause of divorce allowed by the Divorce Court, the causes of adultery should be investigated. The standard of morals expected of men, unmarried as well as married, has hitherto been less high than that demanded of the large majority of women. The standard of morals that men expect from one another on this point is admittedly low."

34,546. You take that, apparently, from some of the witnesses we have had before us?—Yes. I consider that it is admitted in the evidence, although it was known to me on other grounds.

34,547. It accords with your own view?—Quite. "If polygamy is necessary to man then the present marriage system is insufficient for his needs. If polygamy is not necessary, then fornification and adultery cannot be too strongly condemned (a) on account of the disease a man often contracts and from which he may suffer for years, and (b) because it is difficult for his medical adviser to say when he is cured, and he frequently, greatly to his sorrow, infects a pure wife and passes his disease on to his children. The diseases gonorrhœa and syphilis should be added to the list of notifiable diseases. The fact of notification would, I believe, act as a deterrent to the acts being committed which may lead to these diseases. In order to raise the standard of morals it would be well for each individual man and woman to be cognisant of the consequences, that is, serious diseases, due to fornication and adultery not only in those men and women who commit immoral acts, but to the wives and children who are absolutely innocent. These consequences are of national importance as tending to increase the number of sterile marriages and physically unfit children. If fornication or adultery on the part of either party were made a criminal offence I am under the impression it would make for the good of the community. At present it is, I understand, a rather generally accepted idea among young men that to commit fornication is a sign of virility. This idea cannot be too strongly combatted. Doctors, fathers, schoolmasters, and clergy should speak and teach clearly on this point. A young man should be helped as far as possible by a strong expression of public opinion to combat this indulgence. At present public opinion condones if it does not encourage fornication. I am convinced from my experience of 15 years practice amongst both hospital as well as good class patients that were fornication to cease there would be markedly less disease in many innocent young married women. As it is, the home life of many young couples is ruined by the husband's early experiences, which, in addition to burdening his wife with a life-long illness, has made him less able to be satisfied with her. A vow made in church seems to be considered of no importance by many married men. I feel this Commission should make it strongly felt that the marriage tie is very binding. The question whether insanity coming on some years after marriage should be regarded as a cause of divorce is one I approach with diffidence. If one chronic illness is accepted as a cause of divorce other chronic illnesses must also be allowed, and this might lead to dangerous results in some cases. In individual cases the insanity of husband or wife tells very hardly on the sane partner. But these chronic diseases are on an absolutely different footing to communicable disease due to immorality. I think everything that can be done should be done to reconcile people who have separation orders, but the numerous reconciliations after separation orders must be carefully investigated. For economic reasons many women cannot afford to live apart from their husbands, and now and again a woman, in spite of the husband's drunkenness, brutality, or communicable disease, finds it necessary to live with him."

34,548. The next point we need not refer to, because that is not within our purview?—I am strongly of the opinion that the publication of details of divorce cases is undesirable.

34,549. Do I gather from the general tone of your proof you would advocate the equality of men and women with regard to adultery?—Absolutely.

34,550. Do you think that would be in the interest of the nation generally?—I do.

34,551. Can you tell us why you come to that conclusion?—Because in so many cases women contract disease from their husbands who are leading irregular lives.

34,552. You think it would tend to check irregularity of life?—I believe so.

34,553. If they knew there was this serious consequence?—I think at present they are ignorant of the consequences of these acts in very many cases.

34,554. (Lady Frances Balfour.) You say in paragraph 2 the causes of adultery should be investigated, as adultery is the cause of divorce. What do you mean by that exactly?—I think it should be felt very strongly that men and boys should be more educated into the consequences of adultery in order that they may realise what the effect of these actions is. It is the want of education in many cases that allows of these acts being committed which would not be committed if the men and boys knew the results.

34,555. The third paragraph suggests that the standard of morals in men is lower than that expected from women?—It does.

34,556. You think if the men were educated to a higher standard of morals it would improve the condition of things?—That is my feeling, strongly.

34,557. (Sir Frederick Treves.) Would you suggest that notification of these diseases under the Act should be an item in any reform of the divorce laws?—I think that if notification were compulsory that it would be strongly felt by many men that they would not commit those acts, and therefore, indirectly, it would tend to the improvement of the present divorce laws.

34,558. You do not suggest that compulsory notification of this particular disease should be a feature of any reconstruction of the divorce law?—I should like to suggest that very strongly.

34,559. It has nothing to do with divorce?—Except that the consequences of these acts bring about divorce.

34,560. Your other point is that adultery should be regarded as a criminal offence. Would you make that a feature of any reconstruction of the divorce laws?—That, of course, is at present a personal opinion, but I cannot help thinking that if that were made a feature in divorce laws that we should have markedly less adultery, and therefore markedly less divorces.

34,561. That would be allowed, I think; but would you suggest that these two particulars should be features in any new divorce laws, because they are outside the immediate province of divorce. The two points are notification of venereal disease and the making of adultery a criminal offence?—If they are not included in a divorce law, I do not see that they will come in under any other heading.

34,562. With regard to insanity, your argument is that if insanity is admitted as a ground of divorce, any other chronic illness should logically be admitted as a ground of divorce; but is there any chronic illness extant which is comparable to the case of an incurable lunatic?—Not absolutely comparable.

34,563. So that that argument you will, perhaps, acknowledge is a little deficient?—It is not as strong as the others, but that is a point I approach with diffidence. I do not know so much about it as these other things.

34,564. Considering that incurable lunacy occupies a peculiar position as a chronic disease, you can hardly argue that if it be admitted other illnesses must be admitted, since incurable lunacy stands by itself. The man is dead, except in the physiological sense?—Yes.

34,565. (Chairman.) May I make plain your position about notification. You do not consider that part of the divorce law, but if put into operation it would tend to lessen the cases in which divorce might be required?—That is what I wish to say.

(Chairman.) We thank you very much indeed for your evidence.

Miss Helen Webb called and examined.

34,566. (Chairman.) You have medical qualifications, I believe?—Yes, Bachelor of Medicine of the University of London, and licentiate of the Society of Apothecaries.

34,567. Have you had a practice in London?—I have been in practice 22 years, during 19 of which I saw patients in the out-patient department of the New Hospital for Women, Euston Road, at first as assistant and for some years—I cannot remember exactly how many—as senior of the department.

34,568. You have had a large experience of women's cases?—I have had a very large experience and a large private practice, a large hospital experience.

34,569. Your name was suggested by one of the Commissioners, and you were communicated with?—Yes.

34,570. You have prepared a very short memorandum, and perhaps it may be necessary to amplify it. Will you give us the effect of your views about these matters?—I felt that the points I had most at heart were for the sake of the next generation. I think a great deal has been said in the evidence which one entirely agrees with about the evils to the persons directly concerned, but the extreme urgency of greater facility of divorce is on account of the children. The evils that arise to them through venereal disease, and also through the bad moral conditions which surround them where the parents are unhappily married, in my mind call for much greater facility than they have at present, especially amongst the working classes.

34,571. May I take it that this sentence of your memorandum summarises it: "That the continuance of any marriage which is physically and morally injurious to the offspring is a menace to society, and calls for greater facility of divorce in all classes"?—Yes. I also feel strongly on the question of the equal moral standard for men and women.

34,572. You say, "One of the principal reasons ordinarily given for the avoidance of divorce is that the divorce of the parents would be socially detrimental to the children." You go on to comment on that by saying: "In my opinion the dissolution of an unhappy marriage is often the only possible way of rescuing them from evil." Will you explain a little more what you intend to convey?—I mean that conventionally it is thought a dreadful thing for the children, that the parents should be divorced, and it is regarded as a slur on them and injurious to them for life, whereas in a great many instances the continuance of a wrong marriage keeps up such a state of friction and discord in the environment of the child in its home and everyday life as will do far more fundamental injury to its character and prospects. The birth of more children is also under such circumstances so highly undesirable, that it is for the good of the offspring that there should be a divorce between incompatible parents or diseased parents.

34,573. Have you your memorandum before you. The next paragraph deals with that point. Will you read it, and say whether there is anything to add to it?—"Not only may even occasional adultery on the part of the husband render the wife, through ill-health, inefficient in the performance of her duties as a mother, but it may also prove a source of suffering to and of congenital defects in the children—stigmata which can never be altogether eradicated."

34,574. That is the same point?—Yes.

34,575. Your views as far as we have gone are based on the detrimental influences and effects upon children?—Yes.

34,576. You add, "No one denies that we are influenced for both good and evil by our surroundings, and we can scarcely overestimate the harm done to the sensitive mind of a growing child by the demoralising atmosphere of an unhappy home." That is again the same point?—Yes.

34,577. You add, "If therefore our chief duty is, as I contend, to the coming generation, the welfare of the children constitutes one of the principal arguments for greater facility of divorce in cases where physical and moral evil is likely to accrue to the offspring." You have not dealt with that. Perhaps I interrupted you when you were going to say something about it on the question of equality, that is to say, making simple adultery of either party the ground of divorce?—I hold the view very strongly that an equal moral standard for men and women would very much lessen the necessity for divorce, and lessen all social evils and difficulties. I am a member of the Society of Friends, amongst whom men and women are regarded as equal on this point and many others. We expect the same standard from men and women, and I do not know of a single case of divorce in all my knowledge of the people called Quakers.

34,578. Do you mean among Quakers there is that standard?—There is that standard amongst the Quakers, all through church government.

34,579. And personal relations?—Yes. The position of women is taken as being precisely the same as men. It certainly leads to a very different point of view about all this kind of thing from what is met with in the world.

34,580. From actual experience you are able to say equality produces a high moral standard amongst the men?—I am. Theirs is a different point of view from that which one meets elsewhere.

34,581. To what extent, in connection with divorce, has that been brought to your attention in the Society of Friends?—I do not know of a single instance of divorce. There may have been some, but I have been a Friend all my life, and my people for many generations, and I cannot remember a single instance.

34,582. That might possibly be because it is against the tenets, religiously speaking?—I do not think so. You seldom get entanglements and difficulties to any serious degree.

34,583. There is a very high moral standard?—Yes. I do not say there are no backsliders, but it is regarded differently.

34,584. Can you tell me the total number of the Society in this country?—I am afraid I cannot. It is diminishing somewhat, I believe.

34,585. You have no idea?—No; I should not like to venture. I am not very good at remembering figures.

34,586. Does that exhaust all you have in your mind?—I should like to say I have no faith in the possibility of any kind of notification such as you asked about from the other witness.

34,587. As a practical matter?—Yes. I think any satisfactory notification would be quite impossible.

34,588. At any rate in the present time?—From the nature of the diseases. It is physically and morally impossible that such would be satisfactory. I should also like to say that I have had a considerable experience of these diseases of which Miss Ivens spoke, and known women whose lives were entirely wrecked by gonorrhœal infection. With reference to the question of whether it can be discovered or not, I think that whereas in the men it is readily discovered, very often no one suspects anything in the woman until years after, when low inflammations and adhesions and other causes of suffering have ruined her life, and it is even then hard to make certain that the trouble is due to gonorrhœal infection.

34,589. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) Does the Society of Friends consist chiefly of one class in society, or of all classes in society equally?—All classes in society, yet in a way we have only one class. We recognise each other socially to a degree that is little known in other circles.

34,590. You have not very many of the very poor?—No, because we never let them be very poor. We should have the very poor if we did; but we look after everybody.

34,591. You prevent their sinking to the class which is a very large one in the world outside?—Yes. There also is, of course, considerable temperance; nearly everyone is a total abstainer.

34,592. You would say the conditions are very different from the conditions prevailing in the world, as a whole?—Not so very different nowadays. We all have to mix and meet in the world. I mean the temptations and everything else are very much the same.

34,593. Would you not say that all members of the Society are looked after not only in money matters, but in every matter by other members of their own body?—Not to any very binding degree as people live in the world now. In former times there was more complete oversight. They are supposed to be looked after, but it is easy for them to escape it, to keep out of the way.

34,594. There is more protection among the Friends for the weaker members of the body than there is in the general world outside?—Yes, there is protection to a certain extent, and the strength which is given by expectation of a good life. I mean their own people would be just as shocked and horrified at something morally wrong in the life of a man as in the life of a woman.

34,595. In considering the moral condition of the society you must take all those considerations into account?—Of course you must.

34,596. It is hardly possible for the sake of this one matter, the equality of sexes, to make a fair comparison between the world in general and the Society of Friends?—I think the fact that the equality of the sexes goes through the whole life of the Society is an immense factor in keeping men straight; the same standard is expected of men and women, and they have to take the same part in the church government. One realises when one is inside the community how this fact "leavens the whole lump." It is difficult to convey to other people.

34,597. I thoroughly appreciate your view and am not at all suggesting another view. You would say it would not be accurate to suppose that this one factor of the equality of the sexes accounted for the high tone of the Society generally by itself?—Not by itself, but it is the largest factor, I consider.

34,598. You think it is the largest of all?—I think it is the very largest factor.

34,599. You said something about divorce between incompatible parents. Are you in favour of divorce where the parties, after living together a good many years, are incompatible?—I am afraid I should go so far.

34,600. Without any question of adultery or cruelty or desertion?—Yes. I think we see in Sweden and other places that is a very workable and right thing.

34,601. That is your view?—Yes.

34,602. (Chairman.) I gather that if we as a nation could reach the standard of Quakers there would not be much to complain of?—I am afraid I think so.

34,603. Your deliberate opinion is that the equality is largely conducive to produce the results you have mentioned?—Largely.

34,604. The largest factor?—To me it seems so.

(Chairman.) We thank you very much for your very interesting evidence.

Dr. ETHEL BENTHAM called and examined.

34,605. (Chairman.) You are also a medical practitioner and lady doctor, and have been in practice a considerable number of years?—Yes.

34,606. How long?—Since 1894.

34,607. For a short time you were practising in South London, then in Newcastle, Gateshead, and recently again in London?—Yes.

34,608. Are you a member of the Fabian women's group?—Yes.

34,609. They communicated with our Secretary, and you are more or less a representative of that group?—I am representing the views of the group and am also speaking in my own private capacity.

34,610. Do you know the total number of their membership?—Of the women's group?

34,611. Yes?—It is about 200; I do not know whether it is a little more or less.

34,612, Has there been a meeting at which the matters you present were considered?—Yes.

34,613. Has your practice brought you into close and intimate knowledge of the lives of many different classes of people?—Yes, I have been in good class general practice in the North. In South London I was almost entirely amongst the poor, and in Newcastle I had also for five years the superintendence of a large dispensary for out-patient work amongst women only.

34,614. With regard to the members of the group you refer to, are most of them official or social workers in contact with the lives of the poor?—Yes. Those who have expressed any opinions or aided me with facts have had a good deal of experience in various capacities.

34,615. Will you refer to the third paragraph of your memorandum?—"We feel that little of the discussion on the subject of divorce has been free from prejudice. Most even of the witnesses have not considered the question on its own merits, so as to suggest the best conditions for a civilised state to live under, but have approached the subject from the point of view of some law or some interpretation of some law which appears to be immutable, and to which human nature has to accommodate itself as best it may. Even within the limits of one religious body there are widely differing interpretations of what is possible or right. We feel that in framing these laws the starting point should be ordinary principles of justice and equity, without regard to expediency or vested interests of any kind, whether of the rich or of one sex against the other, or of any trade, profession, or calling; and especially we feel that no section of the religious world, however numerous or influential, should be able through the law of the land to impose burdens on the conscience of other sections who think differently."

34,616. Does that mean your society as a whole is in favour of the dissolution of marriage?—No.

34,617. In proper cases or not?—No, the society as a whole is not, and I am most emphatically not in favour of the dissolution of marriage.

34,618. On any ground?—I think, as the sequel shows, that marriage should be able to be dissolved where it has ceased to serve its purpose.

34,619. That is the general view of the society?—Yes.

34,620. Will you give us your view, both for yourself and the society, on the equality question?—Yes. I think the society and myself are absolutely at one on the equality question. We feel that the inequality is the main cause of the low standard of morality and the great many ill social results flowing from it.

35,621. Those two points are so important I wanted to get them clear at the outset?—I do not want it to be taken that either I or the society are in favour of any looseness of the marriage tie.

36,622. I understand that, but you come to causes which you think justify it?—Yes. "The principle of matters of conscience is already admitted in matters of much smaller importance, as, e.g., vaccination, and we believe that the want of equality and freedom of all the community with regard to the marriage laws is causing grave harm to the nation, by tending to break up family life, to lessen respect for the marriage tie to increase illegitimacy and prostitution, and generally to lower the standard of morality. This lower standard, and especially the lower standard tacitly accepted by law and public opinion from men, tends also directly to the lowering of the birth rate and to the birth of children physically and mentally unfit, who are likely to be a burden on the community from their inability to become self-supporting citizens. We feel that a lessening of respect for the marriage tie is making itself apparent precisely because of the impossibility of release from this relationship even when it has manifestly ceased to fulfil its purpose, and is only an instrument of grievous injustice and oppression to one or other of the parties. We do not wish therefore to touch on the religious question, as to which we, like the rest of society, should take different views probably, and which we hold therefore to afford no real grounds for decisions to apply to all the community, but simply to state certain consequences which we have observed of the present laws and practice. With regard to inequality between classes, several witnesses have said that there is little or no demand for divorce among the poor. There may be little explicit demand since people do not spend time in asking for what they know to be beyond reach, but there is a strong feeling that it is unjust that there should be no possibility of it for them. Amongst the poorer classes the Gordian knot is cut in different ways, always with bad social results. For people of moderate means even the only practicable step is a separation order, and this is in my experience a very unsatisfactory method, frequently resulting in two illegitimate families, and great hardship to those children and those of the legitimate family also."

34,623. You say this is in your experience, and that there is a strong feeling of injustice. To what extent can you say you have come across that?—I have been in contact with a great many women who have in professional confidence expressed their views to me. Very many women have spoken to me, and many men also, although of course not so many, my practice not taking me among men to a large extent.

34,624. To what effect?—That it was wrong and unjust that they should not be able to obtain release when the man was either exceedingly cruel or was openly unfaithful, but that they had not the power to get it unless he was both. Among middle-class people and well-to-do people, as well as among the poor, I have come across that frequently, unfaithfulness without cruelty, and in many cases—it is impossible to violate professional confidence by giving identification—I have found that there is open unfaithfulness which the wife bitterly resents, and which she feels to be extremely detrimental to her children; in two or three cases I can recall she has endeavoured to get a divorce, I mean consulted legal advisers, and was advised that she had no ground.

34,625. That complaint is because more than one cause has to be added in the suit before the divorce could be obtained?—Yes.

34,626. Have you had experience of complaint on the ground of inability of the poorer people to get divorce?—Yes, very often.

64,627. To what extent can you speak to that?—It is a little hard to give the actual extent, but it is a thing that is constantly coming up in my experience.

34,628. That would be during your time of practice amongst the poorer classes?—Yes. I have been always more or less amongst the poorer classes all this time. I had a case yesterday. A woman came to me who expressed these views with very great bitterness.

34,629. I think you may proceed with your proof?—"A man left with children is forced to have a housekeeper, and in the small houses of the poor, decent sleeping arrangements are not possible, and disaster nearly always eusues." I instance several cases in my proof: shall I read them?

34,630. Yes: they are useful as illustrations of what has been said?—"One case I know of is a young artisan, rising in the world, who had a wife who was a chronic drunkard and unfaithful, and ill-treated their three children, and after a little time—this was when I came across him—he took on a housekeeper. There was a child born, and it appeared to be a very happy family, till the wife found him out. She demanded her own children, and made a scandal in the neighbourhood. Nobody in the neighbourhood had previously known that he and his housekeeper were not married. Eventually, the man and his second partner went to America with the one child, the drunken wife had her three back, and they ended in the workhouse."

34,631. Is that a case you recollect yourself?—Yes.

34,632. Was it a case in which, if there had been a less expensive means of divorce, the man might have got it?—The man would have distinctly got it, and he felt very injured indeed that he could not. He wished to legitimise the second union.

34,633. Then I think you give another class of case?—"The wife of a very respectable young man ran away with a lodger. He would not take any steps to get a separation, as he said that it was no good to him or his children, and merely published the matter unnecessarily. After a time she returned—this is a peculiar consequence—and eventually succeeded in getting a maintenance order against him in consequence of his subsequent misconduct with a young woman who looked after his children."

34,634. That must have been put as a case of desertion?—Yes, I believe it was. I do not know the details of the case.

34,635. Why did he not answer it by a case of her adultery?—I do not know. That would probably have altered things, but he was rather a chivalrous person in his rough way, and he did not do it, at all events. "Women are in a still worse position than men, as their resources are usually less, and this applies to women even of the middle and professional classes. Moreover, they have as a rule still greater hardships."

34,636. Are these cases about women that you give?—Yes, two cases I personally know. "Mrs. G. had an unfaithful husband, who was frequently cruel to her, and deserted her and the children several times. She was repeatedly told on applying for help that the law could do nothing for her unless he was living with her, so she went back to him. He assaulted her in the street, and a separation order was at last granted, but he has paid nothing under it, and though she is a clever woman, who can quite well keep herself and her family, she would have to go into the workhouse until her child is born were it not for charitable help. Even so, she can never feel free from him. In this case, both cruelty and adultery could be proved, but the woman has no means to institute proceedings, even if she had not condoned his conduct by her return. I have another case. I am watching at present a case of a young woman who has suffered unspeakable things from her husband. His people have helped her to run away, and she is keeping herself and one child with great difficulty. Her work brings her in contact with a decent man, who has offered to take charge of her and the child. Up to the present she has refused; but she is a woman with great longings for family life, and I think her scruples will be overcome in the end. There are details of many such cases, literally many such cases I personally know, which would be too long to quote. The impossibility of release when marriage has entirely failed leads both for men and women to a position of strong temptation. Those who resist it are deprived of family life, and as they are usually the strongest natures, and would probably make the best fathers and mothers, this is a loss to the community, as well as a great hardship to individuals. But the majority do not resist, as far as I have seen, and the results are illegitimacy, demoralisation, and prostitution. Among the working classes at least, there is a growing tendency to condone these irregular second unions of a wronged husband or wife, on the ground that it is unreasonable to expect either man or woman to live alone and bring up children unaided."

34,637. That is a general statement. To what extent are you able to speak to it from your experience?—One does not have statistics on such a point, but in the last 20 years I have come across that very frequently, and I believe that it is growing. I believe the sense of injustice is much more articulate lately, and people are more inclined to take the law into their hands, and their neighbours practically condone it.

34,638. Would your view be, if for really grievous cases there were a remedy that that tendency would be checked and the whole matter placed on a sounder and better footing?—Yes, most emphatically. "The impossibility of release also militates against marriage itself to some extent. I can recall two cases of women who had seen troubles at close quarters, and refused to enter into legal marriage at all. They preferred to be able to 'get shut of him if he does not behave himself.' Both these appeared to be quite successful matings, and were certainly objects of envy to many of their neighbours."

34,639. They simply joined together without any marriage at all?—Yes, and the express reason on the part of the women was that it was easier to get rid of the man if he ill-treated them, without any further fuss.

34,640. Do these two exhaust the number of cases of that kind you have known?—I do not think I can remember more than two actual definite cases of this kind. I have heard of others, but those two I know the particulars of.

34,641. You said this had become more articulate: are those recent cases?—Both these cases came under my knowledge about eight years ago. I was not so much referring to people absolutely refusing marriage as condoning the irregular second unions of people who had been married and could not get relief. "It has been urged that because in many cases of separation the parties afterwards return to one another, divorce is not necessary. But this is not a safe deduction. Many of these returns are for purely economic reasons. A woman applied for a separation order because of cruelty and unfaithfulness. Her husband had communicated venereal disease to her. She obtained her order and 8s. per week. The man went to prison rather than pay. She was unable to earn, and eventually he forced her to return to him. She had of course the alternatives of the workhouse or prostitution, and frankly discussed both with me. I happened to be in medical charge of the case. She did try the workhouse, I suppose more or less on my advice, but she came out saying that she had nothing in this world but her children, and she could not be separated from them. She did return when the man came out of prison, after a long experience of the impossibility of getting any maintenance. She returned to him, and he said he meant to pay her out for it all, and he did. She lived a terrible life, and there were other children, some born dead, two who have little chance of being useful citizens. Many cases of the same sort could be given, and we believe that most of the returns are not because there is any hope of a better life, but simply because the woman cannot do otherwise."

34,642. Do you think that divorce would solve that difficulty?—There is a great difficulty. In a case like that, where a woman had contracted disease, it would not solve the difficulty from the point of view of further children, but in cases where things stopped short of that it would give a woman an opportunity, and many of these women have the opportunity, of contracting another more successful union. I admit where the woman is actually diseased it would be of very little use. "The maintenance order is always insufficient and is very rarely paid. It is never sufficient for a woman to live and keep children on decently, and there are many ways of evading it and many ways of making it a means of persecution. I knew a case where whenever a man sent it he sent it by an order to a post office which was five miles distant from the wife's house. She found it very difficult. Very often an order is not paid unless the wife sends the children or goes herself to fetch it. Then the wife goes in mortal terror that the child will be harmed, as occasionally happens. There are all sorts of ways of annoyance. These considerations deter many women from applying for separations. Decent women will put up with almost anything—much more than it is to the general interest that they should put up with—rather than undergo the police court ordeal for so small and uncertain a gain. The most difficult and delicate inquiries affecting the entire lives of two people and their children are hurried through in a few minutes between drunken and disorderly cases, and before the loafers of all sorts who are usually present. There is no time to do justice. The decision can only be haphazard and for this reason the proceedings can often be used as an instrument of blackmail. When an order is made, it can easily be disregarded. It gives little or no protection to either man or woman and the woman has no security at all that payments will be made. Therefore people endure in many cases a life which is miserable in the extreme for themselves and demoralising to their children."

34,643. Upon the question of the hearing of cases, have you been present to enable you to express this view from actual knowledge?—Yes.

34,644. This is your view?—This is my experience. I am not speaking of London; I have not been present in a court in London.

34,645. Are you speaking of cases before lay justices or a stipendiary magistrate?—I have never been present before a stipendiary magistrate; it is the ordinary provincial police courts I am speaking of.

34,646. You now go on to the point I asked you about partly, but it is more in detail in your proof?—"Still more subversive of public morality and harmful to children is the effect of the inequality of the laws as between men and women. 'Accidental adultery' on the part of a man has been excused on the ground that its consequences are not so serious as in the case of a woman and also because 'it is certain that no woman can suffer quite such terrible pangs' in consequence of the husband's deliquency as he would from hers, and that women look leniently on these lapses. We hold that the relative amount of suffering is unproved and unprovable. Certainly no man is in a position to weigh it. That women do condone infidelity is a fact, but that they do it willingly or without the severest economic pressure is not a fact, and the important question is—is it to the public interest that they should be forced to condone it? The witnesses speaking for the Association of Registered Medical Women are clear on this point. Every medical practitioner of experience must confirm their evidence. Acts of adultery, even occasional ones, expose a man to infections and are a danger to the health of his wife from which she has no means of defence. It is not a question merely between the man and woman, but is of grave importance to the State since the diseases which may thus be acquired cause sterility, miscarriages, still-births and the birth of children who have not an average chance of becoming good citizens. These cases are more than a negligible fraction. I believe them to be much more numerous than is at all generally understood and not only among the working classes. Besides and beyond this gross physical danger there is the moral effect. A professional man in a good position was notoriously unfaithful, but he treated his wife generously and salved his conscience by presents to her. This did not prevent their household from being a very unhappy one, and the best comment on its effect on the children is the remark of a daughter of 20: 'Marry! I would sweep a crossing first. I have seen all I want to of marriage.' The wife in this case did consult lawyers on the matter, and was advised she had no ground for divorce."

34,647. It was a case of adultery?—The adultery was notorious, but there was no cruelty. Another woman, confronted with the choice of living a single life while ostensibly married or bearing probably unfit children, committed suicide. That was a case within my personal knowledge. Two others whom I have known attempted it. This choice is itself a very terrible one for women, especially quite young women, but more often they do not even have it. Possibly the man does not himself realise the risk, or there may be, and there has often been, economic pressure or intimidation. Then the next case is one which is a very terrible one—it was reported to me—of a man convicted of criminal assault on his own young daughters. He returned home, and his wife only with great difficulty got a separation order without maintenance. He had never used physical violence to her. But many witnesses have given cases of this kind, and they must be known to everyone who thinks. I quite agree that the misery of these individual women should not weigh against that national wellbeing if that could be proved to be served by it, but we submit that the denial of relief to women in cases where men could obtain it is demoralising to society, and therefore tends continuously to increase those offences for which divorce is demanded." I should like to comment on the evidence Dr. Webb has just read before you. It happens that in the North I was thrown much with the Society of Friends, and nothing struck me more than the entire difference of tone on all these matters that prevailed amongst the whole of them, many of them quite poor people.

36,648. They are not persons of a well-to-do position?—They would be persons of all positions, but the difference of tone on any of these matters and the absolute absence of troubles of this sort was a thing that struck me, not a member of the Society of Friends, but simply thrown amongst them, very strongly.

34,649. Do you put that down to the equality of personal relations?—Yes. In thinking over it, I have been inclined to think it was much the largest factor. There are doubtless others, but I should say that was certainly the largest factor.

34,650. Then, have you experience with regard to insanity?—"I have only a general practitioner's experience of insanity. I am not an expert in mental diseases, but I am convinced that the community ought to think seriously of its own protection here."

34,651. You are giving the cases you know?—Yes.

34,652. Will you kindly read them?—"I know one case of a woman who became insane at the birth of each child. She dreaded returning to her husband, but he insisted, and three successive children were born under these conditions."

34,653. That does not seem a case in which she could ask for relief?—That is an upside down sort of case, but that woman would have been glad for her own protection. She endeavoured with all her might not to resume marital relations, but he insisted, and three times over she had a child.

34,654. How can you suggest any divorce law on the ground of insanity would touch that case?—It is difficult to arrange, but I should say an individual might be allowed to apply on the ground of her or his own insanity just as much as on that of a partner.

34,655. It is a novel suggestion?—Yes, and it is an unusual case, but I thought it was worth while bringing it before you.

34,656. You put it "for her own protection"?—Yes, and for the protection of the possible children. I do not think those three children are likely to be of any profit or comfort to anybody.

34,657. You rather put that not as a part of the divorce law, but as part of a protective law which should be enforced where necessary?—I do not say how it should be arranged, but surely that is a necessary point for society to consider. The next case is one that would come under it. It is the case of a gentleman discharged from a lunatic asylum. He returned to his wife, much against her will, and two children were subsequently born. These were highly delicate and nervous children, and neighbours who did not know their history used to remark that the wife always seemed in a state of terror. This was explained by his attempt one night to murder all the family, and then it appeared that he had been subject to causeless outbursts of raging fury, and that the wife had been constantly on guard to prevent or avert consequences of these attacks. Another case is reported to me of a man with intermittent insanity who had 10 children. One of them is deaf, two have fits, two are mentally defective, and none are quite normal. The community is unlikely to profit by the children of any of these cases. "It is difficult to see quite how such cases can be brought under the scope of the divorce laws, but there is not the same difficulty in the next kind of case—that of the husband or wife of a hopelessly insane person. Here there is not the same risk of multiplication of a bad stock, but there is the same hardship to the other parent and the same probable consequence of illegitimate children and moral deterioration as occur in cases of desertion. There is no lack of cases to show this result both to men and to women. Long terms of imprisonment need also to be considered. I have not personally come in contact with many such cases, but I know of one in which the wife of a prisoner was living with another man. Their history was not known in the neighbourhood, and they had three children, lived happily together, and were generally respected. The economic struggle had been a very sore one for this woman, and her husband would seem to have been no great loss to society. She had religious scruples, and also a keen consciousness that her partner could leave her at any time if he chose, but she ended her confidences by saying: 'I know he never 'will leave me, and the children don't know that he 'is not their father, He does not make any difference 'between them and his own. So though I was greatly 'afraid I'd be doing wrong, I thought it out and 'made up my mind. God couldn't blame any poor 'woman for giving her children a chance whatever 'the parson might say.' Of course all the workers among the poor know cases of the desperate plight of the wives of prisoners sentenced to long terms. Many would not perhaps accept release, but I am told that many take it for themselves. My personal experience is limited in that. Therefore we believe that the present impossibility of release under any circumstances puts an unbearable strain on certain members of the community, and that there is a great and growing sense of injustice that relief is possible for the rich and not for the poorer classes for whom it is much more important; since to them the failure of marriage usually means the failure of their whole lives and entails actual physical as well as moral damage to them and their children. We think that this is leading now, and will lead more and more to disregard of the law and condonation of that disregard by public opinion. We also think that the different standard allowed by the law for men leads to a general lower standard of morality which tends to the increase of prostitution, the increase of disease and consequent diminution of the birth-rate and deterioration of the national health?" Then we make some suggestions for possible remedies.

34,658. Before we pass to that, that is a statement of what the society and yourself think?—Yes.

34,659. To what extent do you speak to the tendency of a different standard for the increase of prostitution?—That is a difficult question to answer. The extent is always a very difficult thing.

34,660. I was confining it to the extent of your experience. No doubt you represent a number of opinions, and that may be the general effect of them, but it is useful to know to what extent personal experience shows that that is a correct statement?—There is a lower standard of morality amongst men. The fact that society and the law practically do not expect the same standard of morality from a man, I think, makes it possible for men to indulge their instincts without much check, and that naturally and necessarily increases prostitution.

34,661. This is a statement of general inferences?—These are inferences, certainly, but I have known individual cases, such as that case of the woman at the police court, where it was absolutely considered as a possibility; it is not a thing one can get definite evidence of in many cases, but I have two or three cases in which I had very strong reasons for supposing that the woman had adopted that method of supporting herself and in one case her children also. It does not do to ask too many questions in some circumstances. "We think that the remedy is to be sought on the lines of the following suggestions:—

"(1) That reasonable facilities for divorce should be placed within the reach of all classes.

"(2) That the grounds which entitle a man to divorce from his wife should also entitle a woman to divorce from her husband.

"(3) That prolonged and malicious desertion should be a ground of divorce.

"(4) That some measures should be considered for safeguarding the State from the continuance or resumption of marital relations be a person suffering from recurrent insanity.

"(5) That marriage should in all cases be a civil contract, followed, as desired, by the special religious sanctions of the different creeds.

"(6) That whatever courts shall be given jurisdiction in matrimonial cases, they shall be separate courts or hold separate sittings, and that all questions of separation orders shall be withdrawn from ordinary police court hearing even though they should come before the same magistrates in a separate session.

"(7) That measures should be taken to prevent the publication of many of the details of divorce cases. We think that it is not desirable to suppress all evidence and merely to publish results. It is with some diffidence that I put forward the suggestion that there might be an official reporter who should furnish to all papers the essentials of the evidence shorn of unnecessary detail such as descriptions of the personal appearance and clothes of the parties to a suit.

"(8) I feel strongly that whenever in matrimonial cases a maintenance order or aliment is given, these sums should always be collected through an officer of the court."

34,662. Even where the wife requests the payment to be made to her?—I should not prevent the making of a special request to the magistrate; but if I am not very much mistaken there would not be very many who would make a special request.

"(9) That in all cases where there are children—to whichever party they may be entrusted—there shall be an official, a public trustee or guardian, who shall exercise a general supervision over them, much as the Lord Chancellor does over his wards. This official might possibly be the same who enforced payments of maintenance."

34,663. Would the probation officer comply with that?—I think he might in some cases.

34,664. It depends on the class of people you are speaking of?—It would be putting a great responsibility on the probation officer. I think somebody of greater standing would be better.

34,665. Somebody of greater standing might find a difficulty in dealing with the whole country?—Yes; there would have to be somebody for every court in which such cases were heard.

34,666. Have you any special officer in mind?—No; I think probably the probation officer would have to be the person. It is a very difficult and delicate question which would have to be considered. It is very difficult and delicate work, I mean.

(Chairman.) That brings us to the end of what you have in your proof.

34,667. (Sir Frederick Treves.) You say on the second page, speaking for the Fabian group, "we feel that lessening respect for the marriage tie is making itself apparent." Is that a conspicuous fact in your experience?—That is much more my personal opinion than that of the Fabian group, and, if you take it further, I feel amongst the classes of which I have been speaking that the lessening of respect for the marriage tie is just because of the reason that I have given, but that is much more my personal feeling.

34,668. The reason you give is not recent?—I think people are beginning to feel things. It is impossible for anybody who has been watching for the last 25 years in society not to realise that women are feeling their position and becoming much more articulate on these matters.

34,669. You think the respect for the marriage tie is distinctly lessened?—I believe that is the effect, especially amongst the classes of whom I have been chiefly speaking.

34,670. With regard to the first cases on page 3 of your proof, you would make chronic drunkenness a ground for divorce—if you take the case of that young artisan?—I do not think I would go as far as chronic drunkenness alone. This woman was cruel to the children as well.

34,671. You would not make chronic drunkenness a ground?—No. That might lead to abuses, but practically chronic drunkenness always means cruelty.

34,672. Would you accept insanity as a ground for divorce?—I think so, if incurable. There would have to be safeguards of that, of course.

34,673. You would include a case of alcoholic insanity if it were incurable as distinguished from the habitual drunkard?—Yes, when the thing is incurable and there is actual damage to brain cells.

34,674. The maintenance order, you say, is always insufficient and the money is rarely paid. With your experience of the poor have you any suggestion to make for the bettering of that state of affairs?—I have not, beyond the fact of enforcing the payment, which I think might be done through a court officer. It is the fact that the woman has to ask for it or send children, or make some arrangement herself which makes it so impossible to get it. If the man had to pay into court he would know proceedings would be automatic when he did not do it and I think there would be some improvement in that respect. As to the insufficiency of the maintenance I do not see how it is to be altered, because very few working men can keep one family, much less two.

34,675. You have no practical suggestion for dealing with a case of recurring puerperal insanity such as you mention?—I do not see how it could be put in a practical form unless it were possible for a man or woman to claim a divorce on the ground of their own insanity. This woman would have willingly gone to court and said she ran in danger of life and reason by reason of continual marital relations in order to have got a divorce.

34,677. That would apply to a great many other conditions besides puerperal insanity. You could hardly allow it for puerperal insanity alone and no other conditions?—No condition occurs to me.

34,678. Take the case of a woman with a narrow pelvis, to whom the birth of a child is inconceivable distress?—That is a case, yes; but I am not disposed to put that on an equality, because there it is not so much a case of unfit children. You have not to consider posterity to the same extent as in insanity.

34,679. You cannot bring that to a practical measure; you mention it as a counsel of perfection?—I think a woman or a man ought to be able to claim separation or divorce on the ground of danger to the children, whether it arises from their own insanity or the partner's. It is not a case that would very often come before any court.

34,680. (Mr. Burt.) You state in your proof that irregular unions are on the increase. They are more common now than formerly?—I think they are, from my watching during the last 20 years. That, of course, nobody can say is more than an impression.

34,681. Your statistics do not bear out that point. It is a matter of personal experience you are giving?—Yes.

34,682. You have had experience both in London and in Newcastle and Gateshead. Was that experience mainly among the same class of people, largely among the poorer classes?—Largely among the poorer classes in both cases. I have always devoted a great deal of my professional life to the poorer classes, except in South London when I first qualified, although I have always had a good practice in addition. I am speaking mainly of the poorer classes in both cases.

34,683. Have you found much difference between the North of England and London in that respect?—No very marked difference has come to my mind; but I think now you ask the question that the views in the North as to the necessity of marriage are slightly looser. It is a frequent thing amongst the poorer classes in Northumberland and Durham for there to be a child before marriage—very frequent. I do not think it affects the union afterwards in the least degree; but if you are asking widely about the difference in the classes, I have noticed that.

34,684. Have you found much difference between the artisan class and the labouring classes with regard to that?—The more educated and intelligent people are the more trouble they generally take to retain the good opinion of their neighbours. I should say as you go up altogether in every grade of society, they pay more attention to appearances, but I do not think there is any marked difference between the artisan and labouring people.

34,685. With regard to the separation allowance, you have said the amount is insufficient, and it is often unpaid in many instances, at any rate not paid in full?—Yes.

34,686. With regard to that you make some practical suggestions both as to the court and also with regard to the method of payment?—Yes.

34,687. Do you think it would be advantageous, even if the case were tried by the same magistrates, to have cases of separation entirely separate from all other cases?—Yes.

34,688. And that when an order is made the court ought to see it enforced?—Yes.

34,689. I take that to be your view?—Yes.

34,690. At the present time does the court interest itself or does it leave it entirely to the woman?—The court leaves it entirely to the woman, so far as I have seen.

34,691. She has to take action if the man does not pay?—Yes, and she has to summon him afterwards if it is not paid.

34,692. You suggest some automatic arrangement for paying through the court?—Yes.

34,693. (Lady Frances Balfour.) I think you and I met some weeks ago as representatives of industrial women?—Yes.

34,694. And had a very interesting discussion. Did you feel that the standard of marriage and their view of marriage was a very high one, but that with the difficulties of getting divorce being so expensive they had a way of settling the matter for themselves?—Yes. It was not considered merely from a standpoint of divorce. I think all those people who spoke upon that occasion seemed to have some experience of that which goes with my own.

34,695. It has been suggested that because the poorer classes cannot get divorce—it is too expensive—they do not wish it, and live more morally because they cannot get it. Is that your experience?—It is precisely the opposite.

34,696. We rather gathered from this discussion amongst themselves that they had more particular ways of settling it, and had a law to themselves, divorce being out of the question?—I do not think I should go so far as to say they have a law themselves, although I believe in one part of the country, the Pottery District, of which I have had no experience, there is a kind of understood law there.

34,697. (Chairman.) What is the law?—That one marriage is as good as another, and it depends upon the continuance of the conditions for which marriage was undertaken.

34,698. (Lady Frances Balfour.) If marriage is satisfactory?—If marriage is satisfactory it is marriage; if it is not satisfactory, the sooner it is done away with the better.

34,699. I think we understood if divorce was available to them they would make as much use of it as those classes who could afford it, in proportion?—Yes.

34,700. The absence of power did not lead to a higher state of morality. I ask, because it has been suggested, because it is not available the poor have a higher standard?—We did not gather that from the discussion, and I have not, from my experience.

34,701. (Mrs. Tennant.) Have you had time to keep a note of the social side of your medical cases? You speak very strongly about the unsatisfactory working of the separation order system. Have you been able to reduce your observation to figures?—No. I have isolated and scattered notes and remembrances.

34,702. You have no notes to enable you to do that?—I daresay I could find figures if I were to try, but it is scattered over 20 years' observations, and never having been used or taken for that purpose it would be difficult. I might do something.

34,703. Is it asking you too much to make an effort over one or two years? Our evidence is very conflicting as to the good working of the separation order system. If you have made notes which would enable you to say out of so many cases this number was satisfactory for this reason, and unsatisfactory for that, it would be of value?—I cannot at this moment answer whether I could do that. I might be able to do something. I should have to think about it.

34,704. If you find that you can do it and have time, would you be good enough to do so?—I will.

34,705. It has been suggested that the maintenance order might be made a first charge on the husband's wages. What do you consider would be the effect of that?—I think it ought to be. The woman has been put in these cases through the man's misconduct into a most terrible position, and I think he only owes it to her and society to make what little reparation he can.

34,706. It is only fair that he should stand the risk or inconvenience which might come to him in his employment from that matter being brought to the knowledge of his employer?—I do not see any way out of that. As a matter of fact, the employer generally gets to know of it, except in very large firms. I daresay in a firm like Armstrong's it would not come out, but in any smaller firm it usually does come to the knowledge of the employers as it is.

34,707. Do you feel it to be necessarily a considerable peril to him in his employment; that most employers would refuse to take any trouble?—I wish I thought it was.

34,708. It is more than a moral feeling. The employer would have the trouble of stopping so much money from his wages?—I do not think it would make much difference. It could be arranged with very little trouble to employers.

34,709. You think it could?—Yes.

34,710. Of course, the woman would not be in a better position if he lost his employment?—No, and in working out the details the thing would have to be carefully considered, but at the same time the position of the woman and children is so terrible that even a fair amount of inconvenience to the man ought to be encountered first.

34,711. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I gather your proposal with regard to the court which should deal with separation orders is practically that the procedure with regard to children's courts should be adopted for this purpose?—Yes, it seemed to me that was a practical proposal.

34,712. Do you know the working of children's courts under the recent Act?—No, not more than anybody can get from newspapers.

34,713. That would meet your point of the case being dealt with in a detached atmosphere without the ordinary surroundings of a police court?—Yes.

34,714. Your experience of the treatment by courts of these cases seems to have been unfortunate. You think they have been dealt with very badly in your experience in the magistrates' courts you have attended?—Yes.

34,715. You said you were not speaking of stipendiaries or of the London magistrates?—No. I have had no experience of the courts in London.

34,716. First of all, is your experience a wide one?—Personally, I have only had to give evidence twice.

34,717. Have you been present very often?—I have been present once or twice besides, and have heard a good deal about them.

34,718. As far as your personal share in those proceedings is concerned, it would be confined to a few cases?—Yes.

34,719. Would those be in country courts or town courts?—Both the cases in which I gave evidence were in Gateshead.

34,720. Where you have the town justices; it is a town court?—Yes.

34,721. You would not wish your evidence to go out as a general condemnation of all the magistrates' courts in the country?—No, that would be rather unfair; but what little experience I have had both in that and other matters with amateur magistrates, is not favourable.

34,722. You realise that the conditions are exceedingly different in different parts of the country, it is exceedingly different between town and country?—Yes.

34,723. You realise there are country benches where perhaps the matter may be treated with great indifference, and benches where it is treated with the greatest care?—Yes.

34,724. You cannot generalise?—No, that is true; but at the same time all benches of magistrates have to depend for their legal knowledge upon the magistrates' clerk.

34,725. You would say that even magistrates' clerks vary a good deal?—Yes. I do not wish to make any reflection on magistrates' clerks as a body, but so far as my experience has gone, I do not think their legal knowledge is always very great.

34,726. You probably do not want your evidence to be very marked on that point?—I certainly do not. The two occasions upon which I gave evidence have been about the most unpleasant moments of my life. They were two terrible cases, and in one case the magistrates simply consulted together how they could, in the interest of equity, over-ride the law

34,727. I should have thought you would approve of that?—I do; but as a matter of fact, the whole thing was done in such a few minutes, and in such an absolutely futile way, that nobody knew anything about the rights of the case.

34,728. You suggest that the maintenance allowance should be paid to a public officer?—Yes.

34,729. You are aware, probably, that is now done in many courts in many parts of the country?—I was not aware of it. Is it done so that it is an automatic thing? If the man ceases to pay, without further proceedings the officer takes action?

34,730. It does not go as far as that. It is already done, and I think with good results. The allowance is paid to an officer instead of being paid to the wife. You would be in favour of that being universal, being not a matter of arrangement but a matter of law?—A matter of law.

34,731. And that the payment should be automatically enforced?—Yes.

34,732. You think the amount unsatisfactory. That speaks for itself. You cannot suggest any way of getting rid of that difficulty. The husband cannot afford to pay what is an adequate allowance?—No, it is quite impossible.

34,733. How would that be met in the case of a divorce? Suppose these very painful cases you have given were cases of divorce: how would that be dealt with? How would the wife and the family be any better off? First of all, you would not let the man get off without paying anything; he would have to pay something in the form of alimony?—I think so.

34,734. It would not be fair because she has a divorce instead of a maintenance order, that he should get off scot free for his own wickedness?—Certainly not.

34,735. When that order was made he could not afford more than he could now under the present system. How would it improve matters? How would it be better for the wife and children?—In the case of divorce, as far as my experience goes, these women practically always have the opportunity of re-marriage.

34,736. Your view of the benefit is confined to that, the possibility of re-marriage of the wife?—I will not say it is confined to that, because I think that means a very great benefit to the children. I believe the man who is divorced should contribute to the maintenance of his own children, but I do not think he need necessarily do so to his late wife, if she re-marries.

34,737. Is it your view that the economical improvement that would take place if the law were altered, would be that the wife who is now separated from the husband by a separation order would be able to re-marry, and in many cases from your experience would re-marry?—Would re-marry, yes.

34,738. That is the improvement which would take place in their economic condition?—It would be a good deal, but the wife would be also much freer to get other work and support herself.

34,739. If she were married?—If divorced, and not subject to the continual inroads of the man after a separation order. He very rarely lets her alone.

34,740. If she were re-married that would decrease, would it not?—Yes, if re-married, or divorced, and living an independent life alone. When there is separation, which no one feels to be final, a man pesters her. I know one case, I saw the woman yesterday. The man has rifled her house at intervals instead of paying the allowance she ought to have had. He forces his way in when she is out at work and gathers up any unconsidered trifles and departs.

34,741. Are you not a little exaggerating matters in saying that the allowance is very rarely paid? We have had a very great deal of sad evidence that it is very often unpaid, but is not that an over-statement of the case to say it is rarely paid?—Not according to my experience, I say definitely. Of the cases I have known, not more than 10 per cent. were paid for over a year.

34,742. Would that be 10 per cent. of orders remaining in existence all the year?—Yes. That, of course, is not a very definite figure. That is an inference, but I believe it is not far from the truth.

34,743. What number of cases would that percentage be taken over?—I suppose I personally can remember something like, taking the last 20 years, 120 cases.

34,744. In 20 years?—Those are not cases I have heard of, but cases I have known.

34,745. How far do you go with regard to your view of what the grounds of divorce ought to be? I follow your view as to the equality of the sexes. Is it your view if parties cannot get on for other reasons than sexual immorality or cruelty that they ought to be allowed to be divorced? I ask you that because in your proof you say the impossibility of release when marriage has entirely failed reduces both men and women to a position of strong temptation. Where marriage has failed through entire incompatibility of disposition, where it has been tried and quite definitely failed, would you say there ought to be divorce where there is no question of adultery or cruelty?—Personally, no. I do not know whether I can speak for all the body I represent in that matter, but personally I have very strong views about marriage, and I should say no.

34,746. There must be something like wrong-doing on one side or the other?—Yes, I think so. If people have absolute incompatibility of temper apart from that or for other reasons, they must arrange it as best they can between themselves to live apart or make friends again. Personally, although I do not wish to include anybody else, I would not grant divorce for anything that did not definitely affect the children; there must be absolute wrong-doing or insanity, or something which will definitely affect them.

34,747. Insanity does not necessarily imply wrong-doing on either side?—No. My point of view is chiefly the interest of the children.

34,748. Insanity does not seem to come within the canon you have laid down, that there must be wrong-doing?—Wrong-doing or some other cause which affects the children or possibility of children.

34,749. Not necessarily the parties themselves?—No.

34,750. You do not take the view that anything which renders the performance of the contract impossible breaks the contract and ought to be a reason for divorce—the contract of marriage?—Anything which makes the contract absolutely impossible.

34,751. Does not incompatibility, the utter absence of affection between husband and wife?—Incompatibility in that sense, I suppose.

34,752. The loss of love between husband and wife?—Does utter loss of love between husband and wife occur without something to justify it on one side or the other? I do not think I have considered that point.

34,753. I will not press you if you have not considered it. You think insanity, although not caused by wrong-doing of the insane person, is a ground for divorce?—Yes, from the point of view of the community.

34,754. In an incurable case?—Yes.

34,755. Would you say the same of entire physical disability, something which is not mental, but some disease which renders it impossible that marital relations can go on, the parties being young?—Yes. I think it would be for the interest of the community that divorce should be possible in those cases.

34,756. That, I think, is your test, whether it be for the interest of (a) the children, and (b) the community?—Yes.

34,757. If it answers that test you would allow divorce for any reason?—Yes. One would have to prove it did fulfil that test.

34,758. May I take it you represent your own views upon this, or those of the Fabian group you represent?—Those are my own views. I should think that they represented those of most of the Fabian group, but we have not discussed that particular point.

34,759. Did I hear you say the Fabian group represented 200 people, or 200 branches?—The Fabian women's group number about 200 people.

34,760. What is their relation to the Fabian Society?—The Fabian Society has among it various groups for the study of particular questions, social questions, and the women's group is naturally for the study of those social questions relating to women.

34,761. Do you consider you are speaking on behalf of the whole Fabian Society as well as the particular group whose views you voice?—No, I have no warrant. I do not suppose I am speaking against it, but I represent only the women's group.

34,762. You referred to Dr. Jane Walker's proof. Have you seen it?—I have not seen the final proof, but I was one of the committee who considered it.

34,763. And discussed it?—Yes.

34,764. (Mr. Brierley.) Does your unfavourable experience of police courts lead you to suggest that the whole of these separation orders should be taken away from the magistrates?—I think I am not competent to discuss the constitution of courts, but I suggest that they should be taken in a different atmosphere away from the undesirable public.

34,765. Not mixed up with other cases, but taken in private?—Yes. I do not think they should be absolutely taken in private. I have a feeling that courts ought not to be altogether private if it could be avoided.

34,766. They must be either private or public?—They need not be taken with a lot of heterogeneous cases.

34,767. A special time or day might be allotted to them?—Yes.

34,768. Otherwise you would not be in favour of abolishing separation orders?—No. I think in some cases they meet the case, but in many cases they do not, and form a very unsatisfactory substitute.

34,769. With regard to the question Mrs. Tennant asked you, have you any experience as to the effect of asking employers to pay the money out of the wages to their workmen?—No.

34,770. Would you say that the convenience of the husband ought not to be considered?—If anybody's convenience is to be sacrificed it should be the guilty party, but I do not want to interfere with his chances of earning a livelihood.

34,771. What has to be considered is the best means of getting the money for the wife and children?—Yes. Of course, if you ruin the man altogether you deprive them.

34,772. You deprive the wife?—I do not want to do anything vindictive to the man, or lessen his chances of going on steadily afterwards.

34,773. There is one question I should have put to the last witness. You would not consider the equal treatment of the sexes in the Society of Friends is the only influence that leads to their high standard of morality?—No; I do not think either Dr. Webb or myself suggested that, but I think it is the largest factor.

34,774. They are a small society?—In Newcastle and Gateshead they are a very large body.

34,775. At any rate they are a body the members of which are all known to one another?—Hardly even that, but they are to some extent. Their system of church government does bring them more or less in contact.

34,776. It is so small, that the public opinion of the whole society has a good deal of influence on each individual member?—Undoubtedly.

34,777. They do not encourage marriages outside their own society?—There, perhaps, I am not competent to say. I am not a Friend. I have merely noticed this matter from outside.

34,778. All those influences would have some effect?—Naturally.

34,779. (Chairman.) Would you give me a little more information about the meeting Lady Frances Balfour asked you about. I did not know anything about it. Who were there, what class of meeting was it, and where was it?—It was held at 3, Lincoln's Inn Fields, Mrs. Ramsay MacDonald's. It was a meeting of the Women's Labour League, and some other women's organisation.

34,780. (Lady Frances Balfour.) One or two members of the co-operative women's guilds?—Yes, and sundry working women's organisations of that sort.

34,781. (Chairman.) They represented people all over England?—Hardly. It was too quickly got up.

(Chairman.) What number of women were there?

34,782. (Lady Frances Balfour.) About 25?—I should say about 35.

34,783. (Chairman.) Do you treat them as being representative of labouring women's opinion?—They are representative chiefly of the better artisan class and some middle class. It is very much a mixed organisation.

34,784. Would they represent different trades throughout the country?—Mrs. Ramsay MacDonald is a member; so am I. There are women who are absolutely working women.

34,785. Were some of these 35 actual working women?—Yes. The majority of the members of the Women's Labour League are working women.

33,786. Was this published or written out in any way, or resolutions passed?—I do not think there were any resolutions passed upon that occasion..

34,787. Mere discussion, and not reported?—I and some others had been anxious the league should give evidence before the Commission, but it was felt it was fairly well represented by other people, and that it would be difficult to get a mandate from the branches all over the country in the time.

34,788. I am asking, because we have a good many women's representatives of various leagues, but I did not gather that a meeting such as you described was included among them?—No, it is not for those reasons. The committee of the league felt that it was inadvisable to offer to give evidence on behalf of the league unless the branches all over the country had had an opportunity of expressing their opinions, for which there was not time. This was, therefore, not a league meeting, though many of its members were present and it certainly represented working class opinion.

34,789. There were no resolutions. Can you give anything which shows what was the representative view of that meeting on any of the important points discussed?—Yes; I think I can say pretty fairly that all felt equality between the sexes in this matter was desirable. They felt most strongly, that it was very necessary that there should be facilities for poor people as well as for well-to-do ones.

34,791. Was there any discussion or any general expression of opinion as to the grounds of divorce, such as adultery alone, or including cruelty?—I do not remember distinctly enough to say whether they expressed any opinions further than adultery and cruelty. I think they did. The majority thought incurable insanity was also a ground; and also I remember everybody was strong upon the inadequacy of the separation order as a means of help.

34,792. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) How were the 35 women selected for the conference?—They were not all women; there were some men.

34,793. How many men?—I had nothing to do with calling that meeting. Five or six men, I think.

34,794. And about 30 women?—Yes.

34,795. Thirty women from the whole of the country. How were they selected?—The Labour League has branches over the country, and the Women's Guild.

and the Railway Women's Guild, but they could not be got together in a hurry. There could only be representatives of a few near branches.

34,796. Were not those branches communicated with?—I do not know.

34,797. Who did it?—Mrs. Ramsay MacDonald and probably the secretary of the Labour League.

34,798. You are not able to tell us all those various branches were actually invited?—I cannot say that they were. In any case, if they were, the expense—because they are all working women—of their coming up would have been prohibitive. That would have been the reason of not coming in many cases if asked.

34,799. Those that were there were principally London people?—London and the neighbourhood altogether.

34,800. You do not know how many did not accept the invitation?—No.

34,801. What was the subject they were asked to discuss? Was it especially with regard to this Commission?—The question of the divorce laws.

34,802. (Chairman.) Can you recollect whether any discussion took place upon the subject of desertion?—Yes.

34,803. What was the general view about that?—Someone—I think it was a man, I cannot remember distinctly—expressed the view that malicious desertion ought to be a ground, and somebody else questioned whether that would be safe in all cases. Then the question of the Scotch law was brought up, and most people seemed to think that the Scotch law worked well.

34,804. There was no formal resolution?—No.

34,805. You have given in substance your impression of the discussion?—Yes.

(Chairman.) I ought to thank you very much for your interesting evidence.

Lady ALICE MAUDE MARY BAMFORD-SLACK called and examined.

34,806. (Chairman.) You come here to give evidence as representative of the Women's Liberal Federation?—Yes.

34,807. Have you been associated with that federation for some time?—Since the second year of its existence, which was in 1887.

34,808. Can you tell me what its membership is?—Over 100,000 women, belonging to 700 organised associations throughout the whole of the country, varying in size.

34,809. Is its object chiefly political or social?—It is a party political organisation, but it is not a party political organisation only, inasmuch as from its inception it had amongst its objects to protect the interests of women and children.

34,810. It is in that latter capacity, I take it, you represent it here to-day?—Yes.

34,811. I notice, at the beginning of your paper, you say one of its objects is the promotion of just legislation for women, and the removal of all their legal disabilities as citizens?—That is so.

34,812. Is the policy of the federation laid down each year by delegates of the affiliated Women's Liberal Association assembled in council?—Yes. We have a council meeting every year, to which the affiliated associations send up resolutions upon those subjects in which they are interested.

34,813. What is the number of the council?—The council generally numbers between 800 and 900, because we have a proportional representation from each association. They send up delegates in proportion to their numbers.

34,814. How many meet in council?—800 to 900.

34,815. Where is that meeting held?—It has been held in St. James's Hall of late years.

34,816. They are all delegates from various associated bodies?—Accredited delegates duly appointed by their own individual association.

34,817. It is a very large meeting?—Yes.

34,818. Have questions relating to divorce been often brought up before the council?—Ever since 1892, when Dr. Hunter's Divorce Amendment Bill was before Parliament, we have had resolutions.

34,819. Was that a Bill brought into the House?—It was brought into the House, and that was the first occasion upon which we were able to support any proposed legislation on the subject. That was in 1892.

34,820. Can you tell me what was the general object contemplated by that Bill?—To equalise the conditions for divorce as between men and women.

34,821. Do you remember what happened to it?—I think what happened to it happens to a great many private members' Bills.

34,822. It did not get on?—No.

34,823. Since that date have resolutions been continually passed at the annual council meetings with regard to divorce?—Yes. There have been 12 resolutions passed with regard to divorce on those same lines; and so persistent were the associations in sending up a resolution asking for an equalisation of the divorce laws as between men and women, that in 1905 the executive committee of the Women's Liberal Federation decided to put it amongst those subjects which were dealt with in the declaratory resolution, as being a subject upon which there was no difference of opinion. That prevailed from 1905 until 1909, and in 1910, when the Marriage Law Amendment Bill was before the House, we again had a special resolution supporting that suggested legislation.

34,824. You have given a copy of the resolution passed at the annual council meeting of the federation in 1892?—Yes.

34,825. I will read it: "That this council is of "opinion that any future legislation on the subject of "divorce should make the conditions for which "divorce is granted apply equally to men and women, "and that the federation should do all in its power "to aid and support Dr. Hunter's Bill for the equali-"sation of the divorce laws." I suppose substantially that was the resolution on the other occasions?—Substantially the same, with the omission of Dr. Hunter's Bill.

34,826. The point is the equalisation?—Exactly.

34,827. Has there been any division of opinion amongst the federation on that point?—I think it is quite safe to say from the very beginning, from the year 1892 onwards, even when we were perhaps at one time divided on women's suffrage, we were always united in demanding an equality of the laws controlling divorce.

34,828. Would not that equality be difficult in the case of the costs question? I do not know whether you have considered that point. At present all these divorce cases are fought at the expense of the man. He has to provide the means for himself and the wife. Would your notion be that each should provide their own? It is one of the advantages under the present state of the law which rests on the women's side?—My notion of equality is that if you gain any advantage through a reform, you naturally have to take the consequent disadvantages, whatever they may be. I am aware those things work out very often very awkwardly, especially at present, having regard to the unequal economic position of women, which is a side issue.

34,829. That is a difficulty I should like to see whether you have considered. Practically amongst the lower classes the man is the breadwinner?—That is so.

34,830. And in general he is the person who earns he funds to keep the household?—Yes.

34,831. And so it is through a very large part of society unless there are private means. The result has been, and part of the old common law was, that a man was bound to maintain his wife and provide the necessary means of contesting the case. Therefore, if she begins her suit the first thing is to give security for costs. If he begins, it is stayed till he does. I want to know whether you have considered that, because I think that might lead to very awkward results?—We initially take our stand on the principle of equality of the sexes under the marriage law, and it is not unusual in English law that the law should provide for circumstances as they arise. Those are subsidiary considerations.

34,832. That might mean that no woman could bring her case or defend it. You do not want that? —That would be accidental, and not of the essence of the situation.

34,833. May I take it that this equality relates to the ground of divorce?—It is the principle of the ground of divorce we mean by that. We have to take the incidents attaching to it as they come along, I suppose.

34,834. Has your association reached the conclusions that are expressed in the resolution merely on general principles of equality, or have they considered whether these principles would lead to an improvement in the moral standard of man?—They have certainly considered that point of view.

34,835. What conclusions have been expressed about that?—They have considered that the establishment of laws which shall require an equal moral standard from man and woman in marriage will lay the foundations of such a much better view of the marriage tie as entirely to improve the whole ethical and social condition. They believe that there will be a better recognition of mutual obligations as between man and woman if they enter into this contract on an equal footing.

34,836. There is another matter which is not mentioned in your short memorandum, and that is whether there has been any consideration given to the question of the grounds of divorce. I am not speaking of equality, but the grounds upon which the decree should be obtained?—That has been considered. In almost all our resolutions they have asked that divorce shall be granted both to men and women on the ground of unfaithfulness alone.

34,837. Have you any resolution on that?—Yes. In 1910, "This Council approves the Marriage Law Amendment Bill now before Parliament, and as far as it would provide, that the law of divorce should be amended so as to entitle either party to a divorce on the grounds of unfaithfulness alone."

34,838. Are they against the view of extension to the cases that meet desertion or insanity?—I do not understand your question.

34,839. May I see the form of the resolution, because it might be an ambiguous matter? That might alone relate to the conditions of equality. I think that resolution is directed to equality?—Yes.

34,840. That is to say adultery, whether by the man or by the woman, should be a ground of divorce without bringing in, in the case of the woman, some other added cause so as to place them on a footing of inequality?—I thought that was the question.

34,841. No, it is a question that has not been dealt with in the memorandum, whether the federation has considered the addition to the ground of adultery of any other cases which would apply equally to both sexes, for instance, insanity?—Yes, it has considered those points, and it would ask that any laws which decided what should be regarded as a ground of divorce for men should be equally a ground of divorce for women; but we have not decided ——

34,842. What should be the ground?—No.

34,843. That is the point. Your point is whatever law permitting of divorce exists it should be equal to the sexes?—Yes.

34,844. The actual grounds have not been the subject of consideration?—Not all the various grounds. They have been considered and discussed, but they have never been formulated in a resolution. We take our stand that there should be an equality of treatment.

34,845. You cannot express any views as to the extension of the grounds of divorce?—No.

34,846. (Earl of Derby.) I did not quite make out whether you are prepared to say, if there are terms of equality, that a woman should give security for the costs of both sides?—She would be required to, I take it.

34,847. You agree to that as being part of the terms of equality?—Certainly.

34,848. Are you prepared to see any alteration in regard to giving greater facilities for divorce by changing the trial ground from London to the Provinces?—That we have not considered. I am not here to advocate greater facilities from the point of view of greater facilities, and we have not considered it in detail. It has only been mentioned incidentally, the question of transferring from London to the Provinces.

34,849. You are agreed that there should be equality for men and women, whatever the causes of divorce are, and wherever the case is tried?—Yes, we consider it only justice to the woman, and that it would have a beneficial effect on the community.

34,850. (Lady Frances Balfour.) You have considered it very much from the point of view of the children when you discussed this question of the divorce laws?—Certainly, naturally. The children come very much into the whole consideration.

34,851. You feel that it would benefit them if the law was made equal?—We think it would benefit the children. It would benefit the health of the whole race, and the present position as to legal cruelty having to be proved cannot be said to benefit the children, although it may to a certain extent keep a so-called home together.

34,852. I suppose the federation when this Commission reports will probably consider the report and have resolutions upon it as a whole?—Certainly; that is part of carrying out our duty under that object, that we try to secure just legislation for women and children, so that every time anything of that kind comes up we have to consider it.

34,853. Any legislation?—Or proposed legislation or any question of a Royal Commission. Directly there is one on anything affecting woman we write and say, "Can we have women sitting on that Commission?" and "Can women appear as witnesses before that Royal Commission?"

34,854. (Chairman.) Was it not your association that communicated with the Secretary with a view to having a representative to give evidence?—Yes.

(Chairman.) Thank you very much for your valuable assistance.

Miss MARY ADELAIDE BROADHURST called and examined.

34,855. (Chairman.) You have supplied us with a précis of the evidence you propose to give. Is that given on behalf of the Political Reform League?—Yes.

34,856. Did they write to the Secretary with a view to having a representative, and do you come as such?—Yes.

34,857. Will you tell us about the constitution of the league?—It is a new body and has only been in existence since February of this year. It represents already about 400 members, both men and women, and it is in process of constitution now. I was instructed by the present executive, who approved of my evidence.

34,858. Is it purely political or does it embrace social objects?—It is political, but it also embraces social objects.

34,859. Amongst them the question of women's position?—All the questions affecting women. I will not say that it is confined to women—certainly questions affecting the social and political conditions.

34,860. If you have your paper before you, it might shorten matters if you would kindly read it, and we can ask you any questions that occur to us?—I wish to take the attitude that there should be equal treatment of both sexes in the matter.

34,861. Is that the view taken by the whole league?—Yes. The present law does not give them such equality. We consider that simple adultery should be equally a ground for divorce in both sexes, and from the point of view of society we find that the husband may commit adultery with a woman who is previously chaste, or it may be with a common prostitute, and in both cases the argument is that consideration would have to be paid to the moral deterioration in the woman. The moral deterioration in the woman is great; she is in both cases degraded, and a man, we argue, cannot so degrade a woman without degrading his own moral nature.

34,862. You are now speaking of the woman with whom he has committed a wrongful act?—Yes, and by so doing he degrades his own nature. When he states that the woman is down, and therefore he has a right to degrade her further, we argue that he is still more morally degrading himself in that he is, as it were, kicking a woman who is down further to spiritual and physical destruction. The general apathy that prevails with regard to the awful degradation of these women we consider is a mark of the moral degradation produced in the race as a result of continued action of that kind. Then, from the point of view of the wife, the wife is by the present law practically required to condone an act of adultery on the part of the husband unless it is accompanied by some further action. We say that as she is naturally the closest guardian of the well-being of the race, acts of adultery on the part of the husband not only injure herself, but through her the race, and that she therefore ought to be able to have protection, and we argue that the race is injured morally because there is moral deterioration on the part of the husband. That must affect the child, both directly, since an immoral father cannot be a good parent, and also indirectly on the race, because any lowering of vitality in the health of the children means that they have less resisting power, morally as well as physically. Finally, we argue that excess in adultery, which practically the wife has to condone, under present conditions, has most dire results. It leads to great mortality amongst children, sterility, and if not that, it lowers the vitality of the children and so renders their resistance to disease less. The woman is affected with terrible results to her, and there are direct hereditary effects on her children of a very terrible kind—in fact, the general opinion amongst medical men is that the effect of excess in matters of this kind is one of the most terrible evils that at present the race is undergoing. The woman is exposed to a disease which is constitutional from the very outset, a disease that may never be curable, and which has the direst hereditary results; and we feel that a man who is responsible for bringing children into the world should not have the power to injure his wife and her children without giving to that wife some protection. The wife should be protected. We are very strong on this. The woman in cases like this is kept in ignorance of much that she ought to know, and much that is vitally interesting to her, and through her to the race. In fact, we consider that there is what amounts to a conspiracy of silence on these matters amongst men, and not only amongst ordinary men but amongst doctors, and doctors ought to have the well-being of the race at heart. In our opinion, giving the woman protection against this is the most vital and far-reaching of any reasons for an alteration in the law. It has been argued if a husband gives his wife a disease it can be called cruelty, and she may get her divorce, and a case has been decided in which she did so get her divorce; but we argue that to convict of cruelty after these terrible results have come is absolutely illogical. A woman should have protection against such a cruel act of this kind, which is argued by the judges as being cruelty. To call it cruelty is equivalent to locking the stable door after the horse is gone.

34,863. You are aware that they can get protection by obtaining a decree of judicial separation?—Yes.

34,864. Is the view you express that this is adequate?—No, it is inadequate. We think a woman should not be sacrificed so far as to be unable to free herself wholly from conditions that are bad for her and her children.

34,865. What you have said covers all the points of your proof until we come to the paragraph which begins "As it stands at present." Will you take it up from there?—"As it stands at present the law condones and thereby encourages vice in men, married or unmarried. It elevates a false standard of morality for husband and bachelor alike. It practically ignores the awful consequences, physical and moral, of adultery on a man, and makes it an offence so trivial that it is the duty of woman to tolerate it. It thus removes from the sum of the conditions which determine vice one of its strongest deterrents," and to argue that man should yield to his nature in this way is to practically give an argument for so yielding. When a standard is erected by public opinion and in Parliament, the erection of such a standard tends to weaken the nature of any but the strongest man; whereas, if another standard were there, and if the man were treated as he deserves to be, that would be something which would tend to deter him from an immoral life.

34,866. You regard the double standard as a bad thing?—A bad thing absolutely.

34,867. I take it from what you have been saying that, if there was equality, it would tend to raise the general standard of morality in the country?—In a most remarkable way; in fact, I do not think there is anything more far-reaching than this. It goes to the root of almost everything.

34,868. The next part of your proof deals with condonation?—Yes. "Also to condone an occasional act of adultery is not only to ignore that moral and physical disaster of the greatest kind may result from even one act, but it would make the Act of Parliament in which it was embodied of practically no effect, it would simply mean permission to commit adultery, provided it was not committed too often."

34,869. Is there any other point to which you desire to call attention, because I have gone through the whole of your memorandum?—I think those are the chief points.

34,870. There is nothing in it about the question of whether there should be any additional grounds of divorce. If that has not been considered, I do not want to trouble you with it?—We have considered other matters, but I think we feel if the law gives equality on the grounds of simple adultery, it would cover what we consider to be the greatest demand.

34,871. Have the other matters had resolutions upon them?—No, they have been considered informally; we have not had time to present resolutions.

34,872. Therefore you could not represent them upon it?—No.

34,873. (Earl of Derby.) You keep saying "we." You represent 400 people?—Yes.

34,874. Has there been a resolution passed by your people?—No; our league is new, we are in process of organising, and it was left entirely to the executive.

34,875. Will you read any resolution by the executive authorising you to make these statements?—I have no resolution; it was discussed, and the evidence was read and passed.

34,876. As a matter of fact, there is no resolution authorising you to make these statements?—No.

34,877. You put these views before the executive and you understand that they met with their acceptance?—Exactly.

34,878. There is no resolution?—There is no resolution.

34,879. There is no authority really except that?—Exactly.

34,880. There are one or two things that seem to me to be contradictory. You say in A. (a): "Also he probably gives the woman an impulse of wrong from which she can never recover," and (b) "if it is urged that the unfortunate woman is already irrecoverable, we reply that in most cases it is not so"?—(a) and (b) refer to different classes of women.

34,881. In one class it is a wrong from which she can never recover. Then she sinks to the other class in which, you say, in most cases she is recoverable?—I mean where a woman is innocent she would never recover the status that she had had before, but in the case of a girl who has not become vicious she may so far be reclaimed.

34,882. You would regard a woman who had committed adultery as still innocent in class (a)?—No; if the man causes her to commit adultery she would never have the same status again.

34,883. You spoke of an innocent woman?—An innocent woman at first, I meant.

34,884. On page 2 you speak of a terrible disease being produced which, through the wife, is transmitted to the children. Is it not rather sweeping to say in every case or in most cases?—Most cases certainly not. I thiuk medical evidence entirely bears it out.

34,885. In most cases even of what you speak of at the end an occasional act of adultery that produces a terrible disease which is transmitted to the children?—It might.

34,886. Can you produce medical evidence to prove that?—I do know of one specific case.

34,887. That would hardly do for such a general statement?—I should refer you to the books, for instance, Bangs and Hardaway. It is shown the conditions might be such that the man would transmit the disease.

34,888. Are you prepared to say, in the majority of cases, what you would call an occasional act of adultery represents this terrible scourge to the children?—I said that an occasional act might, therefore the woman ought to be able to protect herself.

34,889. Are you not aware that she is able to protect herself at present by divorce?—She is not able to protect herself at present against simple adultery.

34,890. She is able to protect herself by getting divorce where that adultery is accompanied by the transmitting to her of disease?—After the disease is transmitted, and if she also proves the husband wilfully did it.

34,891. Will putting women on terms of equality prevent the same disease being given?—It will give her the power, the moment she becomes aware her husband has committed adultery, to take steps if she wishes to.

34,892. That is before she gets a disease—in fear that she may get one?—Yes.

34,893. (Sir Frederick Treves.) I am sure you do not wish to over-state your case; but speaking of acts of adultery, are you justified in leaving the impression that the direct result is injurious to the vitality of children?—Of excess.

34,894. That is proved, is it?—I think so.

34,895. Can you give any authority for that?—As to that being the result of excessive acts?

34,896. Yes?—I think it is on the authority of most of the newer books on the matter, even the text books. Bangs and Hardaway is the one I have recently got.

34,897. You cannot give the quotation from it?—No.

34,898. You also give rise, as Lord Derby has said, to the impression that all these acts of adultery must be associated with a terrible disease which through the wife is transmitted to the children?—I do not wish to give the impression of "must be." I think common sense will show that is not the case, but that it may be, and my argument is that the wife should be able to protect herself.

34,899. Also to avoid exaggeration, you speak of this malady as being constitutional from the beginning, and as being incurable?—I beg your pardon, "which may not even be curable" are my words.

34,900. And which is inherited?—Yes.

34,901. Surely it may be curable?—The consensus of opinion, I believe, is that in a virulent case it is not curable wholly, and that it may break out at any time in after life. No doctor seems to be able to predict that it will not.

34,902. Have you any evidence of that?—I have not brought the statement.

34,903. You cannot quote any authority?—I will not quote direct words, but, as I said, it is in text books.

34,904. Have you read it?—Yes.

34,905. Can you tell me the work?—Yes, Bangs and Hardaway.

34,906. You have read no specific work on this matter?—This is a specific work.

34,907. You have not read the treatment of syphilis in the Army, for example?—No. I have the effects of syphilis in ordinary cases.

34,908. Would you like it put in print that it is incurable?—No, that it may not be curable, and therefore the woman should not be obliged to take the risk. That is my point.

34,909. And is inherited and transmitted?—Yes.

34,910. Always?—No, not always, but it may be transmitted, and when it is it has very dire results.

34,911. That, of course, is a matter of opinion?—I think the consensus of opinion is with me in that matter.

34,912. I still again ask you if you can give any written or printed statements in support of that?—There is a statement here. I could have got plenty. "Practitioners should never lose an opportunity to impress upon the mind of the patient the undoubted fact, as supported by clinical observation and laboratory investigation, that gonorrhœa is one of the most severe, and perhaps the most far-reaching in its results, of all the infectious diseases." That is a quotation from this book.

34,913. Now you are going from one disease to another?—I have not mentioned either disease. The two are syphilis and gonorrhœa. I do not mind which you take.

34,914. You put them on the same basis?—I believe, in different ways, they both have very dire results.

34,915. You would not speak of gonorrhœa as a disease capable of being handed down to children?—Yes.

34,916. Have you any authority for that?—Yes. I have not made a quotation with regard to that.

34,917. Can you produce any sentence from any medical book published within the last 30 years to show that gonorrhœa can be inherited?—Here is a statement: "Subtract the evil effects of gonorrhœa "from list of human ills and the resulting increase of "longevity and happiness of the race would be some-"thing marvellous."

34,918. That does not answer the question. Can you show by reference to any work published in the last 30 years that there is a case on record of gonorrhœa having been inherited?—I have not a quotation, but I will take syphilis if you like.

34,919. We must not go from one to the other. You said gonorrhœa just now?—I said I have not mentioned in my evidence either disease. The quotation I gave you was of gonorrhœa, but my statement applies to either disease.

34,920. In that case it involves the assertion that gonorrhœa is capable of being inherited?—It does not involve the assertion that gonorrhœa is capable; it involves the assertion that there is a disease which is capable.

34,921. You said just now gonorrhœa was, quite distinctly?—If that implies it.

34,922. From what source is that?—Lydston.

34,923. It is very desirable in a case of this sort not to over-state the case?—Yes; but I do not think I have overstated it.

34,924. The statement comes to this, that acts of adultery in excess have a direct result on the vitality of children, that syphilis or the disease you speak of is constitutional from the onset, and that it is incurable?—That it may not be curable.

34,925. That it may not be curable and is inheritable?—Yes.

34,926. Further than that, you also state that gonorrhœa is capable of being inherited?—I have not stated that. I do not know whether gonorrhœa is. Syphilis certainly is, and in my statement I have not differentiated between the two.

34,927. Perhaps it would be advantageous if you did?—I do not think it matters to my statement if there is one disease which does.

34,928. An ordinary layman reading your report would carry away the impression that adultery, which no one wishes to defend, would lead to these terrific results?—Might lead.

34,929. You do not put that in, because you said acts of adultery have a direct result on the vitality of children. I am reading from your proof?—Yes, it has such effects. I stand by every word I have said.

34,930. You have not brought forward any medical book?—I have referred to this one, in which you can find corroboration for every word I have said.

34,931. (Mr. Spender.) In regard to your last paragraph, you say, "Also to condone an occasional act "of adultery, is not only to ignore that moral and "physical disaster of the greatest kind may result "from even one act, but it would make the Act of "Parliament in which it was embodied of practically "no effect, it would simply mean permission to commit "adultery provided it was not committed too often," you do not mean that as a broad and sweeping statement applying to the conduct of every wife and husband?—No.

34,932. (Chairman.) I have examined you upon a proof which has the same page twice. Have you covered all you said? Will you read page 2 and say if you have said all you should have said?—I did not say anything about the fact that the law of divorce does not act by compulsion.

34,933. We may take it that is fairly obvious; it is at the request of the partner who complains?—I think that was covered by the question, that it is not necessary that any case need be acted upon.

34,934. You are not in the medical profession yourself?—I am not. I have gone through a scientific training.

34,935. Your evidence is presented on broad social considerations?—Yes.

34,936. Who is the head of your organisation?—At present I am the head of it.

34,937. Are there any names that are known publicly to us associated with it? It is only to get the general character of it?—Yes; there are prominent men, such as Sir Benjamin Johnson and Sir Rupert Boyce, and men of that kind, and others of the leading men in Liverpool.

34,938. Are the number you mention all men, or partly men and women?—Men and women.

34,939. About equally divided?—Yes.

(Chairman.) We thank you very much for your evidence.

Adjourned.

Winchester House, St. James's Square, London, S.W.

THIRTY-EIGHTH DAY.

Tuesday, 1st November 1910.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HON. LORD GORELL (Chairman).

His Grace the LORD ARCHBISHOP OF YORK.
The Right Hon. the EARL OF DERBY, G.C.V.O., C.B.
The LADY FRANCES BALFOUR.
The Right Hon. THOMAS BURT, M.P.
The Hon. LORD GUTHRIE.
Sir FREDERICK TREVES, Bart., G.C.V.O., C.B., LL.D., F.R.C.S.
Sir LEWIS T. DIBDIN, D.C.L.
Sir GEORGE WHITE, M.P.
His Honour JUDGE TINDAL ATKINSON.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.
EDGAR BRIERLEY, Esq.
J. A. SPENDER, Esq.

The Hon. HENRY GORELL BARNES, Secretary.

Sir LEWIS T. DIBDIN, D.C.L., called and examined.

34,940. (Chairman.) Sir Lewis Dibdin, you have been good enough to prepare some notes on the history and otherwise in connection with the Reformatio Legum, which dates from the Reformation days, and copies of that have been supplied to the Commissioners. I think it is probably advisable that you should put it in formally, and I would venture to ask you to do so?—If you please, Lord Gorell. May I say that these notes are directed to four matters. First, the facts as to the Reformatio Legum and Lord Northampton's divorce case. The Reformatio Legum has been largely referred to here, but it seemed to me that the facts were not completely before the Commission. The second point is the real authorship of the Reformatio Legum. The third point is the opinions of Divines of the later 16th and early 17th centuries with regard to divorce; and the fourth point is the law and practice of the Church of England as to divorce, at and subsequent to the Reformation.

34,941. And the Memorandum deals with all those four points?—Yes, my Lord; there are one or two misprints that want correction, which I daresay I shall be allowed to correct.

34,942. Certainly?—I have made inquiries in various quarters to get information, and since I have sent this in letters keep on coming in, and it may possibly be that I should like to add some facts. Perhaps the Commission would allow me to do that should the necessity arise.

(Chairman.) Certainly. I would like to say this. I have had the privilege of reading that Memorandum, and I think it is a Memorandum showing immense research and great learning, and ought to prove of great value to us. I personally feel, and I hope I express the views of the Commissioners, very indebted to you for the trouble you have taken in preparing it, and for the assistance we shall derive from it.

(Witness.) Thank you, my Lord.

Notes on the Reformatio Legum and its Relation to the Law and Practice of the Church of England as to Divorce.

I. The history of the Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum begins with the statute 25 Hen. VIII. ch. 19 (Restraint of Appeals), which recites that—

> "whereas divers constitutions ordinances and canons provincial or synodal which heretofore have been enacted and be thought not only to be much prejudicial to the King's prerogative royal and repugnant to the laws and statutes of this realm but also overmuch onerous to his Highness and his subjects; the s[d] clergy hath most humbly besought the King's Highness that the s[d] constitutions and canons may be committed to the examination and judgment of his Highness and of two and thirty persons of the King's subjects, whereof sixteen to be of the Upper and Nether House of the Temporalty, and the other sixteen to be of the clergy of this realm; and all the said two and thirty persons to be chosen and appointed by the King's Majesty; and that such of the s[d] constitutions and canons as shall be thought and determined by the s[d] two and thirty persons or the more part of them worthy to be abrogated and annulled shall be abolite and made of no value accordingly; and such other of the same constitutions and canons as by the s[d] two and thirty or the more part of them shall be approved to stand with the laws of God and consonant to the laws of this realm shall stand in their full strength and power, the King's most royal assent first had and obtained to the same."

II. By the 2[d] section it was enacted—

"And forasmuch as such canons constitutions and ordinances as heretofore have been made by the clergy of this realm cannot now at the session of this present parliament by reason of shortness of time be viewed examined and determined by the King's Highness and thirty two persons to be chosen and appointed according to the petition of the s[d] clergy in form before rehearsed: be it therefore enacted by authority aforesaid that the King's Highness shall have power and authority to nominate and assign at his pleasure the said two and thirty persons of his subjects whereof sixteen to be of the clergy and sixteen to be of the temporalty or the Upper and Nether House of the Parliament; and if any of the said two and thirty persons so chosen shall happen to die before their full determination then his Highness to nominate other from time to time of the s[d] two Houses of the Parliament to supply the number of the said two and thirty; and that the same two and thirty by his Highness so to be named shall have power and authority to view search and examine the s[d] canons constitutions and ordinances provincial and synodal heretofore made and such of them as the King's Highness and the s[d] two and thirty or the more part of them shall deem and adjudge worthy to be continued kept and obeyed shall be thenceforth kept obeyed and executed within this realm so that the King's most royal assent under his great seal be first had to the same; and the residue of the said canons constitutions and ordinances provincial which the King's Highness and the said two and thirty persons or the more part of them shall not approve or deem and judge worthy to be abolite abrogate and made frustrate shall from thenceforth be void and of none effect and never be put in execution within this realm."

III. This Act received the Royal Assent on March 30, 1534.* The 32 commissioners were not in fact appointed under this Act, and in 1535–6 the Act 27 Hen. VIII. ch. 15 was passed, which, after stating that "forasmuch as the King's Highness hath not "named and assigned the s[d] 32 persons since the "making of the s[d] Act" (i.e., 25 Hen. VIII. ch. 19) authorised the King to do so "as well before as after "the dissolution of this present Parliament," and empowered the 32 commissioners when nominated to act "at all times from henceforth for the term of three "years next after the dissolution of this Parliament." This Parliament was dissolved April 4, 1536. Still the commissioners were not appointed. In 1543–4 the Act 35 Hen. VIII. ch. 16 was passed. After reciting 27 Hen. VIII. ch. 15 this statute continued—

"since the making of which Act divers urgent and great causes and matters have occurred and happened whereby the s[d] nomination and appointment of the s[d] 32 persons by the King's Highness have been omitted whereby the s[d] search view and examination of the s[d] canons constitutions ordinances provincial and synodal have not been had nor made according to the tenor purport and effect of the same Act."

IV. A fresh power was then conferred on the King to appoint 32 commissioners as in the former Acts, but with two important extensions. First, Henry VIII. was empowered to act in the matter at any time during his life, with no limitation to a period of three years, or to the duration of the existing Parliament. Secondly, the scope of the work of the 32 commissioners, which had hitherto been confined to the collection and revision of existing canons, was now enlarged so as to include the framing of new ecclesiastical laws. The reference to the 32 commissioners is stated thus:—
"to peruse oversee and examine all manner of canons "constitutions ordinances provincial & synodal and "further to set in order & establish all such laws "ecclesiastical as shall be thought by the King's "Majesty and them convenient to be used and set "forth within his realm and dominions in all spiritual "courts and conventions."

V. There is no evidence extant in the Public Record Office of a commission having been actually appointed under 35 Hen. VIII. ch. 16.

VI. Burnet (Hist. Reformation, Pt. II., Bk. I., p. 196, ed. 1681), Strype (Memls. Cranmer, Bk. I., chap. XXX., p. 295, ed. E.H.S.), Reeves (Hist. of English Law, Finlason's ed., vol. III., p. 495), Collier (Ecc. Hist., vol. V., p. 141), and Cardwell (D.A., vol. I., p. 107*n*), all state that a commission was issued under that Act. Their opinion seems to be based on a letter written by Cranmer to Henry VIII., dated January 24, 1546 (Burnet, Hist. Ref., Pt. II., Bk. I., Coll. Rec., No. 61), in which he states that he had sent for Heath, Bp. of Worcester, and had "declared unto him all your "Majesty's pleasure in such things as your Majesty "willed me to be done. And first where your Majesty's "pleasure was to have the names of such persons as "your Highness, in times past, appointed to make "Laws Ecclesiastical for your Grace's Realm. The "Bishop of Worcester promised me with all speed to "inquire out their names and the Book which they "made and to bring the names and also the Book unto "your Majesty, which I trust he hath done before this "time."

VII. Foxe (1517–87), the martyrologist, in his preface to the first printed edition of the Reformatio Legum (1571) also states that Henry VIII. appointed commissioners and that they actually performed their task at least to some extent. ". . . Quocirca cum ex "ipsius tum ex publico senatus decreto delecti sunt viri "aliquot, usu et doctrina præstantes numero triginta duo "qui penitus abolendo pontificio juri (quod canonicum "vocamus) cum omni illa decretorum et decretalium "facultate, novas ipsi leges, qua controversiarum et "morum judicia regerent, regis nomine et authoritate "surrogarent. Id quod ex ipsius regis epistola quam "hunc præfiximus libro, constare poterit, qua et "serium ipsius in hac re studium et piam voluntatem "aperiat. Laudandum profecto regis propositum nec "illaudandi fortassis eorum conatus qui leges tum "illas licet his longe dissimiles conscripserant." (Cardwell's edition of Reformatio Legum, 1850, p. xxiv.) The title of Foxe's edition (and of the subsequent reprints in 1640 and 1641) testifies to the same fact though it does not specifically mention the commission—"Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum ex "authoritate primum Regis Henrici 8, inchoata: "Deinde per Regem Edwardum 6 provecta adauctaque "in hunc modum atque nunc ad pleniorem ipsarum "reformationem in lucem ædita."

VIII. Strype (Memls. Cranmer, Bk. I., chap. XXX., p. 294, &c., ed. E.H.S.) gives a circumstantial account (partly founded on Cranmer's letter already quoted) of Cranmer's appeal to Henry VIII. in 1545–6, to ratify the draft of the new ecclesiastical laws then described as complete, and Strype mentions the draft letter which had been drawn up for the king's signature in order to give official sanction to the new code. This letter, which Henry never signed, is prefixed to all four of the printed editions of the Reformatio Legum. No further step is known to have been taken in Henry VIII.'s reign. Strype (Mem. Cranmer, Bk. I., chap. XXX., p. 296) writes: "But whatsoever the "matter was, whether it was the king's other business, "or the secret oppositions of Bishop Gardiner and the "papists, this letter was not signed by the king." Collier (Ecc. Hist., Vol. V., p. 141) writes: 'But it

* Throughout this memorandum years are reckoned as beginning on the 1st January.

" seems his Highness [Henry VIII.] received advice " from the Bishop of Winchester that in case the king " proceeded to any innovation of this kind the league " now concerting with the emperor would miscarry. " And thus it is probable, for reasons of State, the " king refused the signing of the instrument."

IX. Burnet (Hist. Ref., Pt. I., Bk. III., p. 330), after stating Cranmer's anxiety to procure an authorised revision of the Canon Law, writes: "But it was found " more for the greatness of the Prerogative and the " authority of the Civil Courts to keep that undeter- " mined; so he could never obtain his desire during " this king's reign." Foxe, in his preface quoted above, writes—yet somehow or other at every turn the project failed to succeed, perhaps owing to the troublous times, perhaps to the lack of perseverance of those to whom the business was then entrusted. " Sed nescio " quo modo quaque occasione res successu caruit, sive " temporum iniquitate, sive nimia eorum cessatione " quibus tunc negotium committebatur."

X. There appears to be no means of ascertaining how far the code prepared in Henry VIII.'s reign differed from the Reformatio Legum as it was formulated in Edward VI.'s reign, and as we have it to-day. The only contemporary MS. is of the " Reformatio " in its second or Edwardian stage. It may, however, be safely assumed that Foxe was right in saying, as he does in the preface already quoted, that the code as it was compiled in Henry's time was " far different " from the " Reformatio " of the next reign.

XI. The latter contains many express references to statutes and books of Edward's time. (See Cardwell's Reformatio Legum, Preface, p. vii, note c.) It is also to be noted that the doctrinal statements in the " Reformatio," though exactly what we should expect in the later years of Edward's reign, are difficult to conceive as having been proposed to Henry VIII. for approval in or about 1545–6, so near the time of the Six Articles and the publication of the " King's Book." Compare, for example, the view of Sacraments generally, and the Sacrament of the Altar in particular, in the Reformatio (De Sacramentis, caps. 2 and 4, p. 30–31, Cardwell's ed.) and in the " King's Book " (" Formularies of Faith," pages 262, 269, 293).

XII. Henry VIII. died on the 28th January 1547, and with him passed away the power to revise the Canon Law created by 35 Hen. VIII. ch. 16. It will be remembered that the authority to appoint commissioners for that purpose was conferred on Henry VIII. personally, though made exerciseable by him at any time during his life. Early in Edward VI.'s reign the matter was again exciting attention. Convocation met in 1547 and the Lower House of Canterbury presented a petition to the archbishop asking that in accordance with the statute 25 Hen. VIII. ch. 19 the long deferred commission of 32 persons should be constituted so that the Church might no longer remain without definite laws (Gairdner's Hist. Ch. of England, Henry VIII., p. 251),

XIII. The further progress of the scheme, however, seems to have been brought about rather by the House of Commons than by the bishops and other clergy. On November 14, 1549, all the bishops joined in a complaint to the House of Lords that owing to the recent changes which had practically abolished the spiritual jurisdiction of the Church Courts (1 Ed. VI. ch. 2), vice and disorder were rampant and could not be repressed. The Lords at first desired the bishops to frame a Bill, which, however, when it was produced, was considered as giving too much power to the hierarchy, and a large committee of bishops, lay peers, judges, and law officers was appointed to draw up another Bill. This they did, and the Lords passed the Bill, but the Commons, after a second reading, " laid it aside," and, as a substitute, revived the scheme for the revision of the Canon Law by a commission of 32 (Hansard, vol. 1, p. 591). Their Bill for this purpose was finally read a third time in the Lords on January 31, 1550, Archbishop Cranmer and several of the bishops dissenting (Journal of H. of Lords, Vol. 1, p. 387). We do not know the ground of this opposition. Collier (History, V., 372) thinks one reason may have been that the Bill did not require the appointment on the Commission of more than four bishops. It would seem more probable that Cranmer and the bishops desired to mark their sense of the inadequacy of the step taken to cope with the evils of which they had complained. At any rate it is important to notice that the reappearance of the commission of 32 was not due to their initiative but to that of the Commons, and that it was actually opposed by Archbishop Cranmer.

XIV. The Bill received the Royal Assent on February 1, 1550, and became the statute 3 & 4 Edw. VI. ch. 11. After reciting that—it was enacted—

> "Albeit the King's most excellent Majesty Governor and Ruler under God of this Realm ought most justly to have the government of his subjects and the determination of the causes as well ecclesiastical as temporal; yet the same as concerning ecclesiastical causes having not of long time been put in ure nor exercised by reason of the usurped authority of the Bishops of Rome, be not perfectly understood nor known of his subjects and therefore of necessity as well for the abolishing and putting in utter oblivion of the s[d] usurped authority as for the necessary administration of justice to his loving subjects,"—

> "That the King's Majesty shall from henceforth during three years have full power authority and liberty to nominate and assign by the advice of his Majesty's Council sixteen persons of the Clergy whereof four to be Bishops and sixteen persons of the Temporalty whereof four to be learned in the common laws of this Realm to peruse and examine the ecclesiastical laws of long time here used and to gather order and compile such laws ecclesiastical as shall be thought by his Majesty his s[d] Council and them or the more part of them convenient to be used practised and set forth within this his realm and other his dominions in all and particular ecclesiastical courts and conventions."

XV. It was also enacted that the revised and new laws were to be promulgated by Letters Patent, and were not to be contrary to statute or common law. This statute was passed early in 1550, but in accordance with the then practice it would date from the first day of that session, namely, the 4th November 1549, and the three years' period for the exercise of its powers must therefore be measured from this date, and would expire on the 4th November 1552.

XVI. It appears from the Minute of a Privy Council held at Hampton Court on the 6th October 1551 (Acts of the Privy Council, 1550–52, p. 382), that the Lord Chancellor was directed to " make out the King's " letters of commission to the xxxii persons hereunder " written authorising them to assemble together and " resolve upon the reformation of the Canon Laws " as by the minute of the s[d] letter at better length " appeareth.

XVII. It is stated in Foxe's preface (already quoted) to the 1571 edition of the "Reformatio" that the commission was actually appointed, and that a plan of procedure was followed by which the whole body divided into four committees of eight, each consisting of two bishops, two divines, two civilians, and two lawyers, and arranged that "what each committee put into shape" should be passed on to the other committees for consideration." (See also Strype's Memls. Cranmer, Book II., chap. 26. p. 361, Ed. E. H. S.)

XVIII. There appears to be no evidence amongst the Public Records that the commission actually issued, and the terms of the subsequent Letters Patent of the 11th November 1551 suggest a doubt whether the commission of 32 had at that date been already constituted. (Cardwell's edition of the Reformatio Legum, Pref. vii., note d.) On the other hand, Mr. Gairdner (Hist. Ch. England, p. 300) states that the whole 32 commissioners were really appointed on the 6th October 1552 (this must be a mistake for 1551).

XIX. On the Patent Rolls for the regnal year 5 Edw. VI. there is a commission dated the 4th November 1551, and addressed to Cranmer, Ridley, Cox, Peter Martyr, Taylor (of Hadley), Traheron, Lucas, and Gosnold. It directed them to prepare and reduce to writing a draft code of reformed ecclesiastical laws in order that it might subsequently receive the final revision and ratification of the whole body of 32 of which the eight were members. According to Strype (Memorials, Book II., chap. VIII., p. 303), who mentions this commission on the authority of "Warrant Book," it was dated the 22nd October 1851.

XX. On the 11th November 1551 another commission of eight, chosen from the whole body of 32, was issued. This commission was substantially in the same terms as that of the 4th November, which it superseded.

XXI. It appears from the Minute of a Privy Council held at Westminster on the 9th November 1551 (Acts of the Privy Council, 1550–52, p. 410) that the Lord Chancellor was directed "to make out a new Commission to these viii persons here under named for "the first drawing and ordering of the Canon Laws, "for that some of those other that were before "appointed by the King's Majesty [i.e., by the Commission of November 4, 1551] are now by his Highness "thought meet to be left out and the Commission "made to these following—The Abp. of Canterbury, "B^p^ of Ely (Goodrich), D^r^ Cox, Peter Martyr, D^r^ "Taylor of Hadley, D^r^ May, J. Lucas, R. Goodrick."

XXII. It will be observed that the Bishop of Ely, Dr. May, and Mr. Goodrick were substituted for the Bishop of London (Ridley), Mr. Traheron, and Mr. Gosnold. A copy of this commission is prefixed to all the printed editions of the Reformatio Legum, and is dated the 11th November 1551. The commission is extant on the Patent Rolls for 5 Edw. VI. under date 11th November 1551.

XXIII. As to these eight commissioners, selected it would seem with critical care, was specially committed the task of preparing the Reformatio Legum, it is material to note who they were. Archbishop Cranmer at this time was much under the influence of the foreign Protestants, of whom Peter Martyr (himself one of the eight), Martin Bucer, and Henry Bullinger were typical representatives and leaders. Although not one of the eight, a distinguished member of the commission of 32 was John a Lasco, a Polish nobleman and refugee who was appointed first pastor of the church in St. Austin's Friars and of the Dutch congregation in London, to which the King gave the Church for worship. A Lasco was on intimate terms of friendship with the dominant party in Edward VI.'s reign (see Strype's Memorials, Vol. II., Part I., p. 375, &c.). Of the rest Richard Cox (described as a great harbourer of foreign divines)*, Roland Taylor of Hadley, and William May, Dean of St. Paul's, belonged to the same party. Thomas Goodrich, Bishop of Ely, appears to have opposed the others and to have been overborne (see infra).* R. Goodrich, a nephew of the Bishop of Ely, and J. Lucas, a Master of Requests, were lawyers presumably required to look after the technical matters (such as procedure and pleadings) with which the Reformatio Legum largely deals.

XXIV. It appears from a minute of a Privy Council held at Westminster on the 2nd February 1552 (Acts of the Privy Council, 1550–52, p. 471) that the Lord Chancellor was on that day directed "to make out a "Commission to the Abp. of Canterbury and other "Bishops, learned men, civilians and lawyers of the "realm for the establishment of the ecclesiastical laws "according to the Act of Parliament made last Sessions."

XXV. This commission is extant on the Patent Rolls for 6 Edw. VI., and is dated the 12th February 1552. The names of the 32 commissioners are—

XXVI. It will be noted that these names are the same as those (given above) in the intended commission of October 6, 1551, except that Bishop Latimer, Sir Thomas Smith, and Skinner are omitted, and Wotton, W. Cooke, and R. Reade are substituted. Edward VI.'s Journal (Burnet's Hist. Ref., Part II., Book II., Coll. Records, p. 46, ed. 1680) under date February 10, 1552, records "Commission was granted out to 32 "persons to examine, correct and set forth the "Ecclesiastical Laws." The names of 31 persons only follow. These are the same as those (given above) in the Commission of February 12, 1552, on the Patent Rolls, except that Wotton, Lyell, and Brooke are omitted in the King's Journal, and Skinner and Gawdy are added.

XXVII. There seems to be no satisfactory evidence as to what in fact happened after these commissions had been issued. Foxe, in his preface to the 1571 edition of the "Reformatio," seems to say that the work was done and completed by the whole body of 32 sitting in sub-committees in the manner already described. Strype (Life of Parker, Bk. IV., ch. 5, p. 323, folio ed.), after referring to the commissions, writes: "The work "was closely plied and finished by the foresaid learned "and excellent men under King Edward and put into "very elegant Latin by the pens of Dr. Haddon and "Sir John Cheke."‡ Burnet (Hist. Ref., Part II., Bk. I., p. 197, ed. 1681) says, "thus was the work carried on and finished." There is preserved in the Harleian collection of MSS. (No. 426) in the British Museum, a manuscript of the Reformatio Legum (with the exception of eight sections). Dr. Cardwell (Ref. Leg., 1850, Pref. viii. and ix.) infers from the evidence afforded by this MS. that Cranmer and Peter Martyr took the whole responsibility of compiling the Reformatio upon themselves, "employing Dr. Haddon to see "that their sentiments were expressed in proper "language. It would appear then that they were "engaged in this work during the year 1552, and that "our MS. may be considered as the result of their "labours during that period." Dr. Cardwell (p. vi) thus describes it: "This MS. possesses a singular "degree of interest. Having been written out with "great care it was submitted to the Archbishop for a "last revision, and contains together with various "supplements and suggestions of Peter Martyr and "Dr. Haddon in their handwriting, the final additions "and alterations of Archbishop Cranmer written by "himself. It had now reached so great a degree of "completeness having had many of its clerical errors "corrected and titles supplied for all the separate "chapters partly from the pen of the Archbishop and "partly from that of Peter Martyr, that after one "further examination from the Archbishop to dispose "of the observations made by Martyr and Haddon, "it might be presented to the King and receive the "final ratifications prescribed by the Act of Parliament "under which the whole work was undertaken." I shall return to the consideration of this MS. later, but it is mentioned here only because it affords convincing evidence that Cranmer and Peter Martyr and, in a very minor degree, Haddon, were concerned in the authorship of the Reformatio.* There is no similar evidence that anyone else had a hand in it, though it is very likely that their labours were shared by others, e.g., Sir John Cheke (Strype's Life, chap. III., § 2), and probably other members of the 32, or at least of the eight.

† The patent has "Miloni Oxoniensi Episcopo," but this is plainly a slip for Miloni Exoniensi Episcopo. The Bishop of Oxford at this date was Robert King. Miles Coverdale, Bishop of Exeter, is no doubt meant.

‡ Strype (Life of Sir John Cheke, chap. iii, § 2) mentions that Cheke was selected as one of the 32 commissioners, and Foxe in his preface to the 1571 ed. of the Reformatio thinks that Cheke lent a hand in its preparation.

XXVIII. The period of three years allowed by the Act of 3 & 4 Edw. VI. ch. 11 for the compilation of the revised Canon Law expired, it will be remembered, on November 4, 1552. Apparently it was foreseen some months before this date that the Reformatio, however far advanced towards completion, would not, or might not, be ready by the 4th November. Accordingly a Bill extending the time for the execution of the work was brought into and carried through the House of Commons. It was read a first and second time in the House of Lords on April 14, 1552, but went no further (Journal of H. of Lords, Vol. 1, p. 428). Parliament was dissolved on the 15th April. A new Parliament met on the 1st March 1553. No step was taken in it with regard to the matter in hand, and the King died on the 6th July 1553.

XXIX. It is clear that whatever the reasons stimulating opposition to the legalisation of the Reformatio Legum, it had opponents influential enough to bar its progress. Foxe (preface to 1571 ed.) says that had Edward VI. lived a little longer there is no doubt the Reformatio would have been established by Act of Parliament. Apparently Edward VI. was anxious that there should be a reformed ecclesiastical law. In Oct. 1552 he inserted in a "Memorial" of things he desired to accomplish, "the abrogating of the old Canon Law and establishment of a new." (Strype's Cranmer, Bk. II., ch. 35, p. 299.) His will was intended to contain a similar clause (Strype's Memls., Bk. II., ch. XXII., p. 430). But others were not anxious to see, at any rate, this particular attempt at a reformed Canon Law adopted. Strype (Cranmer, Bk. II., ch. 26, p. 271) referring to Cranmer writes: "He did his part, for he "brought the work to perfection. But it wanted the "King's ratification which was delayed partly by "business and partly by enemies." One or two letters of this period give us a glimpse of the lack of unanimity which hindered decisive action. Thus, Martin Micronius, writing to Bullinger from London on March 9, 1552, says: "We have great hopes of a reformation both in "church and state during this parliament. For "there are appointed to the reformation of the church "eight godly bishops amongst whom is Hooper; eight "doctors in divinity among whom is Master John a "Lasco, a man fearless in the cause of godliness, and "Master Peter Martyr. The business has turned out "well enough hitherto; and if the Bishops of London "and Ely [Ridley and Goodrike] would not stand in "the way with their worldly policy it would, I think, "have made yet further progress. But I hope that "their opposition will be ineffectual." (Original Letters, Vol. II., P.S., p. 580.) Peter Martyr himself, writing at this time (March 8, 1552) from Lambeth to Bullinger informs him of the appointment of the 32 commissioners the majority of whom he evidently regards as congenial to his views, and begs the prayers of his friends abroad. "For it is not only necessary to "entreat God that pious and holy laws may be framed "but that they may obtain the sanction of parliament "or else they will not possess any force or authority "whatsoever." (Original Letters, Vol. II., P.S., p. 503.) Again, Cox (one of the commissioners), writing to Bullinger from Windsor, under date October 5, 1552, laments the disinclination of many to adopt the proposed code of reformed canons. He says: ". . . . but "the severe institutions of Christian discipline are "most utterly abominate. We would be sons and "heirs also but we tremble at the rod. Do pray stir "us up and our nobility too by the Spirit which is "given to you to a regard for discipline without which "I grieve to say it, the kingdom will be taken away "from us and given to a nation bringing forth the "fruits thereof." (Original Letters, Vol. I., P.S., p. 123.) Todd, the biographer of Cranmer (Life, Vol. II., p. 325) writes: "Whether by the death of "Henry or some other cause the plan in his time had "been rendered abortive is uncertain. That by the "death of Edward it now was is the frequent assertion "of historical writers. Some, however, have thought "(Hallam's Const. Hist., 2nd ed., Vol. I., 139) that the "severity of the code would never have been endured "in this country, and that this is the true reason why "it was laid aside. Others (Ridley: Life of Ridley, "p. 352) that in that age of licentiousness, which ill "could brook restraint, some art was employed to "prevent the confirmation of it." Pollard (Life of Cranmer, p. 281) writes: "the Bill introduced in 1552 "to renew the commission failed to become law largely "owing to Northumberland's opposition." Stubbs (Lectures on Modern and Mediæval History, p. 322) writes: ". . practically the work was done by "Peter Martyr the Oxford Professor of Divinity, "under Cranmer's eye and the result was the compilation known as the Reformatio Legum; a curious "congeries of old and new material which really "pleased no party; showing too much respect for "antiquity and divine ordinance to please the Puritan, "and too little to satisfy the men who had guided the "Reformation under Henry VIII. and those who were "to do so under Elizabeth."

XXX. Queen Mary's reign lasted from the 6th July 1553 till the 17th November 1558. It was of course a period of reaction, and not only was nothing done to advance the Reformatio Legum, but the Act 25 Hen. VIII. ch. 19, under which the scheme started, was repealed by 1 & 2 Ph. & M. ch. 8. It was revived by 1 Eliz. ch. 1. Early in Elizabeth's reign a "Bill for making Ecclesiastical Laws by 32 persons" was introduced into and carried through the House of Commons. It was brought up to the House of Lords on the 20th March 1559, and was read a first time there on the 22nd March but did not proceed further (Journal of the House of Lords, 1558–59, pp. 566, 568). Nothing more seems to have been heard of the Reformatio Legum until 1571. In that year (when the 39 articles received statutory sanction) Foxe, with the permission of Archbishop Parker, edited the first printed edition of the Reformatio. It was published by John Day. Foxe used the manuscript already mentioned, and also another MS. (now lost) containing the whole code revised by Archbishop Parker. Dr. Cardwell (Reformatio, Pref. xiii.) writes: "the edition of 1571 is the authentic "form into which the ecclesiastical laws were brought "on their last revision at the time of the Reformation, "and has naturally therefore been adopted as the "standard from which the present reprint should be "taken. But this must be understood with great

" limitation. Beyond the common press errors of evil " punctuation and the omission or substitution of letters " or syllables which though extremely numerous are " for the most part easily corrected, the printed book " contains greater mistakes sufficient to limit the use " and impair the authority of the whole record. So " great is the number & variety of them that they " illustrate all the causes to which such mistakes have " at any time been attributed and even baffle in some " instances any attempt at explaining the origin of " them. Besides the alterations which appear to have " been made advisedly and may be ascribed to Arch- " bishop Parker there are deviations from the older " MS. attributable to either the carelessness, the " ignorance or the wilfulness of the transcriber and " then there still remain the many varieties of error " connected with the work of printing."

XXXI. Foxe's print was almost certainly connected with some scheme, the particulars of which we lack, for the revival of the project of an authorised reformed code of Canon Law. All that appears to be known about the matter is thus stated by Dr. Cardwell (Reformatio, Pref., p. xii): " It does not appear to have been adopted " by the Queen and her government but it was pub- " lished, as Foxe intimates, for the purpose of being " used in parliament, it was called for by M^r^ Strickland " and produced by M^r^ Norton eminent debaters of " that period during a discussion on religious subjects " in the House of Commons, was referred, together " with other matters of a similar nature, to a Com- " mittee of that House and was ordered to be trans- " lated into English. But it made no progress. The " Queen, averse to all interference of the Commons " in ecclesiastical matters had conceived an especial " displeasure against the individuals by whom the " measure was recommended: and these individuals " too might find on an examination of the book itself " sufficient reasons for delaying the consideration of it " to a future period. There is no notice of it in the " Journals of either House; and so little does the " Queen appear either to have approved of the book, " or to have been in favour of the general measure, that " no attempt apparently was made during her reign to " revive the Act of 1549." This last statement is not accurate. As we have seen, a Bill was introduced in 1559 but did not pass the House of Lords. Dr. Cardwell gives as his authorities D'Emes' Journal, p. 157, and Penri's tract, " Reformation no enemy," &c., 1590. (See also Fuller's Church History, Vol. IV., p. 108.)

XXXII. Speaking of the 1571 edition, Dr. Cardwell says (Preface, xii. n.): " The book appears to have had " little circulation. M^r^ Strickland had not seen it " when he called for the production of it and Penri in " the treatise noticed above, which he published in the " year 1590 advertised for a copy of it in the hope " that it would promote his views of ultra-reformation. " And yet these two persons were among the most " prominent of the controversialists in politics and " religion at that period."

XXXIII. No more seems to have been heard of the Reformatio Legum until 1640 (the year of Archbishop Laud's abortive canons). In that year a reprint of the 1571 edition was produced by Daniel Frere of Little Britain in the City of London.* In 1641 another reprint of the 1571 edition was published by the Stationers' Company, London. With regard to these Dr. Cardwell writes (Preface, p. xiv.): " In both indeed and more " especially in the latter of them, the punctuation is " much improved, many of the common errors of the " press have been corrected, and some of the greater " errors have been omitted and their places supplied " by conjectural emendations in some instances " successful, in others the reverse. But it is evident " from the many errors left unnoticed that no original " MS. was employed for either of the two editions."

XXXIV. The only other edition of the Reformatio Legum is that published in 1850 by Dr. Cardwell. It is an extremely accurate and careful piece of work, and is the only edition which can be relied on by a student for ordinary use. Its method is thus explained by Dr. Cardwell (Preface, p. xiv.): " the edition of 1571 " was taken as the standard and all such readings as " differed from the MS. of Archbishop Cranmer but " might have been made advisedly and under the direc- " tion of Archbishop Parker are retained, the readings " of the older MS. in those cases being recorded in the " Appendix. But wherever the readings of the standard " differ from that MS. and cannot have been corrections " proceeding from Archbishop Parker the readings of " the MS. are placed in the text and those of the " standard edition at the foot of the page. So that the " text of this reprint is the same with the edition of " 1571 excepting where errors of copy or of press have " been corrected from the older MS.; and those errors " themselves are recorded at the foot of the page " except when they were of so palpable a nature as to " be undeserving of being noticed. The appendix " contains such readings of Archbishop Cranmer's MS. " as appear to have been purposely altered in the MS. " of Archbishop Parker, together with notices of the " many and important changes made by Archbishop " Cranmer and Peter Martyr in the course of their " revision."

XXXV. Although I have so far dealt with the history of the development of the Reformatio Legum as a whole, it is the particular section of it entitled " De Adulteriis et Divortiis " which has special relevance to the subject now under the consideration of the Royal Commission on Divorce and Matrimonial Causes. This section opens with a statement that adultery ought not to be passed over by the Ecclesiastical Judges without the most condign punishment. It then proceeds to enact that clergymen convicted of adultery are to forfeit all their goods and property and to be perpetually banished or imprisoned for life; that laymen so convicted are to forfeit half their goods and to be perpetually banished or imprisoned for life; that wives so convicted are to be deprived of their dowry and all right in their husbands' property and to be similarly punished; that a husband or wife who deserts the other spouse and either refuses to return or cannot be found but subsequently comes forward is to be imprisoned for life, and a husband who without deserting his wife is absent for a long time and when he returns cannot satisfactorily explain his movements is to be imprisoned for life: that a husband or wife who shows deadly hostility towards or attempts to murder the other spouse and also a husband who is incorrigibly violent and harsh towards his wife is to be perpetually banished or imprisoned for life: that incest is to be punished by imprisonment for life and that fornication is to be punished by penance and (if necessary) excommunication and by a penalty of 10*l.* (or as much as can be conveniently spared) to be placed in the poor box. It is further enacted that the innocent party, where there has been a conviction for adultery, may after an interval of a year or six months (to give opportunity for reconciliation) remarry; but the guilty party may not remarry: that in cases of desertion or protracted absence without tidings, the deserted party may, by sentence of the judge and after an interval decreed by him, be allowed to remarry, but subject to the condition that if the long absent husband return and satisfactorily explain his disappearance the wife must leave her second husband and go back to the first: that one spouse who is the victim of the deadly hostility of the other, or a wife who suffers from the incorrigible harshness of her husband may be allowed to remarry: but that trifling disagreements, incurable disease, adultery of one spouse at the instigation of the other and adultery of both spouses are not grounds for allowing remarriage. Finally it is enacted that separation a mensa et thoro is to be abolished.

XXXVI. Questions have been raised (1) as to how far, if at all, the Reformatio Legum furnishes a true reflection of the dominant opinion of the English Church with regard to Divorce at the date of its compilation and (2) as to how far, if at all, the Reformatio Legum, though not formally authorised was in fact acted on in matrimonial causes by the

* Apparently more than one publisher was concerned with this edition. Some copies bear the name of " Laurentii Sadler " at the sign " Aurei Leonis " in Little Britain.

XXXVII. On the question of Church opinion it is material to ask—Who were the real authors of the remarkable proposals I have summarised? From the nature of the case these proposals were new. The old Canon Law did not recognise divorce a vinculo and therefore could not furnish a basis for this part of the Reformatio Legum. Attention has already been drawn to the extreme opinions of the section of the Reformers who were undoubtedly chiefly concerned with its actual compilation. It is easy to see how naturally they would be led on by their emphatic repudiation of the Sacramental view of marriage as a Divinely appointed symbol of the relation between Christ and His Church, and therefore indissoluble, to disown this indissolubility and then, under the pressure of practical considerations, to allow one exception after another to the old rule of theoretic rigidity. Another set of changes made at this time as part of the revolt from Rome, abolished a great many of the old rules as to forbidden degrees of consanguinity and affinity. These elaborate and highly artificial rules produced a system under which marriages theoretically indissoluble, if originally valid, could practically be got rid of by being declared null ab initio on account of the impediment of relationship. This relationship might consist in some remote or fanciful connection, between the parties or their godparents, unknown to either of them until the desire to find a way out of an irksome union, suggested minute search into pedigrees for obstacles—a search which somehow seems to have been generally successful. The disappearance of this machinery for what was virtually divorce, left the difficulty to which its development had been due, demanding solution in some other way, and must have furnished another powerful incentive to the men of that age to adopt the direct course of declaring divorce a vinculo possible under certain circumstances. It is not at all surprising that the Reformers should seize on the doubtful and always disputed case of adultery as a ground for complete divorce and should range themselves on the side of those who considered that our Lord permitted remarriage at any rate to the innocent party. Speaking generally, the English Reformers seem to have stopped at this point (see post). But as we have seen the scheme of the Reformatio Legum went much further. I suggest that the real inspiration of this portion of the code came from the foreign Protestants whose influence in Edward VI.'s reign in the changes then made or proposed, is notorious and has already been noticed. The direct part taken by Peter Martyr (1500–62) in the preparation of the Reformatio Legum and the inclusion of John a Lasco in the body of 32 commissioners indicate the great influence of the foreign Protestants. It should be added however that Peter Martyr's own views on Divorce seem to have been more conservative than those of some other Reformers. He deals fully with the subject in his Loci Communes—"De Divortiis et Repudiis" (cap. 10, p. 302, &c., ed. Heidelberg, 1603: 1st ed. 1560): and he appears to have delivered lectures on Divorce probably in England, in or prior to 1550. (See Original Letters, P.S., Vol. II., p. 404, John ab Ulmis to Henry Bullinger.) Martyr's general position is that Christ's words allowed Divorce for no cause except adultery and that the Church must leave to the State any extension of the grounds of Divorce. But Martin Bucer's work De Regno Christi written expressly for the guidance of Edward VI. and presented to him about New-year's tide 1551 (see Strype's Memorials, Vol. II., Part I., p. 550) may well have been the actual source of the section in the Reformatio as to Divorce. The longest and most carefully written division of the work, De Regno Christi (see the 1557 edition, Basle, and "The Judgment of Martin "Bucer concerning Divorce . . . now Englisht" by John Milton, 1644) is a treatise in many chapters, warmly defending Divorce and remarriage, e.g., in cases of desertion (chaps. xxxv. and xli.) and condemning divorce merely a mensa et thoro as contrary to God's ordinance. Bucer seems to have shocked some at least of his contemporaries by the laxity of his notions on Divorce. John Burcher writing to Henry Bullinger, June 8, 1550, from Strasburgh (Original Letters, P.S., Vol. II., p. 665) says: "Bucer is more than licentious "on the subject of marriage. I heard him once "disputing at table upon this question, when he "asserted that a divorce should be granted for any "reason however trifling."

XXXVIII. It is important when we are considering to what extent the Reformatio Legum reflected the opinions and aims of the Church of England in Edward VI.'s reign, to give due weight to the fact that neither Parliament nor Convocation ever accepted it or expressed approval of its provisions. We do not even certainly know that any of the various commissions appointed to review the Canon Law in fact approved the Reformatio Legum as it has come down to us. It is not improbable that the more sensible men of all parties both clergymen and statesmen perceived, as was surely the case, that a code containing laws such as I have described was hopelessly impracticable in England then, and indeed always. The practical impossibility of the plan while it agrees well with its being the work of foreign theologians, makes it difficult to believe that the scheme was ever really pushed by the great mass of English Churchmen. Even Archbishop Cranmer, as we have seen, opposed the Bill providing for the reappointment of the commission to revise the Canon Law in Edward VI.'s reign. Leaving Edward's time and passing on to 1571, Archbishop Parker's attitude towards the Reformatio Legum is very doubtful and obscure. He undoubtedly made some alterations in Cranmer's draft, and it will be remembered that he was himself one of the 32 commissioners of February 12, 1552. He must have allowed Foxe facilities in the preparation of the first printed edition of 1571 but with what object it would be rash to speculate. There is nothing, so far as I know, in his writings to show that he ever contemplated legislation to give effect to the Reformatio Legum.* The canons of the same year, 1571 (see these canons edited by W. E. Collins, now Bishop of Gibraltar, for the Church Hist. Soc.), which it will be remembered were passed by the Convocations but failed to obtain the Queen's affirmation, deal with some of the same subjects as the Reformatio (e.g., concionatores) and yet form a perfectly distinct and separate code. It is inconceivable that Convocation should have busied itself as it did with the canons of 1571 if at the same time there had been any real desire to obtain the Queen's sanction to the Reformatio Legum.

XXXIX. Direct evidence of the views of the leading Churchmen of Edward VI.'s and Elizabeth's reigns is not so abundant as might have been expected. It is clear, as has been already stated, that there was a great unsettlement of the old beliefs with regard to marriage generally and particularly as to its absolute indissolubility. The changes of opinion of Archbishop Cranmer have been already noticed and will again be apparent when the Northampton case is dealt with. So late as December 1540 (i.e., six years after the first of the series of Acts which led to the preparation of the Reformatio Legum) the archbishop was strongly opposed to the lax views of divorce followed by remarriage which seemed to be prevalent amongst Protestants on the Continent. Cranmer (1489–1556) writing to Osiander (Preacher of Nuremburg) December 27, 1540 (Remains, &c., P.S., pp. 404–8) says: "Neverthe- "less some things are frequently occurring which I

* In a remarkable paper entitled "General Notes of "Matters to be Moved by the Clergy in the next Parliament "and Synod" [i.e., 1562], which has some marginal notes in Archbishop Parker's hand, the following occurs:—"That "adulterers and fornicators may be punished by strait "imprisonment and open shame if the offender be vile and "stubborn, &c., as carting by the civil magistrate, &c. Some "think banishment and perpetual prison to be meet for "adulterers. When they be reconciled the form of recon- "ciliation appointed legibus Ecclesiasticis Edwardi 6" to be "used without respect of persons." (Strype's Annals, Vol. I., Part I., pp. 473–83.) The reference to the Reformatio Legum is obvious. See form of Reconciliation in cap. 16 (Cardwell's ed., p. 177). The words in italics do not indicate the writer's personal agreement with the provisions of the Reformatio as to adultery, &c.

" can neither deny, nor can I admit them without " shame; nor lastly am I able to imagine any sufficient " reason by which they may be shown to have been " done consistently with honour or piety. For, not to " say a word at the present time on usury, which it is " clear is approved by you or at all events some of " you, or concerning the fact that you allow the sons " of your nobles to have concubines (with a view " doubtless to prevent the breaking up of inheritances " through lawful marriages) and yet you are so " strongly opposed to priests having concubines; " leaving this out of the question, what can possibly " be alleged in your excuse when you allow a man " after a divorce, while both man and woman are " living, to contract a fresh marriage and what is still " worse even without a divorce you allow one man to " have several wives? And this you yourself, if I " remember right, in some of your letters expressly " declared to have been done; adding thereto that " Philip [Melancthon] himself was present at a second " marriage, acting as I believe a bridesman and taking " it under his countenance.*

XL. " These two things are expressly and undeni- " ably contrary both to the nature of marriage, which " does not make two, but one flesh, as well as also to " the Scriptures, as will be seen from Matthew xix,, " Mark x., Luke xvi., Romans vii., 1 Cor. vii., from " which passages it is clear that according to the " institution of the Apostles and therefore of Christ " himself, one person ought to be joined in matrimony " with one person, and that persons so joined together " cannot again contract marriage until the death of " one of the parties shall have happened. But if your " reply is that we must understand it in such a sense " as to except the case of fornication, I ask whether " adultery on the part of the wife was the reason why " Philip allowed the husband to marry a second wife " in addition to the first? You know better than I. " But even if it were so, we shall then object that " from the origin of the Church up to this hour (and " according to examples in it interpretations of the " Scriptures must be conformed and by them con- " firmed) at no time, as far as we know, has this been " so received. . . ."

XLI. William Tyndale (the translator of the New Testament, 1500–36) in his exposition of St. Matt. v., vi., vii. (Expositions, &c., P.S. 51, 52), writes: " . . . " But Christ calleth back again and interpreteth the law " after the first ordinance and cutteth off all causes of " divorcement save fornication of the wife's part, when " she breaketh her matrimony; in which case Moses' " law pronounceth her dead and so do the laws of " many other countries: which laws where they be " used there is a man free without all question. Now " where they be let live, there the man (if he see sign " of repentance and amendment) may forgive for once. " If he may not find in his heart (as Joseph as holy as " he was, could not find in his heart to take Christ's " mother to him, when he spied her with child) he is " free no doubt to take another, while the law inter- " preteth her dead: for her sin ought of no right to " bind him. What shall the woman do if she repent " and be so tempted in her flesh that she cannot live " chaste? Verily I can show you nothing out of the " Scripture. . . .

" When the officers be negligent and the woman " not able to put herself to penance, if she went where " she is not known and there marry, God is the God " of mercy. If any man in the same place where she " transgresseth pitied her and married her, I could " suffer it; were it not that the liberty would be the " next way to provoke all other that were once weary " of their husbands to commit adultery for to be " divorced from them, that they might marry other " which they loved better."

But (pp. 54, 55) Tyndale after a digression, continues: " But to our purpose: what if the man run " from the wife and leave her desolate? Verily the " rulers ought to make a law if any do so and come " not again by a certain day, as within the space of a " year or so, that then he be banished the country; " and if he come again, to come on his head, and let " the wife be free to marry where she will. . . . In " like manner if the woman depart causeless and will " not be reconciled, though she commit none adultery, " the man ought to be free to marry again. And in " all other causes if they separate themselves of im- " patience that the one cannot suffer the other's " infirmities, they must remain unmarried."

XLII. Bishop Hooper (1495–1554) (Early Writings, P.S., 378, 379) writes: " There is another kind of " adultery forbidden in this precept, which Christ " speaketh of, Matt. v. and xix., which is unlawful " divorcement of matrimony, where as the man putteth " away the woman, or the woman the man for unlawful " causes. The same authority hath the woman to put " away the man that he hath to put away the " woman. Mark x., Christ saith there is no lawful " cause to dissolve marriage, but adultery. . . . " Wheresoever this fault happen and can be proved by " certain signs and lawful testimonies, the persons may " by the authority of God's word and ministry of the " magistrates be separated so one from the other that " it shall be lawful for the man to marry another wife " and the wife to marry another husband as Christ " saith, Matt. v. and xix." Hooper's view of the equality of the sexes involved him in controversy with his " opponents " who while thinking the innocent husband ought to be allowed to remarry were not in favour of the innocent wife having the same liberty. Hooper consulted Bullinger. (See his letter, May 31, 1549, in Original Letters, P.S., p. 64.)

XLIII. Thomas Becon (a Prebendary of Canterbury, died 1570) (Works, P.S., vol. ii., p. 647, Homily against Adultery) writes: " . . . for whereas the " Jews used of a long sufferance by custom to put " away their wives at their pleasure for every cause " Christ correcting that evil custom did teach that if " any man put away his wife and marrieth another for " any cause except only for adultery (which then was " death by the law) he was an adulterer and forced also " his wife so divorced to commit adultery." Again (vol. iii., p. 532, The Acts of Christ and of Antichrist—Of their Doctrine) he writes: " Christ saith whosoever " putteth away his wife (except it be for fornication) " and marrieth another breaketh wedlock, giving her " liberty to the guiltless and innocent man having an " harlot to his wife . . . not only to be divorced " from that harlot sometime his wife but also to " marry again and take another woman to his wife in " the fear of God. . . . Antichrist in his law " saith: If a man have a whore to his wife it shall be " lawful for him to be divorced from her both from " bed and board but he may by no means marry again, " live as he may."

XLIV. Richard Hooker (1553–1600) (Ecc. Polity, Book V., ch. lxxiii., section 3) writes: " Man and woman " being therefore to join themselves for such a purpose, " they were of necessity to be linked with some strait " and insoluble knot." See also section 8.

XLV. Bishop Lancelot Andrewes (1565–1626) (Minor Works, Lib. A.C.T., p. 106): " A discourse " against second marriage after sentence of divorce " with a former match, the party then living." Extracts from this paper are given elsewhere in these notes. It was probably written about 1601.

XLVI. Edmund Bunny (Bachelor of Divinity), in 1595, wrote " Of Divorce for adultery and marrying " again: that there is no sufficient warrant so to do." An edition was published at Oxford in 1610. Its title sufficiently summarises its contents. The writer deals with his subject very diffusely and with no novelty of argument or point of view.

XLVII. Dr. W. Fulke (born before 1538, died 1589, Master of Pembroke Coll., Camb.). Text of the N.T. Rheims version contrasted with English version, with commentary. Written in Queen Elizabeth's reign (ed. 1617). Under St. Matt. v. 33, Fulke says: " S[t] Mark

* This probably refers to the marriage of Philip, Landgrave of Hesse, with Margaret de Sala (his first wife being alive) which Luther, Bucer, and Melancthon defended.

" and S[t] Luke understand the exception which they do " not express for they all report one doctrine of our " Saviour Christ and the exception declareth that not " only divorcement but also marriage after divorce- " ment is free as it was in the law where fornication " is the cause of divorcement. . . . The Pope's " Canon Law restraineth the liberty of marriage and " divorcing because he may make money for bulls of " licence and dispensation to marry." In a further passage on the same page Fulke indicates that he only recognises divorce on the ground of adultery.

XLVIII. Bishop Godfrey Goodman (1583–1656) (The Fall of Man," ed. 1616, pp. 260, 261), writes: " . . . but I know not what ill spirit hath set them " at enmity whom God hath coupled together. Some- " times indeed the stream of the husband's love being " carried another way is apt to cast any aspersion upon " his wife's honesty and then he begins to practise " with heretics and to commend the law of liberty " that after a divorce it should be lawful to marry " again and again. Here you shall see large expositions " written in defence thereof and the opinions of certain " Divines, Ministers, Pastors, Superintendents of the " separated congregations or the new Churches from " beyond the seas (thus they would seem to have a " Catholic consent) together with such bitter invectives " against all superstitious fasts, calling all chastise- " ments of the flesh, sins against the body."

XLIX. Bishop Francis White (1564?–1638) ("The Orthodox Faith and Way," ed. 1617, pp. 353, 354) answering a Roman Catholic controversialist, Thos. Worthington, who had accused Luther of saying, " If the wife will not, or cannot, let the maid come," White writes: " This speech being divorced from the occasion " whereupon it was uttered and from the other parts " of the discourse seemeth gross: But the whole con- " texture being laid together affordeth no more but this " —That if a disobedient wife refuse to live with her " husband according to the Apostle's rule 1 Cor. vii. 3 " and by her obstinacy give occasion of adultery the " husband may threaten her with divorce and cutting " her off from his flesh, Eccles. xxv. 26, and terrify " her with the example of Queen Vashti who being " rebellious was put away and Esther a maid was " chosen in her place Esther 1, 12. And if upon " admonition of her husband and others she still " continued obstinate, Luther esteemed this to be a " kind of desertion 1 Cor. vii. 15 and judged it a lawful " cause of divorce. Now although this opinion of his " concerning divorce, be not so justifiable yet the " Papists do shamefully abuse him in detorting his " words to a giving liberty to adultery and dishonesty " which he never intended."

L. Henry Hammond (Canon of Christ Church, 1605–60) (Practical Catechism, Lib. A.C.T., p. 136) writes:—

> " Scholar: What doth Christ now in his new law in this matter of divorce?
> " Catechist: He repealeth that whole command- ment [the Mosaic law] and imposeth a stricter yoke on His disciples . . . . And therefore now He clearly affirms of all such divorces that whosoever thus puts away his wife as the Jews frequently did causeth her to commit adultery and he that marrieth her committeth adultery; and if after such divorcement he himself marry again he committeth adultery and is in that respect sadly liable. That is, in brief that the bond of wedlock now under Christ is so indis- soluble that it is not the husband's dislikes which can excuse him for putting away his wife nor his giving her a bill of divorce which can make it lawful for her to marry any other nor for any other to marry her who is for all this bill still indissolubly another man's wife.
> "Scholar: But what is no kind of divorce now lawful under Christ?
> " Catechist: Yes clearly, that which is here named, in case of fornication . . . . this liberty being peculiar to the husband against the wife and not common to the wife against the husband.
> " Scholar: Is there no other cause of divorce now pleadable or justifiable among Christians but that in case of fornication?
> " Catechist: I cannot define any, because Christ hath named no other . . . . "

LI. Bishop Jeremy Taylor (1613—67) (Ductor Dubitantium, ed. 1660, tome i., p. 191): " That since " an adulterer is made one flesh with the harlot with " whom he mingles impure embraces, it follows that " he hath dissolved the union which he had with his " wife."

LII. Bishop Joseph Hall (1574—1656) (Works, ed. 1837, Vol. VII., pp. 473, 474, Cases of Conscience) writes: " . . . When a just divorce intervenes " these bonds are chopped in pieces; and no more are " than if they had never been. And if all relations " cease on death as they do in whatsoever kind surely " divorce being as it is no other than a legal death, " doth utterly cut off as the Hebrew term imports all " former obligations and respects betwixt the parties " so finally separated.

" The adulterous wife therefore duly divorced " being thus dead in law as to her husband the " husband stands now as free as if he had never " married: so as I know not why the apostle should " not as well speak to him as to any other when he " saith: Nevertheless to avoid fornication let every " man have his own wife. 1 Cor. vii. 2. Neither " is it otherwise in the case of a chaste wife after her " separation from an adulterous husband. Mark x. 12. " In these rights God makes no difference of sexes: " both may lawfully claim the same immunities. " . . . . Shortly then I doubt not but I may " notwithstanding great authorities to the contrary " safely resolve that in the case of Divorce it is lawful " for the innocent to marry. But for that I find the " Church of England hitherto somewhat tender on the " point (Canon 107) and this practice, where it rarely " falls, generally held though not sinful yet of ill " report and obnoxious to various censures . . . . "

LIII. Bishop John Prideaux (1578–1650) (Fasci- culus Controversiarum Theologicarum, ed. 1649, p. 299), under the heading, " An matrimonium legitimum sit " dissolubile quoad vinculum," the writer deals with the matter in the form of question and answer, and arrives at the conclusion that marriage is indissoluble. For example, at p. 301 he writes:—

> " Objectio: In voluntariâ et obstinatâ desertione Frater vel soror non est subjectus (1 Cor. vii., 15) ergo vinculum solvitur.
> " Solutium: Non est subjectus ut discedentem revocet aut sequatur sed inde non absolvitur a vinculo matrimoniali ut vivente conjuge qui deseruit ad alias transeat nuptias ut fecit Galeatius Caracciolus."

LIV. Bishop John Cosin (1594–1672) (Works, Lib. A.C.T., Vol. IV., pp. 489–502) (Bishop Cozen's argu- ment proving that adultery works a dissolution of the marriage: being the substance of several of Bishop Cozen's speeches in the House of Lords upon the debate of the Lord Ross's case) [Bill for dissolving the marriage of Lord Ross, on account of adultery and to give him leave to marry again, 1670]. The " argu- ment " is said to be " taken from original papers in the Bishop's own hand." The purpose of the argument is thus stated: " The question is indefinitely to be " spoken of whether a man being divorced from his " wife who hath committed adultery and is convicted " of it may marry himself to another wife or no, during " the life of her which is divorced." Cosin considers, (1) as to the argument that " the separation from bed " and board doth not dissolve the bond of marriage," " that this is a distinction without a difference newly " invented by the canonists and schoolmen and never " heard of either in the Old or New Testament nor in " the times of the ancient Fathers who accounted the " separation from bed and board to be the dissolution " of the bond itself; (2) that first institution of " marriage, that they may be one flesh is by adultery " dissolved when the adulteress makes herself one flesh

" with another man and thereby dissolves the first bond " of marriage . . .

" As to the supposed inconveniences that will follow " upon marrying again—

" (1) More inconveniences will follow if they be forbidden to marry again.

" (2) The father would be in an uncertainty of the children if he should retain the adulteress.

" (3) There would be danger of poisoning or killing one another if no second marriage were allowed.

" (4) Where the parties should consent to new marriages for their own lusts the magistrates have power to overrule such practices.

" (5) If they be kept together by divorce from marrying it would occasion the innocent party to sin."

LV. Herbert Thorndike (1598–1672, Canon of Westminster (Theological Works, Lib. A.C.T., Vol. IV., Of the Laws of the Church), at page 304, writes: ". . . it is not possible to show that ever there was " any opinion rule or practice received in the Church, " that it is lawful to divorce but in case of adultery. " I do truly conceive that there was anciently a " difference of opinion and practice in the Church " whether it be lawful to marry again upon putting " away a wife for adultery; or whether the bond of " marriage remain undissoluble, when the parties are " separated from bed and board for adultery. But " this difference argues consent in the rest; that is " that excepting the case of adultery, there is no " divorce to be among Christians."

Again at p. 307 he writes: "Some texts are " alleged to prove the bond of marriage undissoluble " which to me I confess do not seem to create any " manner of consequence." He thus discusses Rom. vii. 2, 3; 1 Cor. vii. 39; Eph. v. 28–32; St. Matt. v. 31, 32; xix. 3–9; St. Mark x. 11, 12; 1 Cor. vii. 1–5, 10, 11; St. Luke xvi. 18. At page 309 he writes: "Be the " marriage of Christians then a sacrament, as much as " any man would have it to be; be it a commemora- " tion (if Adam's was a prediction) of the incarnation " of Christ and of his marriage with the Church; let it " contain a promise of grace to them that exercise it as " Christians should do: it is therefore indissoluble in " the point of right, I confess; that is to say it is the " profession of an obligation upon the parties to hold " it indissoluble. But is it therefore indissoluble in " point of fact? May not the obligation so professed " be transgressed? And is not marriage a civil " contract, even among pagans and infidels; and that " by God's appointment? And may not the law, " which God hath restrained the marriage of Christians " to, presuppose the conditions of a civil contract? " And are not civil contracts void, when one party " transgresseth the condition on which they are " made? . . . ."

Again at p. 321 he writes: "But do I therefore say " that the Church cannot forbid the innocent party to " marry again? or is bound by God's Law to allow " it? All ecclesiastical law being nothing but the " restraining of that which God's law hath left indefi- " nite, and the inconveniences being both visible and " horrible. I conceive I am duly informed that George " [Abbot] late Archbishop of Canterbury was satisfied " in the proceeding of the High Commission Court, to " tie them that are divorced from marrying again, " upon experience of adultery designed upon collusion " to free the parties from wedlock; having been " formerly tender in imposing that charge.* . . . " But they that would not have the laws of the Church " and the justice of the land become stales and panders " to such villainies must either make adultery death, and " so take away the dispute; or revive public penance and " so take away the infamy of his bed and the taint of " his issue, that shall be reconciled to an adulteress; " or lastly bear with that inconvenience, which the " casualties of the world may oblige any man to, which " is to propose the chastity of single life instead of the " chastity of wedlock, when the security of a man's " conscience and the offence of the Church allows it not. " But though this in regard of the intricacies of the " question and the inconveniences evident to practice, " may remain in the power of the Church; yet can " it never come within the power of the Church to " determine that it is prejudicial to the Christian faith " to do so, as by God's law. And the Church, that " errs not in prohibiting marriage upon divorce for " adultery, will err in determining for matter of faith, " that God's law prohibits it; so long as such reasons " from the Scriptures [semble in favour of remarriage " after divorce] are not silenced by any tradition of the " whole Church. . . . ." Finally, on page 327, Thorndike writes: " And can any man be so senseless " as to imagine, so impudent as to affirm that the " whole Church agreeing in taking the fornication of " married people to signify adultery, hath failed; but " every Christian prince that alloweth and limiteth any " other causes of divorce, all limiting several causes " attaineth the true sense of it? Will the common " sense of men allow that homicide, treason, poisoning, " forgery, sacrilege, robbery, man-stealing, cattle- " driving, or any of them is contained in the true " meaning of 'fornication' in our Lord's words? " that consent of parties, that a reasonable cause, " when pagans divorced 'per bonam gratiam' without " disparagement to either of the parties, can be " understood by that name?"

LVI. I will conclude with a quotation from a writer who was neither a theologian nor an Englishman but a civil lawyer of very great reputation in the 16th and 17th centuries, viz., Alberico Gentili (1552–1608), an Italian who came to England in 1580 and became Regius Professor of Civil Law at Oxford in 1587. He wrote a treatise "De Nuptiis." The preface is dated August 1600. The sixth book of this treatise is entitled "De repudiis et secundis nuptiis," and consists of an elaborate dissertation, 124 pages long, on Divorce. Gentili combats very freely the views of Bellarmine on the one side and of Beza on the other. His own final conclusion is—"Mihi certissima hic sedit sententia ut ab illa una causa [i.e., adultery] nullam ab causam discedatur. Nulla par est adulterio, nulla major." (De Nuptiis, ed. Hanoviæ, 1601, p. 691.)

LVII. It will be noted that, with few exceptions, the English Reformers so far as the above extracts are typical of their views regard adultery and adultery only as a valid ground for divorce à vinculo with right of remarriage. The wider grounds, such as desertion and implacable hostility, which found support amongst continental Protestants, and were included in the Reformatio Legum, do not seem to have been defended by English divines generally.

LVIII. Further, there seems to have been considerable divergence of view between different English divines, and even between the opinions of the same divines on different occasions, as to the effect of adultery with regard to dissolution of marriage. Some thought that adultery ipso facto dissolved a marriage. This was the view of the authors of the opinion given, and apparently acted upon in the case of William Parr, Marquis of Northampton (1547–52), the facts of which will be presently stated. Archbishop Cranmer, Dr. May, and Bishop Ridley were members of the commission appointed to determine whether the adultery of Parr's wife left him free to remarry. They were also, as we have seen, all connected with the preparation of the Reformatio Legum. Yet in the Parr case it was laid down that adultery ipso facto dissolved marriage and was the sole ground for allowing remarriage after separation (Burnet's Ref., Part II., Book 1, Records No. 20): while the Reformatio Legum (caps. 1, 5, 7, 17) proceeds on a diametrically opposite view of both points. Coming to a rather later date, Bishop Andrewes (writing probably in 1601) says: " First I " take the act of adultery doth not dissolve the bond " of marriage; for then it would follow that the party " offending would not upon reconciliation be received " again by the innocent to former society of life, " without a new solemnizing of marriage, insomuch

* The allusion is said (Thorndike's works, vol. iv., p. 321, note l) to be to the decree of nullity of marriage between Lord Essex and Lady Frances Howard in 1613.

" as the former marriage is quite dissolved which is " never heard of and contrary to the practice of all " Churches." (Andrewes' Minor Works, Lib. A.C.T., p. 106.) In the same paper Andrewes combats what he calls "the conceit of some later divines" that 'the word of God' permits remarriage in cases of adultery. He admits therefore that this view was current when he wrote.

LIX. Having now stated such information as I have been able to obtain as to the authorship of the Reformatio Legum and as to the independently expressed opinions on Divorce of some of the leading Churchmen of the 16th and 17th centuries, the conclusion seems to me to be inevitable that the Reformatio Legum, as we have it, so far as the section on Divorce is concerned, is merely a literary relic representing the views derived from continental sources of certain individual Churchmen of great eminence and influence. These views were no doubt also adopted by the rank and file of a section of extreme Protestants in this country, but, except during a few years of Edward VI.'s reign, were never dominant in the Church of England. On the other hand, the opinion that adultery was on biblical grounds a valid reason for the complete dissolution of marriage seems to have been widely, I should even say generally, held by English divines in the latter half of the 16th century.

LX. I proceed to seek an answer to the second question which has been raised, namely, whether the Reformatio Legum, though not formally authorised, was in fact acted on in matrimonial causes during the latter half of the 16th century. As during this period, and, of course, for centuries afterwards, the State left the decision of these causes to the Ecclesiastical Judges whose duty it was to administer the law of the Church of England, what we have really to ascertain is (1) what was the law of the Church of England as to Divorce in the latter half of the 16th century, and (2) what was in fact done in professed execution of that law.

LXI. There can be no doubt as to what was the law of the Church of England prior to the Reformation. It was the law of all Western Christendom that marriage was indissoluble during the joint lives of husband and wife. If a specially English authority is required for this proposition it will be found in the well-known compendium of Church Law supposed to have been written about 1385 by John de Burgh, Chancellor of the University of Cambridge, and entitled "Pupilla Oculi," under the heading "De accusatione conjugum " de adulterio" (cap. xiv., fol. cxl., ed. 1516), "Maritus " potest uxorem accusare et dimittere propter adul- " terium-et uxor virum: quos in tali casu ad paria " judicantur. Non tamen ea vivente potest alteri " nubere." The writer cites various passages from Gratian's Decretum, namely, 2nd Part, Causa xxxii., Quest 1, Cap. iv.; Quest v., Cap. xix. and Cap. xxiii.; and Quest vii., Cap. vii.*

LXII. In Pollock and Maitland's Hist. of English Law, Vol. ii., p. 392, the writers, after referring to a case of Jews whose union was held to be outside the Christian law of marriage, say: "This however was a " rare exception to a very general rule and for the rest " the only divorce known to the Church was that â " mensâ et toro which while it discharged the husband " and wife from the duty of living together, left them " husband and wife."

LXIII. It is indeed alleged on the authority of one or two text writers that in very ancient times, centuries before the period we are concerned with, Divorce à vinculo was granted in England. I do not pause to discuss this extremely dubious contention, because if such a state of things ever in fact existed, it must have been due to action of the State overruling the law of the Church, and it had certainly ceased to exist, wholly and entirely, before the middle of the 16th century, when the Church of England's breach with Rome became complete. The new era, therefore, opened with the law of the indissolubility of marriage established and acknowledged in the Church of England. No change in this law was purported to be made by the marriage legislation of Henry VIII. No canon was enacted which could at all affect the subject until the canons of 1597 consolidated into the body of canons of 1603–4, which will be dealt with presently. On the other hand we are not left in ignorance of what view those concerned in the actual administration of the ecclesiastical laws in the latter half of the 16th century, held and acted upon.

LXIV. Oughton's "Ordo Judiciorum sive methodus " procedendi in negotiis et litibus in foro ecclesiastico," though first published in 1738, preserved for us a collection of rules, established in the Ecclesiastical Courts, which had in fact been matured many generations before that date. I possess a MS. copy of this collection which, as it mentions Richard Cosin as the then Dean of the Arches, must have been written during his tenancy of the office (1590–7). In both the printed book and the MS. the following passage occurs (Oughton, Tit. ccxv., p. 318, MS. fol. 103) under the heading "De tenore sententiæ in causâ divortii seu " potius separationis â thoro et mensâ propter adul- " terium sive sævitiam," namely:—

> " . . . Tamen de jure canonico legibus hujus regni in hac parte approbato non licet personis in his casibus (videlicet nec propter adulteriam, nec propter sævitiam) divortiatis aut separatis ad secundas convolare nuptias viventibus prioribus maritis vel conjugibus. Quia vinculum matrimoniale matrimonii semel perfecti non potest ab homine dissolvi nisi morte naturali."

LXV. Again, in Clark's Praxis, a work of great authority on questions of ecclesiastical practice, from which Oughton derived the chief contents of his book, the same passage occurs (Tit. cxiii., ed. 1684) in identical terms. Clark's preface is dated April 20, 1596. See also in the other great text-book of ecclesiastical practice (Conset, 1681, p. 279, 3rd ed., 1708) a statement to the same effect.*

LXVI. It would seem, therefore, that practitioners in the Ecclesiastical Courts in the closing years of the 16th century not only were quite clear that at that time Divorce à vinculo could not be obtained for adultery, cruelty, &c., but were unaware of any change in the law in this respect. It is difficult to believe that if the courts in which they had practised all their lives had been accustomed for a period beginning about 1547 and lasting for 50 years to divorce à vinculo for adultery, these writers would have given no hint of so momentous a fact.

LXVII. The actual records of proceedings and sentences in Ecclesiastical Courts for the period from 1547 (the accession of Edward VI.) to 1603 (the date of the death of Queen Elizabeth) are plentiful, but, unfortunately, for the most part unindexed and practically inaccessible. I have made some search at the Public Record Office, where such records as have survived of the Court of Delegates (the then Court of Final Appeal in ecclesiastical causes) are preserved. An Act book for the period 1539–44 is all that remains prior to 1601. I found one case only of divorce (Fayrfax v. Fayrfax); it was a case of cruelty by the husband, and the sentence (June 9, 1543) separated the parties "a consortio, thoroque et " mensâ ac mutuâ cohabitatione." "Donec et " quousque mutuo eorum consensu sese duxerint " reconciliandos." This, therefore, was not a divorce à vinculo, because it contemplated reconciliation and a return to cohabitation. The Records of the Court of Arches (the court of first appeal so far as the province of Canterbury is concerned, and the chief spiritual court in England) are missing until about the time of the Restoration (1660). The records of the London Consistory Court for the period in question are preserved in Somerset House. They have been searched on my behalf by Mr. Kenneth Munro, of the London Diocesan Registry, They contain cases of Divorce a mensâ et thoro for adultery, cruelty, &c., but none of divorce à vinculo on those grounds. The London Consistory Court was the most important court for matrimonial causes in the country. I have made application to the registrars of all the diocesan consistory courts in the country which were in existence in the 16th century. All but two or three possess records relating to the period in question, and such information as could be obtained without an exhaustive perusal and indexing of hundreds of volumes of MSS. in the difficult and contracted legal writing of the time, has been most readily furnished to me. In the result I have not found, and no one of those whom I have asked has ever heard of, a sentence of divorce à vinculo for adultery, &c. in any of the consistory courts. There were a very considerable number of other Church courts (e.g., archdeacons' courts, commissary courts of deans and chapters, and other special or peculiar jurisdictions) which entertained matrimonial suits. Their records have been scattered, and no doubt have largely perished. But Hale's "Precedents in Criminal Causes" (1847) provides a very useful and instructive account of 829 causes almost all of them belonging to these minor Church courts and covering the period from 1475 to 1640. There are some cases where sentence of divorce à mensâ et thoro was pronounced, but these were not intended to take effect as divorces à vinculo, because the separation is expressly made terminable on reconciliation (see "Contra Alborough et uxorem ejus de Danbery," No. CCCCXLI., p. 148). Care must be taken not to attribute too much importance to the evidence, such as it is, which has been collected of the actual proceedings in the ecclesiastical courts. Our knowledge even of the records that exist is far too superficial and fragmentary to entitle us, on the strength of it alone, to make definite assertions of what was or was not done by these courts. Possibly in some of the minor courts, especially in those remote from London, it might be found on investigation that strange and irregular things were sometimes done. It is nevertheless a highly important and significant fact that no trace has been discovered of any sentence of any ecclesiastical court purporting to grant divorce à vinculo on the ground of adultery, cruelty, or desertion during the period when, if certain allegations which have been made were well-founded, the Church courts had without authority adopted a practice of pronouncing such sentences.

* Observe that both the "Pupilla Oculi" and the Decretum insist on equality of treatment for man and woman. See in addition to the passages cited in the text Causa xxxii., Quest v., caps. xx. and xxi.

* In one of the books of the Consistory Court of Salisbury containing records of proceedings dated 1598–99 there are a few pages in which there appears (in a contemporary handwriting) a statement headed "De Causis Matrimonialibus," according to which cruelty is "causa divortii seu potius separationis â thoro et mensâ." I am indebted for this information to A. R. Malden, Esq., the Registrar of the diocese of Salisbury.

LXVIII. The references to this subject in the reports of cases in the King's courts point in the same direction.

LXIX. In Mich. term of 44 & 45 Eliz. a case of Stephens v. Totty was decided in the King's Bench (Cro. Eliz., p. 908). It raised the question whether a husband, divorced â mensâ et thoro from his wife, could receive and give a valid receipt for a legacy bequeathed to her. The Ecclesiastical Court held that he ought not to be allowed to do so. Prohibition proceedings were brought but the King's Bench agreed that the husband's release was bad being tainted with fraud. Nevertheless the report says: "All the justices "held that in regard this separation doth not avoid "the marriage absolutely but they still remained man "and wife."

LXX. Again in Powel v. Weeks, Trinity Term, 2 James I., C.B. (Noy's Reports, p. 108), the point is thus stated: "In dower it was resolved that a divorce "causâ adulterii is no bar of dower because it is but â "mensâ et thoro and not â vinculo matrimonii."

LXXI. In Rye v. Fuljambe, February 13, anno 44 Eliz., in the Star Chamber (Moore's Reports, p. 683), it was held that Fuljambe having divorced his first wife for adultery and married Rye's daughter, had contracted a void marriage with the latter, "quia le "primer divorce n'est que à mensâ et thoro et nemy â "vinculo matrimonii." The report adds that Archbishop Whitgift stated that he had summoned to Lambeth a body of the most wise divines and civilians, and that they all agreed in this view.

LXXII. There is another report of this case in Noy's Reports, p. 100, and it is also incorrectly summarised in 3 Salkeld's Reports, p. 137. It will be seen that this case which has sometimes been referred to as effecting a revolution in the then existing practice—a bringing of the law back to "its old state before the Reformation" (evidence before Select Committee of H.L., 1844, Q. 226, and 3 Salk., 137), was in fact in entire agreement, not only with other cases decided at about the same date, but also with the pre-existing practice so far as we know it.*

LXXIII. It may be well to add the testimony of Sir Edward Coke (1550–1634), who lived through the period under notice and was in the best possible position to obtain accurate knowledge of the matter. In his commentary on sec. 380 of Littleton's text (Coke upon Littleton, 235*a*, 1st ed., 1628), after enumerating causes of nullity of marriage, Coke continues: "A mensâ et "thoro as causâ adulterii, which dissolveth not the "marriage â vinculo matrimonii, for it is subsequent "to the marriage. And the divorce that Littleton "here speaketh of is intended of such divorces as "dissolve the marriage a vinculo matrimonii and "maketh the issue bastard because they were not "justæ nuptiæ. And therefore in Littleton's case "though the husband and wife be divorced causâ "adulterii yet the freehold continueth because the "coverture continueth."

LXXIV. In other words, Coke knew nothing of a marriage (valid when it was solemnised) being dissolved on account of the subsequent action of the parties. It seems to me inconceivable if the courts had been decreeing such sentences for the first 50 years of Coke's life, including a time when he occupied a most conspicuous position at the Bar, that he should have been ignorant of the fact.

LXXV. It would seem that this idea that during the latter half of the 16th century divorces â vinculo on the ground of adultery were granted by the Church courts, but that Fuljambe's case marks a change of opinion and of practice and a reversion to the old system of divorce â mensâ et thoro only, is founded on Salkeld's note on Fuljambe's case, to which reference has already been made. It is to be found at page 137 of the third volume of his Reports which was published in 1724, and therefore has no claim, so far as this case is concerned, to the authority of a contemporary record. Salkeld lived from 1671–1715. The passage runs thus:—

* The Bill and answer and the examination of the defendants on interrogatories exist in the Public Record Office (Star Chamber Proceedings, Eliz. R. 16.22. R. 38.5). The scrit was by Ed. Rye of Aston, in the county of York, father of Sarah Poage (widow). He alleged that Mrs. Poage being entitled through her late husband to the rectory and manor of Misterton, was persuaded by Hercules Fuljambe, who represented himself as a widower, to marry him and in contemplation of such marriage to grant him a lease of the rectory and manor for 40 years; and that it transpired that Fuljambe had one, if not two, wives still living, and that Mrs. Poage having left him, he retained forcible possession of the estate. By his answer Fuljambe alleged that the marriage and the lease were pressed on him by Mrs. Poage, and as to the other wives he pleaded as follows:—"Touching "the said marriage this defendant Hercules Fuljambe saith "that it is true that at the time of the said marriage with the "s[d] Sarah Poage there were two other gentlewomen living "who had been married to this defendant but this defendant "saith that he was informed by divers divines and civilians of "great account and learning whose counsel he used therein "was before his marriage with the said Sarah Poage was [sic] "lawfully and according to the ecclesiastical laws of this realm "divorced from the s[d] two gentlewomen which had been his "former wives and thereby lawfully might by the laws of God "and this realm as he was informed by the s[d] divines & "civilians lawfully marry again which s[d] divorces he this def[t] "hath, the one of them under the authentic seal of the "Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield and a copy of the other "under the hand of Mister Doctor Cosens [Dean of the "Arches]." The object of the suit was to regain possession of the estate on the ground that the marriage was bad and the lease fraudulent. Fuljambe in his answer makes but a faint attempt to defend the marriage but insists that he is not to blame and that the lease was obtained by him bonâ fide The Public Records tell us no more about the case so far as the marriage is concerned.

> "A divorce for adultery was anciently à vinculo matrimonii and therefore in the beginning of the reign of Queen Elizabeth the opinion of the Church of England was that after a divorce for adultery the parties might marry again; but in Foljambe's case, anno 44 Eliz. in the Star Chamber that opinion was changed. And Archbishop Bancroft upon the advice of divines held that adultery was only a cause of divorce a mensâ et thoro."

LXXVI. It was Whitgift and not Bancroft who had to do with the case and the Lambeth assembly of divines and civilians summoned by Whitgift was, it would seem, a private meeting quite outside the Court of the Star Chamber in which the Archbishop was probably one of the judges but not the sole judge. The writer was very likely right in thinking that the dominant opinion amongst leading Churchmen at the end of the 16th century differed materially from what it had been in the middle of the century. But he was merely jumping to a conclusion, and, I venture to think I have shown, a wrong conclusion, in assuming that the law of the Church of England and the practice of the Church courts had varied in accordance with the change of views of individual divines and doctors. The distinction which Salkeld has overlooked is really the key to the whole problem. Happily it has been made clear for us by a contemporary witness of first-rate competence in this context, viz., Bishop Lancelot Andrewes, who in 1601 wrote a "Discourse against second mar- "riage after sentence of Divorce with a former match, "the party then living" (Andrewes' Minor Works, Lib. A.C.T., p. 106). I am not concerned now with his arguments against remarriage after divorce but with the basis of fact on which he proceeds. He treats it as a matter beyond controversy and not denied that the Church courts did not grant divorce à vinculo, that the view which he desired to combat was confined to some latter divines, and that it had brought them into conflict with what he describes as "the present practice of the law ecclesiastical."

LXXVII. After discussing whether the act of adultery does not ipso facto dissolve the bond of marriage (the view taken in Parr's case, see post), Andrewes continues—

> "Secondly, the sentence as I take it doth not relieve for there is no lawful sentence of any court in case of divorce but it ever containeth an express inhibition to either party to marry with another, with intimation in flat terms that from the time that either of them shall go about any other marriage, quod ex tunc prout ex nunc et ex nunc prout ex tunc, (it is the style of the court,) that present sentence shall be void to all purposes and they in the same case as if it had never been given. These both failing, the word of God is sought to where let me tell you first, that during the primitive Church, even till now of late, the judgment of the divines and the present practice of the law ecclesiastical were both one; and great reason why; for well known it is, that the authority of the fathers was the ground of the ancient canons, by which the law in this case is ruled. So that but for the conceit of some latter divines, there need not be sought any opposition between law and divinity in this question, nor that pitiful distraction happen which we daily see, Divines to give their hands for licence to that, for which law will convent men and censure them too."

LXXVIII. In this context John Godolphin (1617–1678), though a writer of later date, ought perhaps to be quoted. His "Abridgment," a book of recognised importance in Ecclesiastical Law, was largely appropriated by Ayliffe (1675–1732) in compiling his "Parergon." The 36th chapter of the abridgment is entitled "Of Divorce as also of Alimony." His general treatment of the subject need not detain us, but in the following extract (p. 504, 3rd ed., 1687) he conveys very much the same impression as Andrewes as to the difference between the divines and the lawyers: "Although the doctors of divinity are much divided in "this point of second marriage whilst the divorced "parties are alive, yet the law generally seems much "more to favour such second marriages where the "divorce is ex causâ præcedenti than where it is ex causâ "subsequenti; for when it happens ex causâ precedenti as "when the degrees prohibited are violated, præ-contract, "frigidity in the man, impotency in the woman, or "other perpetual impediment, the marriage was void "and null ab initio, it being a rule and a truth in law "that non minus peccatum jungere non conjungendos "quam separare non separandos; but where the divorce "happens ex causâ subsequenti, there the marriage was "once good and valid in law and therefore (as some "hold) indissoluble and that such subsequent cause "have no influence quoad vinculum matrimonii but "only quoad separationem â mensâ et thoro which is "but a partial or temporal not a total or perpetual "divorce."

LXXIX. The divergence between the law and practice of the Church of England on the one hand and the opinions of individual members of that Church on the other could hardly be made plainer than in the above extracts. But the Marquis of Northampton, Parr's case, which has already been mentioned, provides a conspicuous illustration of the same divergence in a concrete case. Oddly enough this case, the facts of which do not seem to have been very carefully collected, has been cited as some proof that from 1550 to 1602 the law did not hold marriage to be indissoluble. (See Report of R.C. on Divorce, 1853, p. 8.) I proceed to summarise the facts of this case so far as I have ascertained them. They seem to me to show that even in a time of such great upheaval as 1547–52, even in the case of a nobleman of extraordinary influence and the highest official position, and notwithstanding the adverse opinion of great Churchmen like Archbishop Cranmer, the Law and Practice of the Church and its courts were not forced into inconsistency with their past, and Parliament had to be invoked to do what the Church courts could not or would not do.

LXXX. 1527, February 9.—William Parr married Anne Bourchier daughter of the Earl of Essex in the chapel of the Manor of Stanstead (London Marriage Licences: Harl. Soc., vol. 25, p. 5).

LXXXI. 1542.—William Parr divorced a mensâ et thoro on ground of his wife's adultery. "But she "being convicted of adultery he was divorced from "her which according to the law of the Ecclesiastical "Courts was only a separation from bed and board." (Burnet's History of the Reformation, Part II., Book I., p. 56.)

LXXXII. 1543.—An Act (34 & 35 Hen. VIII. ch. 43 [or 39]) passed bastardizing the issue of Anne Bourchier. (For Act see Roll of Parliament in H.L. Library. See also Lords' Journal, vol. I., pp. 217, 223, 224, 230, 233.)

LXXXIII. 1547.—Petition of W. Parr (Marquis of Northampton) to the King (Edward VI.) for a Commission "to determine whether your servant upon all and "every the circumstances of his only particular cause, "the man, state, form, quality and condition of both "the particular parties only pondered and considered "without determination of any general cause might "without the offence of God for the avoiding of "unlawful love whereunto all flesh is prone, and "the procreation of children which he necessarily "requireth, take to his wife in the life of the s[d] lady "the adultress any other lady or gentlewoman un- "married and lawful to take husband." (State Papers, Domestic, Edward VI., Vol. I., 1547, No. 32.)

LXXXIV. 1547, Ap. 19.—Commission by Letters Patent to Abp. Cranmer, Bp. Tunstal (Durham), Bp. Holbeach (Rochester), William May (Dean of St. Paul's), Simon Heynes (Deau of Exeter), John Redmayne and Nicholas Ridley (Doctors "sacræ theologiæ"), Thos.

Smyth (Doctor of Laws), and John Joseph (Bachelor "sacræ theologiæ") to determine, "an lege divinâ "licitum permissum ac tolerabile sit quod predictus "consanguineus et consiliarius noster (dicta domina "Anna naturaliter vivente) desponsare et in legitimo "matrimonio habere possit aliam quamvis virginem sive "mulierem nubilem." (Pat. Roll, 1 Edw. VI., Part 4, dors. of membrane 23 [27].) It should be noted that, in accordance with Parr's petition, the question was limited to the concrete one of his case. The general question was not submitted to the Commission.

LXXXV. 1547?—Parr married Elizabeth Brooke daughter of Lord Cobham. (Burnet's Hist. Ref., Part II., Book 1, p. 56. See also preamble to 5 & 6 Edw. VI. ch. , post).

LXXXVI. 1548, Jany. 28.—Upon sundry informations brought to the Lord Protector's Grace and Council that the Lord Marquis of Northampton his first wife living had married one named Mistress Elizabeth Cobham which informations were so set forth and aggrieved as being the thing strange "normelle" and against the law whereof being suffered to escape inreformed, namely in a person of such representation, might ensue many and great inconveniences to the whole realm; the same Marquis was commanded this day to present himself before their Grace and Lordships being assembled in council at Somerset Place besides the Strand and after the thing by them objected to him and by him confessed to be done accordingly, excusing nevertheless the fact for that as he said the same stood with the word of God, his first wife being proved an adultress; when many words and arguments had been controverted on behalfs of their Grace and Lordships and of the same Marquis, they commanded him to retire himself apart (as he did) and then weighing among themselves the importance of the case to be such as being either permitted or winked at might breed manifold disorders and inconveniences within the realm; it was by them ordered and accorded that the said Marquis and Mistress Elizabeth should from henceforth be sequestered and dwell apart in sort as the one should not resort to the other, she to remain and sojourn with the Queen's Grace [Katherine Parr, Northampton's sister] until the case should be at full heard and tried whether the same were consonant with the word of God or no; whereupon such further order should then be taken as should be convenient. (Acts of P.C., 1547–50, p. 164. Burnet's Hist. Ref., Part II., Book I., p. 56.)

LXXXVII. ? date.—Burnet states that the Commission now hurried forward their inquiry, and acting on advice which they received from certain "learned men" to whom questions had been propounded, reported in favour of the Marquis's marriage: and that upon this report the second wife was suffered to cohabit with the Marquis (Burnet's Hist. Ref., Part II., Book I., p. 58, and Doc. No. 20). The report is not known to be extant. Burnet's authority for the questions put to the "learned men," and their answers is a collection of MSS. amongst Archbishop Cranmer's papers in Lambeth Library (Lambeth MSS. No. 1108). There is nothing definite to connect these documents with the Parr case, though it is quite possible that they are so connected, and that Burnet's view about them is well-founded. The documents consist of—

(1) A collection of quotations from the Fathers, councils, &c. bearing on remarriage after divorce for adultery.
(2) A similar collection in another handwriting headed: "Quod non liceat post divortium "vivente priori conjuge secundas nuptias "contrahere." Possibly this is a first draft of No. (1).
(3) Eight questions. These are general questions as to whether the marriage tie can be dissolved at all in the life-time of the husband and wife, and, if so, for what causes. The answers to them would go far to enable the commissioners to report on the concrete question submitted to them, but they indicate a method of dealing with the matter, the very opposite to that which Parr suggested when he invited consideration to "his only particular cause" "without determination of any general cause."
(4) Answers to the eight questions of which the substance is that adultery ipso facto dissolves the tie of marriage, and that adultery is the sole ground on which valid Christian marriage can de dissolved. "Ipso adulterii facto matrimonii vinculum dirimi." "Ob solam "causam stupri dirimitur matrimonii vincu- "lum: cujus ipso quidem facto conjugii "dissolvitur nodus et loquimur de hiis qui "sacrosancti matrimonii jus agnoscunt."
(5) A paper in 19 paragraphs against the view taken in the eight answers.
(6) A paper replying to the points raised in these 19 paragraphs.
(7) A paper in five paragraphs in support of the view taken in the eight answers.
(8) A paper replying to the last-mentioned paper.

LXXXVIII. All these documents are stitched together but not in order, in fact in great disorder. The names of the writers or the persons responsible for the questions and answers and the other documents are not given. They are completely anonymous and undated, and, as has been said, do not mention the Parr case. It is said by Burnet that some of the documents bear traces of the handwriting of Cranmer. (See also Pocock's Observations in his edition of Burnet's Hist. Ref., Vol. II., pp. 117–21.)

LXXXIX. I am not aware that any record exists of any further action of the Council as a result of the report (if any) of the commission.

XC. 1551–2.—The statute 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. is entituled "An Act touching the marriage of the Marquis "of Northampton and the Lady Elizabeth." It recites that the Marquis was "at liberty by the laws of God to marry" and had done so four years previously. It is to be noted that neither the report of the commission nor the sentence of the spiritual court for divorce à mensâ et thoro nor the Reformatio Legum is relied on or even mentioned. After the recitals by way of preamble which have been mentioned, it is enacted that the marriage should be adjudged lawful, and the issue of it legitimate to all intents and purposes. "The s[d] former "marriage betwixt the said Marquis and Anne or any "decretal canon constitution ecclesiastical law common "law statute usage prescription or custom of this "realm to the contrary in anywise notwithstanding." (B.M. Miscellaneous No. 806 K., 15 (8).) Thus the remarriage was validated by an exercise of the overriding power of Parliament founded on the legislature's views of the effect of the laws of God, without any reliance on the law and practice of the Church courts, and indeed in express disregard of them.

XCI. 1553.—The Act was repealed by 1 Mary, Stat. 2., ch. 33 [40] (see Statutes of the Realm). Having regard to the allegation which has been made that the Reformatio Legum was in fact adopted in practice during the last half of the 16th century it is well to note the differences between the opinions apparently acted on in the Northampton case and the Reformatio Legum. In the former it was laid down that adultery ipso facto dissolves the tie of marriage and that adultery is the only ground of divorce à vinculo. In the Reformatio (caps. 5, 1, 17) it is made clear that a dissolution cannot be effected but by the action of a court. Further the Reformatio allows divorce on many other grounds besides that of adultery. The Northampton case, especially if we believe Burnet's account of the Cranmer MSS., may justly be cited as evidence that in Edward VI.'s reign there was strong support, amongst leading Churchmen, for the view that adultery furnished a valid ground for the complete dissolution of marriage so that at least the innocent party could remarry: and further that this view was adopted, at that date, by Parliament. But the case not only does not help, it goes far to refute, the contention that the Ecclesiastical Courts, or the Church of England of which those courts are the judicial executive, endorsed and acted on the opinions thus professed by important individuals and by Parliament. Still less does the Northampton case furnish any justification for the assertion that the Reformatio Legum was ever in actual operation in England.

XCII. While the Ecclesiastical Courts administer the laws of the Church of England, the Church acting through her Convocations, with the licence and assent of the Crown, can make new laws or canons, by which changes in the ecclesiastical law, binding on the clergy in their official capacity, are effected. As this is the only constitutional way in which the Church of England can legislate for herself, canons are rightly regarded as a most important expression of the "mind of the Church" on any matter. It is desirable, however, to add that the canons of 1603–4 are not themselves standards of Church teaching, like the 39 Articles. With rare exceptions they are merely disciplinary byelaws designed to enforce the observance of laws, some ecclesiastical and others civil, which exist independently of the canons and for the breach of which the canons provide a penalty.

XCIII. It has already been pointed out that no canon dealing with Divorce was enacted subsequently to the breach with Rome, until 1597, when certain canons were made which were subsequently embodied in the general collection of constitutions and canons of 1603–4 which is still in force. The canons of 1597 were issued in Latin only, but those of 1603–4 were contemporaneously published in Latin* and in English. The 6th canon of 1597 entitled "De sententiis divortii non temere ferendis" is substantially similar to, though not identical with, the 105th, 106th, 107th, and 108th canons in their Latin form, and we may confine our attention to the latter. The 105th canon entitled "Pro conjugio dirimendo nuda partium confessio non audienda" begins as follows: — "Quoniam matri- " moniales causæ inter graviores semper habitæ fuerint " et propterea majorem cautelam desiderent; siquando " in judiciis veniant disceptandæ, presertim cum matri- " monium in ecclesiâ debite solemnizatum, quovis " nomine separari vel nullum pronunciari postulatur; " stricte mandamus et præcipimus ut in omnibus " divortiorum et nullitatis matrimonii processibus " circumspecte et deliberate procedatur," &c. The English version of the above is as follows: "Forasmuch " as matrimonial causes have been always reckoned " and reputed among the weightiest and therefore " require the greater caution when they come to be " handled and debated in judgment especially in " causes wherein matrimony, having been in the Church " duly solemnized is required upon any suggestion or " pretext whatsoever to be dissolved or annulled: we " do strictly charge and enjoin that in all proceedings " to divorce and nullities of marriage good circum- " spection and advice be used," &c.

XCIV. The 106th canon, entitled "Sententiæ divortii et separationis non nisi pro tribunali ferendæ," begins as follows:—"Nullæ inposterum sententiæ vel separa- " tionis a thoro et mensâ vel nullitatis matrimonii " prætensi ferantur, nisi publice," &c. The English version (title) "No sentence for Divorce to be given but in open Court," runs thus: "No sentence shall be given " either for separation a thoro et mensâ or for annulling " of pretended matrimony but in open Court," &c.

XCV. The 107th canon, entitled "Separatis eorum altero superstite, nova copula interdicta," is as follows:— " In sententiis quando ad separationem thori et mensæ " tantum interponuntur monitio et prohibitio in ipso " contextu sententiæ lata fiet ut a partibus abinvicem " dissociatis caste vivatur nec ad alias nuptias alterutra " vivente, convoletur. Denique quo postremum illud " firmius observetur sententia separationis non ante " pronunciabitur quam qui eam postulabunt idoneam " cautionem interposuerint se contra dictam monitionem " et prohibitionem nihil commissuros." The English version (title) "In all sentences for divorce, Bond to be " taken for not marrying during each other's life" is as follows:—"In all sentences pronounced only for " divorce and separation a thoro et mensâ there shall " be a caution and restraint inserted in the act of the " s[d] sentence, That the parties so separated shall live " chastely and continently neither shall they during " each other's life contract matrimony with any other " person. And for the better observation of this last " clause the said sentence of divorce shall not be " pronounced until the party or parties requiring the " same have given good and sufficient caution and " security into the court that they will not any way " break or transgress the said restraint or prohibition."

XCVI. The 108th canon is immaterial for the present purpose.

XCVII. Now the importance of these canons for the purpose of ascertaining whether the Church of England recognised in 1604 divorce à vinculo with its consequence of possible remarriage is crucial. If divorce à vinculo matrimonii debite solemnizati was then recognised, these canons containing rules to be applied to all divorce suits must have dealt with it. If they do not, it can only be because the Church courts had no jurisdiction to grant divorce à vinculo, and therefore no rules need be made or could be made about it. But when the canons are read, as they should be, in Latin as well as English, it becomes clear that the canons deal only with divorces a mensâ et thoro and cases of nullity of marriage and not with divorce à vinculo. The Latin form of the 105th canon, although in the English version it is made to cover marriages "dissolved" as well as marriages "annulled," shows that these words are intended to be equivalent to "separari vel nullum pronunciari," which can only describe separations from bed and board and nullities. It should, however, be mentioned that the report of the Royal Commission on Divorce, 1853 (p. 8), quoting the English version of this canon (which is cited as the 105th canon of 1597), and ignoring the Latin, relies on it as strong proof that "marriage was not held by " the Church and therefore was not held by the law " to be indissoluble."

XCVIII. Again, the 106th canon is in terms confined to cases of separation and nullity. There is therefore no provision for cases of divorce à vinculo being heard in open court. Assume this jurisdiction existed and the canon becomes absurd by making provision for the less grave cases and not for the more grave ones.

XCIX. Finally the 107th canon is, both by its terms and by the subject matter of it, confined to separations from bed and board. It appears that none of these canons refer to divorce à vinculo, for which, therefore, no provision at all has been made, a state of things only consistent with divorce à vinculo having no place in the law of the Church of England.

C. Another argument has been raised on the 107th canon which it will be remembered requires a bond to be given by a party applying for a separation from bed and board. This bond was for 100*l*., which the party bound himself to pay to the judge of the court if the condition of the bond was broken. The condition was as follows: "If therefore the s[d] A.B. shall not at any " time hereafter intermarry with any other person " during the life time of the s[d] E.F. then this obli- " gation to be void or else to remain in full force and " virtue" (Coote's Ecclesiastical Practice, p. 344). It is said that "the very fact of enjoining a prohibitory " bond implies that the marriage which the bond was " intended to prevent would have been valid (Report Divorce Com., 1853, p. 8). I think it must have been overlooked that a similar "caution and security" is required by the 101st canon to guard against impediments of marriage of all sorts (e.g., the nearest relationship) being disregarded. But I venture to think a consideration of the nature of the sentence of separation à mensâ et thoro makes this inference I have quoted from the Report of the Divorce Commission, 1853, impossible.

CI. The 107th canon deals only with such separations, and as a matter of fact the form of sentence in these cases contained a clause expressly making the separation terminable on reconciliation "donec et " quousque mutuo eorum consensu sese duxerint recon-

" ciliandos." Fayrfax v. Fayrfax. Delegates, 1539–44, P.R.O. Del. Acts, Vol. I., folios 383–4; "Until they do better agree," 1566. Hale's Precedents, No. CCCCXLI.; "donec et quousque Deo sic juvante et disponente " contigerit eos in debitam gratiam redire et se " invicem maritali affectione tractare et amplecti," 1666. Neave v. Neave. Arches Sentences, 1664–6, No. 96: "Until they shall be reconciled to each other," 1846. Coote's Ecclesiastical Practice, p. 347. (See also Clarke's Praxis, Tit. CXIII.) That a sentence, which purported to suspend cohabitation until reconciliation, could not have had the effect of rendering a fresh marriage, in the meantime, "valid," is a proposition which does not seem to require elaborate argument. But the express caution to the parties not to attempt remarriage, and the bond exacting a penalty for disregard of the caution were, we may readily believe, quite necessary to guard against persons who had been divorced à mensà et thoro, persuading others to go through some form of marriage with them under cover of the sentence of separation. There was every facility for wrong doing of this kind because irregular marriages without banns or licence, and even, probably, marriages by verba de presenti, without any officiating clergyman or religious ceremony, were recognised in the then state of the law. But the well-known instance of Laud's being induced as a young man and to his life-long regret, to marry his patron Blount, Earl of Devonshire, to the separated (à mensà et thoro) wife of Lord Rich* shows that the danger to be provided against was by no means confined to ignorant persons and "irregular" marriages. It was also aggravated by the possibility that people in their eagerness to remarry would avail themselves of the theory apparently acted on in the Northampton case and claim that the unfaithfulness of a partner had ipso facto released them from the bond of a former marriage. Moreover, it must be borne in mind that the anomalous condition of the ecclesiastical law rendered it additionally important to take every practicable means to prevent illegal unions from being formed. Once formed under the guise of an alleged marriage, the most lawless and even disgusting connection (e.g., between brother and sister) needed a suit for its effective annulment. This was required not to make such a marriage void, for it was void ab initio, but in order that its invalidity might be acted on it was necessary that there should be a sentence declaring it void. A suit for this purpose could only be brought in the lifetime of both the parties to the so-called marriage, and in the absence of a suit, incestuous and probably even bigamous unions might pass uncondemned and the children of them be treated as legitimate It is hardly surprising that this very regrettable state of things has been sometimes mistaken for acquiesence by the law in the irregularities which it failed adequately to suppress. There is, however, no more reason for saying that remarriages after separation were regarded as valid, because they were not always effectively annulled, than there would be for making the same claim with regard to incestuous unions between near relatives. The essential invalidity in such cases is not dependent upon or affected by the presence or absence of a judicial sentence. (See Fenton v. Livingstone, 3 Macqueen's Reports, 497, in the House of Lords.)

CII. A somewhat similar argument has been advanced, founded on the Bigamy Act (1 Jas. I., ch. 11). Under this Act death was made the penalty for bigamy, which was declared to be a felony. Certain exceptions were however made and amongst them was a proviso: "That this Act nor anything therein contained shall " extend to any person or persons that are or shall be " at the time of such marriage divorced by any " sentence had or hereafter to be had in the ecclesiastical court or to any person or persons where the " former marriage has been or hereafter shall be by " sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court declared to be " void," &c.

CIII. On this it is said: "Now we can hardly " suppose that the Legislature intended to declare in " one and the same breath that bigamy was felony and " yet that a second marriage after divorce, living the " first wife was not to be considered in that light " unless it conceived that the sentence passed in the " Ecclesiastical Court has worked a dissolution of the " marriage contract." (Report of Divorce Commission, 1853, p. 9.) Again, the inference is by no means necessary. Bigamy was already punishable like other forms of immorality in the Ecclesiastical Courts. But the effect of the Act was to make it a capital crime, and it was surely not unreasonable for Parliament, without acknowledging the validity of attempted remarriages after separation by sentence, to recognise a moral difference between them and ordinary bigamy and to provide that such unions, then certainly existing in influential quarters, and perhaps more common in the higher than in the humbler class, should not be visited with the extreme penalty of death. That this is substantially what was meant we learn from Coke, who was Attorney-General at the time and probably closely connected with the preparation and passage through Parliament of this Bill. In his 3rd Institute, cap. xxvii. he comments on this Act, and with reference to this proviso, says, "There be two kinds of divorce the one " that dissolveth the marriage a vinculo matrimonii as " for precontract, consanguinity &c. and the other " à mensà et thoro as for adultery, because that divorce " by reason of adultery cannot dissolve the marriage " a vinculo matrimonii for that the offence is after the " just and lawful marriage. This branch in respect " of the generality of the words privilege the offender " from being a felon as well in the case of the divorce " à mensà et thoro as when it is à vinculo matrimonii " and yet in the second case of the divorce a mensà " et thoro, the second marriage is void, living the " former wife or husband. And if there be a divorce " a vinculo matrimonii and the adverse party appeal, " which is continuance of the former marriage and " suspend the sentence, yet after such a divorce the " party marrying is no felon within this statute in " respect of the generality of this branch, although the " marriage be not lawful."

CIV. In Porter's Case, 1637, Cro. Chas. 461, the judges on a prosecution under the Act doubted (but see Hale's Pleas of the Crown, i. 693, and Middleton's Case, Kelyng's Reports, p. 27, an. 1638) whether a marriage after a sentence de mensà &c. for cruelty was really within the exception of the Act, but it is stated in the report that judges and counsel and "all the civilians and others" agreed that the former connection continued and the second marriage was unlawful. In another case (1641) reported in March's Reports, p. 101, one Williams who had married after having divorced his first wife for adultery was held to be within the exception. One of the judges is reported to have said that while divorce for cruelty was only a cohabitatione divorce for adultery was a vinculo matrimonii; also that remarriage was allowed in the latter case "by the law of Holy Church" but not without licence"! These are, of course, mistakes of fact, for which probably the reporter is responsible. (See "Baron and Fume," 1738, p. 442.)

CV. While however the attempt to infer from the Bigamy Act that the validity of marriage after divorce was recognised by Parliament seems unwarranted, the Act by the width of the exception certainly suggests both that the number or influence of those who had remarried after divorce was considerable and also that public opinion was not disposed to treat such persons

* This case is instructive from another point of view. It shows that remarriage after divorce was not regarded at the beginning of the 17th century with easy tolerance. The marriage was in 1605. According to Heylin (Life of Laud, pp. 53, 54)—"The Earl found presently such an alteration in " the King's countenance towards him and such a lessening " of the value which formerly had been set upon him that he " was put to a necessity of writing an apology to defend his " action. But finding how little it edified both in Court and " country, it wrought such a sad impression on him that he " did not much survive the mischief, ending his life before " the end of the year next following." It ought, however, to be added that Lady Rich was the guilty party and the Earl her seducer. On his death the authorities decided that, as Lady Rich was not the Earl's lawful wife, her name could not be quartered with his for the purpose of his funeral pageant. (Baildon's Cases in Star Chamber [1593–1609], p. 444.)

as mere criminals. It seems to me another illustration of what has been already noticed in another context, namely, the prevalence of a looser practice in the society of the time than the law either of the Church or of the realm endorsed. Although it belongs to a period (1553) 50 years before the Bigamy Act, the following passage from Strype's Memorials, Book II., ch. XXIII., p. 443, is worth perusal for its reference to the actual condition of the people: "The nation now became "scandalous also for the frequency of divorces; especially "among the richer sort. Men would be divorced from "their wives with whom they had lived many years, and "by whom they had children, that they might satisfy "their lusts with other women, whom they began to "like better than their present wives. That which gave "occasion also to these divorces was the covetousness "of the nobility and gentry, who used often to marry "their children when they were young boys and girls; "that they might join land to land, possession to "possession, neither learning, nor virtuous education, "nor suitableness of tempers and dispositions regarded: "and so when the married persons came afterwards to "be grown up, they disliked many times each other, "and then separation and divorce and matching to "others that better liked them, followed; to the "breach of espousals and the displeasure of God. "These divorces and whoredoms (a great cause "of them) had especially stained the last reign "[Henry VIII.] and introduced themselves into "this . . ."

CVI. I think, therefore, the answer to the question whether the Reformatio Legum was acted on in matrimonial causes during the latter half of the 16th century must be in the negative. I confess I should have supposed that a mere recital of the regulations and penalties laid down in the Reformatio with regard to this subject (see ante) would be enough to convince anyone that it never was and never could have been a practical working code. There is not so far as I know, either in judicial records or in history, any trace of its ever having been acted on. But further, I venture to think that the fair result of an examination of the materials collected in this memorandum is that the law of the Church of England as to the indissolubility of marriage and the corresponding practice of the Church courts remained unchanged throughout the period under notice, that is, from before the Reformation until after the present canons of 1603–4 came into operation. The leading writers on ecclesiastical practice, the records of the Ecclesiastical Courts so far as we can consult them, the references to the subject in civil proceedings, the writings of public men of the day like Coke and Andrewes, the canons of 1603–4, and last but not least the intervention of Parliament in order to dissolve a marriage, when that was really intended, all agree and all point to the conclusion I have stated. Side by side with this adherence to the old standards of law and practice there was, as has already been said, a widespread relaxation of opinion with regard to divorce, a change which was largely confined to an admission of the right "according to God's law" of a man, who had divorced his wife for adultery, to remarry. But there would also appear to have been a general slipping away from old convictions which probably produced amongst all classes vaguely revolutionary notions as to the nature and permanence of the marriage tie, notions which in that licentious and unsettled age men were not slow to put in practice.

The Hon. HENRY GORELL BARNES re-called and further examined.

34,943. (Chairman.) There is one document I want to put in. When the Maritime Conference was assembled in London in the course of the month of August there were a number of distinguished jurists here from abroad, and there were amongst them Dr. Alfred Sieveking, son of the great Dr. Sieveking, of Hamburg, who was a very well-known man, and the son is following in his father's steps as a great lawyer, and I ventured to ask him if he could give me any information as to the Parliamentary proceedings in Germany which had led them to adopt insanity as a ground for divorce. The Commissioners will recollect that is one of the grounds in the German Code. Of course we get the law from the Code, but how that law was reached was not easy to ascertain, except from somebody who had practical knowledge like Mr. Sieveking. He has been good enough to send over, and I think Mr. Secretary you now produce, the Memorandum which was sent over, showing the arguments and the divisions that took place in the German Parliament on this important subject, and if you will turn to the end of it you will find the division numbers given on which the clause was carried and passed?—In the last paragraph: "Parliament third reading. The amendment was "again brought and strongly supported by the Ministers "of Justice of Prussia and Saxony. The amendment "was carried by a vote of 161 to 133. Thus insanity "became a ground for divorce."

34,944. I only want to put that in that we may study it. Copies have been sent round, I think?—Yes, copies have been sent to the Commissioners.

The following is the Memorandum referred to:—

MEMORANDUM sent to the CHAIRMAN by Dr. A. SIEVEKING, of Hamburg.

Mental Insanity and Divorce in Germany.

I. Previous to the enactment of the Civil Code in 1900 the diversity of laws with regard to divorce was very great.

The Canonical (Catholic) law was very adverse to any kind of divorce, and admitted merely a separate quoad thorum et mensum, and this only in the case of default (adultery, &c.). This law prevailed, for instance, in Bavaria.

The Protestant Church Law allowed a divorce also only on account of faults committed by husband or wife (adultery, desertion, &c.).

The Prussian Law of 1797 gave a decree for divorce also on account of incurable mental insanity, incurable bodily diseases, and even on account of mutual unsurmountable aversion. This is explained by people at that period looking on marriage as upon a simple contract, and by Frederick the Great wanting to re-people his territories.

The laws of the Kingdom of Saxony, Baden, Nuremberg, Schwarzburg, Londershausen, Saxe-Altenburg admitted mental insanity, if not curable, as a ground for divorce.

Hessen, the French Civil Code (in force in the Rhenish Provinces) admitted divorce only in case husband or wife were guilty of an offence (adultery, desertion, &c.). The same was the law in Hamburg.

II. The First Commission for the drafting of a civil code, consisting of 11 lawyers, and sitting from 1874 to 1880, refused to establish mental insanity as a ground for divorce. This Commission granted a case for divorce only on account of husband or wife being guilty of certain offences. The principal reason for not admitting lunacy besides the one mentioned (lunacy not being an offence) was the impossibility of discriminating between the various phases of mental diseases and of actually stating mental death.

III. The Second Commission, consisting of 16 lawyers, three big landowners, a miner, a brewer, a commissioner of forests and a merchant, and sitting from 1890 to 1895, admitted lunacy as a ground for divorce for the reason that it existed already in the greater part of Germany, and that not granting a divorce in such a case would destroy the family life of the members of the family. But divorce was granted only if—

(a) the disease is incurable, and this fact has been established during three years' confinement in an asylum;

(b) the connubial and domestic union does no longer exist; and

(c) there is no longer a question of any mental union between husband and wife.

Furthermore the lunatic has to be provided for just in the same way as if divorce had been granted on account of the other party having been guilty of some offence (adultery, &c.).

The paragraph then inserted into the code admits a divorce on the ground of mental insanity, provided

(1) the mental insanity has lasted three years after conclusion of marriage;

(2) that at the end of the three years the disease has attained such a degree that all mental union between husband and wife has been lost;

(3) that all prospects are lost of ever restoring the mental union.

IV. The Parliamentary Commission struck this paragraph out again and restored the draft of the First Commission, principally for moral and religious reasons (demoralising effects upon children where they see that one parent makes use of the infirmity of the other in order to be married a second time).

V. Parliament second reading rejected, with 125 to 116 votes, the amendment proposed in favour of the report of the Second Commission and adhered to the views expressed by the Parliamentary Commission (formed in accordance with the first reading of the Bill).

(a) The views expressed by the Catholics and the Conservatives and supported by the official representatives of the Government of Mecklenburg and Bavaria was that, although poor people would feel a rejection of this ground for divorce more heavily than rich persons, it should be considered that once you grant a divorce for other reasons than certain offences on the part of husband or wife, there was no reason for stopping at mental insanity, but divorce would be granted also for bodily disease, nay, for mental disaffection—that it is very difficult to state whether a disease is actually incurable or not—that great physicians held that there was no case of actual incurability and that, therefore, the proposed amendment would never apply—that a lunatic is still a being and that a misfortune God has sent should not be interfered with, but borne with patience and humility.

(b) The view expressed by the Liberals and Social Democrats and supported by the Prussian Government runs thus:—"Provided all the "requirements of the amendment (of supra "sub. III) have been fulfilled, a mentally "dead man is just as dead as a bodily dead "man, and if you maintain that a lunatic is "still a being, you should not then declare a "marriage dissolved by death, because the "soul is still living . . . divorce is granted "only if every prospect of ever restoring the "mental community is absolutely precluded "and if the lunatic is so insane that there is "not left even the slightest degree of a com-"munity between husband and wife—in case "of doubt, no divorce. If not granted you "deprive a poor family of a mother and the "husband of a housekeeper, house and child-"ren can no longer be looked after but will "of necessity be left to the care of the parish "(as paupers), whilst the husband is driven to "the prostitution, instead of being allowed "to marry and give a mother to his children "(rich people, of course, can engage a gover-"ness or the like). The lunatic himself is "bodily provided for by the other parent "being compelled to provide for him just "as if the divorce had been granted for an "offence (adultery, for instance) of the other "parent. The lunatics often have a long "life; nor room therefore for the other "parent to expect a speedy delivery. By "far the majority of German inhabitants "(about 40 millions) live under laws granting "this case of divorce. In Saxony there have "been very few cases of the lunatic having "recovered after having been divorced, in "Prussia never such a case happened—a "general law should not be altered for the "sake of a few exceptions: errors are com-"mitted everywhere, also in cases of divorce "on the ground of adultery. The amend-"ment does not make it a case of incurability "(partial insanity might be incurable too), "but of absolute and never to be restored "again dissolution of mental community "between husband and wife through mental "insanity. Several physicians of renown in "Alsatia were strongly in favour of admitting "this ground for divorce, because not doing "so would be the ruin of many families "thereby affected. Poor families lose their "provider (in case the husband turns a "lunatic) without being able to get another "one."

VI. Parliament third reading. The amendment was again brought and strongly supported by the Ministers of Justice of Prussia and Saxony. The amendment was carried by a vote of 161 to 133. Thus insanity became a ground for divorce.

Sir JAMES CRICHTON-BROWNE called and examined.

34,945. (Chairman.) Sir James Crichton-Browne?—That is my name.

34,946. May I take it your qualifications are summarised at the head of your Memorandum?—I am the Lord Chancellor's Visitor.

34,947. The Lord Chancellor's Visitor, and you are M.D., LL.D., Doctor of Science and F.R.S.?—Yes.

34,948. When you say the Lord Chancellor's Visitor you mean in the asylums?—In lunacy; not necessarily asylums.

34,949. You have been good enough to prepare a Memorandum of the views which you entertain?—Yes, I have.

34,950. If you would kindly take it from me the Commissioners have had that Memorandum before them, and I am going to ask you the leading points in it. Some of it, if I might venture to say so, is argumentative, but what I want to get mostly is facts and grounds. I will ask you first what your view is as to making incurable insanity a ground for divorce?—Well, I should like to supplement the Memorandum I have sent in on that subject. I had not then seen any of the evidence given before the Commission. Since then I have had the opportunity of reading the evidence reported in the "Times" of three eminent medical men given last week. I presume the Commissioners understood that these gentlemen were speaking on their own responsibility, not as representatives of the British Medical Association, though nominated as witnesses by it. That is an Association numbering, I suppose, some 25,000 medical men.

34,951. I think we understood that?—I quite believe that the majority of that Association might agree with the views placed before you; but as these gentlemen were unanimous, and as the opinion of the Association has not been taken, I thought it might be as well to point out that there would be a very strong body of opinion on the opposite side; though I believe they might represent the majority.

34,952. They were selected by the Association to give evidence?—Yes, but it is only the Council that has nominated these gentlemen as witnesses; it is not necessarily the view of the Association which they expressed. I offered in my memorandum some tentative figures as to the mental condition of patients admitted to asylums. I have altered these figures up to the last year. I said that there were 21,764 patients admitted to asylums in England and Wales during 1909. According to the forms of insanity given by the Commissioners 6,000 might be classified as labouring under forms of mental disease, congenital and acquired, about the incurability of which there could be no doubt. Of the remaining 15,000, 8,000 to 9,000 would be acute recoverable cases, leaving some

6,000 to 7,000 in those groups in which recovery is not likely, but will take place in a certain number of cases. Since that I have made a calculation that might, I think, be of some interest. Taking the whole number of lunatics, idiots, and persons of unsound mind in asylums—in institutions—in England and Wales on the 1st January last I divide them into three groups, taking them roundly at 130,000. There will be 56,000 married persons, there will be 56,000 single persons, and there will be 18,000 widowed persons; that is, in round numbers. This gives the number of married at one time as 56,000 for whom divorce would be possible, but assuming that divorce was not permitted until three or five years of persistent insanity, this number would have to be largely reduced, for numbers of the insane in asylums being advanced in age become widowed during their detention, so that at the end of the five years the number of the widowed would have increased largely. The death rate (again in round numbers) is about 10 per cent. per annum on the average number of resident patients. The rate of recovery is also about 10 per cent. per annum, so that from the total at the end of the first year we should have to deduct 5,600 for death, 5,600 for discharge, recovered or relieved, leaving married at the end of the year 44,800. The death rate and recovery rate are very much heavier amongst the new admissions, and I have no reliable data showing these rates in patients during the 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 5th years of detention, but I calculate that in these four years they could not total less than 10,000, which would reduce the surviving married persons to 34,800 at the end of five years. Of the patients admitted annually 1,000 are over 65 years of age, so that if that were the limit another 5,000 would have to be deducted, leaving the divorcible insane at 29,000. Of these a considerable proportion would be still recoverable or dying. I do not believe that the cases of persons of more than five years duration of insanity in asylums to whom any change in the law of divorce could possibly apply would exceed 20,000, and as regards a large proportion of these there would be no unanimity of medical opinion as to whether they were recoverable or not. I should not be surprised if the number fell under 15,000. It would be very interesting to obtain from our asylums a return of the number of the married and single and of the widowed admitted during any one year surviving at the end of each of the following five years.

34,953. I think you may take it that the statistics will give us most of that information?—Then might I say I have prepared some other figures beyond my Memorandum. I would like, if I may be permitted, to say something as to the different forms of mental disease which were mentioned by Dr. Clouston, who is a very eminent authority. Various forms of mental disease have been named, but many of these are not sharply defined. One so-called form of insanity passes into another. And there are many cases which one medical man would classify under one form and another under another. There is often great uncertainty of diagnosis. There is no form of insanity more definitely marked and more readily diagnosed than general paralysis of the insane, but I find that according to the Commissioners' Report 1,681 patients died of it in 1909, whereas the admissions diagnosed to be general paralysis were 1,336 in number. But general paralysis is a disease of two or three years' duration, and does not certainly arise during treatment in an asylum. The difference in the figures simply means corrected diagnosis by prolonged observation, confirmed in a very large proportion of cases by post-mortem examination. Cases proved to be general paralysis that were not originally recognised as such. Is it not possible that cases of insanity diagnosed incurable might prove curable after all. Medical psychology has not yet attained to the exactitude of chemistry, toxicology, or ophthalmology. Insanity is still in many instances a very uncertain and incalculable quantity, and were it admitted as a ground for divorce, a rich field would be opened to expert evidence and prediction. In many cases diametrically opposite opinions would be expressed, and there would be costly litigation. You might have the children opposing a father or a mother's petition for divorce. Dr. Clouston enumerates several forms of insanity, and would apparently fix different durations of continuance of insanity as a ground for divorce in different forms. But medical men are not all agreed as to the classification of the different forms of insanity. The Medico-Psychological Association has proposed a classification adopted by the Commissioners in Lunacy, and generally in asylums in this country; but that is subject to amendment with the progress of pathological science, and there are cases which one medical man would describe as one form, and another as another. One form passes into another. The first form mentioned by Dr. Clouston is secondary or terminal dementia, which he declares to be absolutely incurable. I do not agree with him about that, as I have seen patients emerge quite well from what has been called secondary dementia. But secondary or terminal dementia is consecutive to some primary and presumably curable form. Where is the dividing line in such cases to be drawn. There will be a period, perhaps a prolonged period, when it will be doubtful whether the incurable stage has been reached. In a very large proportion of pronounced cases of secondary dementia incurability may be safely predicted, but mistakes will occur, and in a considerable number of cases of this kind I have seen recovery take place in wards of the Court of Chancery, a supersedeas being accordingly granted. I have made a list of 26 Chancery lunatics superseded since 1896. One had been insane, counting from the date of the Inquisition, for 21 years, and probably for two or three years before that; one for 19 years; one for 17 years; one for 14 years; one for 11 years; one for 9 years; one for 8 years; one for 7 years; three for 5 years; two for 4 years; three for 3 years; five for 2 years; four for 1 year; and one for eight months. Many of these cases would have been put down as terminal or secondary dementia. I might mention a case I saw not long ago of a gentleman in North Wales who had been for 11 years supposed to be in a state of terminal dementia. He had never moved nor spoken, and had all his food placed in his mouth by his attendants. Suddenly, one day he arose, began to converse, and manifested complete intelligence. He told me that he had a great gap in his life; and for some time after that he was happily engaged in carpentry and gardening. Since then I believe he has gone to the other extreme and become excited. I only mention that as a case that would have been pronounced incurable by a number of experts. I saw three days ago a lady who had been labouring under spiritualistic delusions and hallucinations for 17 or 18 years; but the other day she repudiated them to me and said she must have been mistaken. That is a form of delusional insanity in which recovery might take place. The next form of mental disease mentioned by Dr. Clouston is organic dementia due to gross lesions of the brain accompanied by more or less paralysis, sometimes by aphasia. Patients thus afflicted are almost invariably advanced in life, it is due to vascular degeneration; generally the giving way of a blood-vessel, and they almost invariably die within a few years of the attack. Divorce questions are not likely to arise in such cases, and I would like to emphasize the fact that there are several kinds of mental disease, general paralysis, and gross organic disease of the brain, for instance, that naturally terminate in three years, and if a five years' limit were fixed for divorce they would have all ended and been cleared out of the way before divorce became allowable. Dr. Clouston next refers to general paralysis, which for practical purposes may be regarded as an incurable disease. It is due to a specific toxin or antitoxin, as is now all but universally believed, of syphilitic derivation. It may be that some effectual anti-body may be discovered. Dr. Clouston thinks that possible—although I would doubt the efficiency of any anti-body to remove the organic brain changes it causes after its very earliest stage. The disease is sometimes arrested, but such cases are very rare and it may still be regarded as incurable. As, however, it ends fatally in two or three years there would be, I presume, no divorce question—and I think it would be scarcely decent to divorce a dying man, for a general paralytic is dying all the time. The discovery of an anti-body would of course render divorce still less necessary if it was to secure recovery. Dr. Clouston next refers to epileptic insanity, an often hereditary, and very intractable form of mental trouble. In advanced cases of epileptic dementia incurability may be safely affirmed, but I feel quite sure that in a large majority of these cases the patient is single, the epilepsy having originated in early life or at puberty and having proved a bar to marriage. But there are several different kinds of epilepsy, and epileptic fits may recur from time to time for a lifetime without any marked degree of mental deterioration. I have known men subject to occasional epileptic fits who have held important public positions with usefulness and distinction. Pronounced epilepsy—epilepsia gravior—even when unaccompanied by mental symptoms other than these grouped round the fit should be a bar to marriage, both because of its hereditary nature, because of the incessant domestic anxiety it must cause, and because of the dangerous impulses which are sometimes developed; epilepsy is often a dangerous form of disease. But epilepsy shades off through petit mal into slight momentary mental aberration or muscular spasm, especially during adolescence, which need not I think contra-indicate matrimony, and I believe at a discussion at the British Medical Association it was agreed that there are certain cases that occur at puberty that should not be a bar to marriage. Dr. Clouston next deals with idiots and imbeciles. With them, properly so-called, no question of divorce can occur and as regards the feeble-minded no such question should be allowed to arise. The man who has knowingly or unknowingly married a weak-minded woman should be left to bear the consequences of his disgraceful or rash action. Sometimes a weak-minded woman might be inveigled into a marriage—that has happened—and then be placed under care and got rid of.

34,954. Would your view be with regard to that class of person that the State is not doing sufficient to prevent marriage?—Oh, undoubtedly so—the segregation of certain classes of the weak-minded is advisable. I do not think the number is as large as has been represented. There are a number of cases already segregated—the markedly idiotic and imbecile. Beyond these there are the feeble-minded. There is a certain section that are perfectly harmless, but there is another section which, in the case of women, should be segregated till they are 45 years of age, and of men that ought to be permanently segregated. But that is a very large question.

34,955. We have had views presented as to the desirability of possibly preventing the procreation of children by persons unfit for the purpose?—What am I to understand by prevention, my Lord; detention or segregation? I cannot think of any surgical intervention as tolerable.

34,956. No, I have not suggested any means, but we have had it presented that at some time or another the State should take more care with regard to the entering into marriage of such persons?—Yes, I agree with that.

34,957. That is your view?—Yes, undoubtedly. With reference to "delusional insanity" monomania, paranoia, Dr. Clouston admits that divorce proceedings would give great pain and aggravate the disease—it would be very distressing in some cases—and he would not, therefore, in such cases sanction divorce proceedings till the end of 10 years. The man or woman who has waited 10 years for divorce may, I think, be content to wait a little longer. In such cases recovery sometimes occurs even after 10 years, and I have known recovery take place quite suddenly as if the delusions had dropped out of the mind. Then, as regards alcoholic insanity, Dr. Clouston strongly recommends divorce proceedings, because those suffering from it had brought on their disease by their own acts. I do not agree with him. In a large number of cases the intemperance that has eventuated in insanity was itself a symptom of hereditary disease. When one sees in one family—I am quoting a case from my own experience—the father of which had died insane, one member epileptic, another melancholia and suicidal—and actually did commit suicide—another brilliantly clever and bordering on genius, and another addicted to periodical bouts of drunkenness, one realises that the drunkenness is only one of the allotropic forms of an inherited mental instability. I recognise besides dipsomania—that is a disease by itself—four forms of mental disorder in which alcohol is the predominant factor. Delirium tremens, mania-e-potu, alcoholic delusional insanity, and alcoholic dementia. The two latter are, I should say, incurable forms, and correspond with organic disease of the brain. Alcoholic insanity is, I think, a very dangerous form, homicidal tendencies being often associated with it arising out of the delusions of suspicion and persecution that especially characterise it. As regards alternating insanity or folie circulaire, Dr. Clouston admits great difficulties, but holds that in certain cases there should be divorce, apparently because the man may return home and procreate during his lucid interval. But if divorced he may of course marry again during his lucid interval and so propagate his kind; so I think divorce would be no prevention in that case. As regards morphiomania or the drug habit, I have seen absolute and complete recovery in the worst cases. Might I say that in acute and recoverable cases of insanity, I am quite sure that the apprehension that they might at some future time be divorced and so be stamped with what they would regard as an indelible disgrace would tend to prevent recovery. That dread of divorce would apply to every patient in an asylum. There are all sorts of morbid apprehensions and fears, and every patient would have the possibility of divorce before him, and that would, I think, aggravate his or her sufferings immensely. The care of children is mentioned as one of the grounds on which divorce during insanity is advisable. But divorce is not to be confined to men with children. Men without children may have the benefit of it. But if divorce is not to be obtainable till the end of five years a man's worst troubles with his children will be over before he can get relief. It is with the young children that a man's troubles would occur, and even if his wife's were a puerperal case there could be no child younger than five years when divorce became available, and there might be others much older. In connection with the care of children it is also to be noted that the mothers of young children sent to asylums are largely of the recoverable class. They suffer from puerperal mania, the melancholia of lactation, or other of the milder and more curable forms of mental disease—of course I am speaking very generally—in which no question of divorce could arise. The more incurable forms of mental disease in women arise during adolescence and at or after the grand climacteric—before or after the fertile period. These are comments suggested to me by reading Dr. Clouston's evidence as reported in the "Times."

34,958. Might I ask you a few questions. I can see in looking through your first Memorandum you have covered most of the points that are to be found in it. Would you allow me to put it as a person listening to an exposition by a man thoroughly conversant with medical difficulties; I should like, if I may, to summarise what I gather it to be. I do not say this is exhaustive, but there seem to me to be three categories of persons whom you have dealt with under different headings?—Yes.

34,959. One, a class of case where there is insanity the recovery from which is doubtful?—Yes.

34,960. Another, a class of case in which insanity is the complaint, and where it is reasonably safe to suppose that after some interval, longer or shorter, there will be recovery?—Yes.

34,961. And the third case, to use your own words, where insanity may be safely predicted as incurable?—Yes.

34,962. Now, would you mind just for a moment keeping to the last category where after a sufficient interval—say, three, four, or five years or whatever might be fixed upon—it might be safely predicted that the case was incurable. Would your view be that those cases may be properly considered to be cases in which divorce should be granted?—No.

34,963. Why?—In the first place there are a large number of cases that would be incurable, but there would be mistakes; mistakes would occur, and then my Lord, I ought to——

34,964. Would you mind keeping only to the one point that is in my mind: cases where it might be safely predicted, to use your words, that the case was incurable. I only want to keep to that?—Yes.

34,965. And after a certain time of manifesting itself—say, three, four, or five years?—Yes, in a very large number of these cases in which it could be safely predicted that it was incurable, no divorce need occur, because they would die before the expiry of the five years if that was the period.

34,966. I am speaking of the cases that exist—the cases that are considered quite incurable?—I should say I am entirely opposed to divorce. I may discount my opinion, perhaps, by saying that I am opposed to divorce altogether.

34,967. Would you say why?—Well, for a great variety of reasons. I think to allow divorce in these cases would tend to lighten the responsibility with which a man would undertake the marriage contract. I do not think, of course, that any man for instance would say in so many words: if my wife goes mad after marriage I can divorce her; but the fact that divorce was possible would lighten the sense of responsibility with which marriage is and should be contracted; and particularly in those cases where there should be care—where there is a family taint on one side or the other of insanity. When you afford remedies of that kind you diminish the care and responsibility with which a solemn contract like that should be formed.

34,968. Do you think anybody standing before the officer or the minister really contemplates that shortly after or sometime after that his partner would be in a lunatic asylum?—I do not catch you, my Lord.

34,969. Do you think anybody standing before a registrar or before a minister of religion seriously contemplates or thinks, for one moment even, that the partner would be ever put into a lunatic asylum?—It ought to be thought over before that. A man ought to look before he contracts so serious a contract as marriage; and in some cases medical opinion should be taken, when there is a taint on one side or both.

34,970. But I have a difficulty in seeing why you think it would lessen the regard for marriage?—Well, thoughtful men will come to a physician now, and say: There is my family tree and my intended wife's family tree, there is tuberculosis, cancer, and so on; and on the basis of that he invites advice as to whether he is to marry or not; and if insanity is included in that it might occur as a possibility to him that there is escape if insanity arises. I do not say a man deliberately calculates in that way; but these things come into a man's mind, and I think it would reduce the care and caution with which the marriage ceremony is entered into. Then, I do not think in my experience that there is any demand for it. I have been in lunacy practice for 45 years, and must have had at least 10,000 lunatics under my care, but I have never once heard a wish expressed for divorce. Of course, I quite understand it is not at present looked upon as a possibility. I have had expressions of the wish that the patient would die and be freed from his or her sufferings; I have even had suggestions that incurable cases should be smothered, but I have never once heard divorce suggested as a solutions of existing difficulties.

34,971. I suppose you are aware that they know at present that they cannot get it?—Quite so.

34,972. The reason why I asked you this is that I have received as Chairman of this Commission volumes of letters demanding that that reform should take place, and in due course they will be placed before the Commissioners. I should like to read one just received, as an example, because these bear very much on your view as to whether it is unlikely to lessen the regard for marriage. Here is the last letter I have got: —"My Lord, Seeing you are taking evidence of the "divorce law of lunatics, I beg leave to state my case "which is one of very great hardship in bringing up a "family, I am in a small way of"—I will not say what, as it might identify him—"my wife has been in [a certain] "asylum for [so many] years and no hope for her "recovery. I am left with [so many] children, the "eldest [so many] years. It has cost me 40*l.* a year "and wages to pay for somone to look after the "children. I am nearly ruined, and there is no redress "at present, so surely something can be done. Could "you kindly let me know if such an Act will pass, and "if it will be long in coming into force, otherwise I "shall have to take her home, and suffer the conse- "quences, as I cannot pay anything more without "the children suffering and leaving"—and then he says where he is. "I hope I am not doing what is not "right, but it will soon take me the same road and leave "the children without a home." I only read that as a sample of a great many. Do you think that that class of person is really likely at the time of their marriage to be affected by such considerations as you suggest?—Certainly not. I have pointed out that there will be cases of intense hardship and suffering. There can be no doubt about that. But my belief is that if divorce were granted on the ground of insanity among the humbler orders it would be chiefly sought for the purpose of getting rid of the cost of maintenance. Throughout our pauper asylums in this country, where the wife is placed in an asylum, the husband is called upon for payment where he is able to meet it of some sum, say of 5*s.* or 6*s.* a week, according to his means; and it would be to get rid of that that he would seek divorce, and throw the maintenance of his wife upon the rates. But with regard to insanity being a ground, my strongest point is this:—Insanity is simply a disease, accompanied by mental symptoms; it is a distressing disease, a harrowing disease, and has terrible hardships in connection with it, but so have all diseases, and if you admit insanity as a ground of divorce, I do not see why a large number of divorces should not be granted on other grounds. Take locomotor ataxia; that is a disease of vicious origin, and the sufferer is subject to painful attacks, and can do nothing in the world, and may be helpless for 20 years. He cannot contribute to his wife's maintenance and he is a burden and a cripple. Why should not divorce be granted? Then take personal disfigurement. A man marries a pretty woman, and presently she contracts lupus and becomes hideous to look upon; why should he be bound to her for life?

34,973. Some countries allow that as a ground?—Yes, I say if you allow insanity as a ground, then you open the flood gates. Myxœdema; there is a case where the sufferer becomes, though he cannot be put in an asylum, heavy and dull and stupid, and unable to do any remunerative work, and is kept alive for years by thyroid injections; he is hopelessly blemished and burdensome. I do not see where you are to stop if you admit insanity as a ground of divorce. Cancer, again, a wife may be prostrated by that for years and undergo repeated operations. It is a terrible thing for a man to have his wife suffering from phthisis for six or seven years; and I do not see why for a score of other terrible diseases divorce should not be granted if insanity be recognised as a justification.

34,974. You said you had several grounds. Does that practically exhaust them?—Yes, I admit a distinction is this: insanity generally requires institutional treatment—that is separation from home; but that is not always the case. A great number return home from time to time; a great number are visited by their relations, and I have known cases of most touching devotion. I have known of a case of a young man who was married, and through an accident became insane, and was placed in an asylum. He was lucid on alternate days—one day he needed the asylum treatment and the next day he was practically well. The young wife took rooms in the neighbourhood of the asylum, and she spent those alternate days with him, and she ministered to him till he died. I am bound to say it seems to me that is running counter to the altruism and self-sacrifice which have played such an important part in all civilisation to admit divorce in insanity. It seems going back to the savage life, getting rid of the weak and diseased.

34,975. You said that there were several grounds on which you were generally opposed?—Yes, I have set forth in the Memorandum a great many grounds.

34,976. I do not want to go through them all, but can you specify any other important ground that is in your mind?—A man undertakes when he marries that it is for sickness or health, and this is one of the forms of sickness that a man should contemplate in connection with his marriage vows.

34,977. Does the religious question enter into your views at all?—Oh, yes. I am not speaking from a religious point of view, but I believe strongly that the religious sanction is of the utmost importance in avoiding divorce. It seems to me that marriage is a contract, but a contract raised to a higher power and made inalienable and imprescriptible by the religious sanction. I do not know—I daresay statistics are in the possession of your Commission—but I would hazard a guess that there are a great many more divorces where marriage has taken place in a Registry Office than under religious sanction. I should hazard that.

34,978. I am not sure that you are right there as I have a return of the divorce statistics which shows the number of the denominational marriages which have been the subject of divorce. I do not know whether you have seen those?—No, I have not.

34,979. I will give you them for two years. I do not think they have been brought out yet. The decrees nisi—I will leave out restitution and judicial separation—in 1907 were: Church of England, 410; Roman Catholic, 7; Denominational Protestants, 50; Jewish, 10; Registry, 141; Foreign, 5. In 1908: Church of England, 485; Roman Catholic, 9; Denominational Protestants, 54; Jewish Synagogue, 17; Registry, 156; and Foreign, 2?—Yes.

34,980. I have not got here at the moment, though I think we have it somewhere, the proportion of marriage in the Registry to those in Church; but apparently there are about three times as many divorces in the one as in the other, though I fancy the statistics show the number of marriages in the Registry are a good deal less?—Yes. What is the proportion of the total number of marriages taking place in churches of one kind or another in the registrars' office?

34,981. I say I have not those——

34,982. (Chairman.) Well, 70 per cent. are in Church. That is very nearly the same thing then as the relation between the Registry and Church of England divorce cases?—Yes, but what I want to know is the percentage of the total number of marriages taking place in Churches and the total number in the Registry Office.

34,983. 70 per cent.?—No, that is the total number of marriages. If I recollect aright, of every 1,000 marriages 800 take place in churches and 200 in registrars' offices. The proportion of divorces to total marriages is therefore much higher in the registry than in the Church marriages.

34,984. (Chairman.) That is very nearly the same proportion as the relative proportion between divorce where the marriage has been in Church, and divorce where the marriage has been in the Registry?—As I believe marriages not only in the Established Church, but in churches of all kinds, to be at least 80 per cent. of all marriages, it seems that the divorces in registry cases are considerably in excess of those in Church cases.

34,985. So I do not think we can draw any safe inference from that?—Perhaps not, but I attach great importance to the religious sanction as exercising an influence over the whole married life. I have even attempted to connect the fall in the birth rate with the loss of the proper sense of the sanctity of family life. I quote Mr. Bertillon who says, where in Breton there is no divorce there is no fall in the birth rate. That is the only part of France, I believe, where that is so.

34,986. (Sir Frederick Treves.) You are opposed to divorce altogether, on any ground?—I am entirely opposed to divorce.

34,987. And I take it that is to some extent on account of the solemnity of the contract?—It is on general social grounds as well as on the religious sanctity of the contract, that I am opposed to divorce. I admit, of course, that I am perhaps in a minority in the matter, but in the long run I think it is of the utmost importance to make it a bargain that could not be broken, and that if entered on with a great deal more care, and circumspection, trouble would be avoided. (To the Chairman.) I did not refer to the question of nullity, my Lord. I do not know whether you refer to that on this Commission.

(Chairman.) No, we need not trouble you about that. We know the laws about that pretty well.

35,988. (Sir Frederick Treves.) Dr. Clouston was dealing with a class of patient—25,000 in number—who were in his opinion incurable, mindless, and unable to fulfil any contract or even to understand the basis of a contract, and who would be totally unaffected by any question of being divorced or not, and who derive no comfort from the visits of their friends?—I do not agree with that. I think Dr. Clouston put the figure at 41,000.

34,989. That is the total, but taking the cases of what he calls incurable secondary dementia the number comes out at 25,000?—You must draw a distinction between those who are absolutely incurable. In that absolutely incurable group there would be a large number quite capable of understanding about divorce and being pained by it. I presume a citation would have to be served on them in each case, or that some notice would have to be given to the patient in the asylum, and that would be very humiliating and distressing to those capable of understanding it.

34,990. He regards the affection of some of these people for their relatives as being perverted or dead?—Yes, but it is difficult to say that that is so in any particular case.

34,991. And that they would be unable to understand the prospect of divorce?—There are such, but I think a very much smaller number than he estimated. Then, of that incurable group, you must remember one half would be single and a large proportion widowed, so that reduces it to a comparative small number.

34,992. He is speaking of only married patients?—Oh, I see.

34,993. Then Dr. Jones on the other hand, particularly pointed out the evils that he, in his experience of insanity among the poor, has seen from this; the amount of immorality that has arisen from it—from a husband having no wife except in an asylum or vice versâ, the wife having no husband to look after her children; and moreover (a point which I am sure you would pay heed to) the fact that if there be 41,000 married lunatics in this country there are 41,000 people who are unable to, possibly, add healthy children to the community?—These evils are perfectly parallel in the case of many bodily diseases. All disease has pain and suffering and misery and disability associated with it. Then, I suppose, it is not proposed that divorce should be granted under five years' continuous insanity, in which case the man's worst difficulties are over by then; the man's children are growing up. It is the first five years while he would be waiting for his divorce that all the trouble and difficulty would occur. Then I have seen cases like this. A woman is put into the asylum for puerperal mania after childbirth, and the case becomes confirmed, and it goes on for five or 10 years; but she is constantly visited by her children, and they show her constant affection and pay all sorts of attention to her. I think it would be eminently distressing and humiliating to her and to them that she should be divorced. As I have said, a man may be in an asylum and pronounced incurable and be divorced—and I am sure Dr. Clouston would not dispute that cases are pronounced incurable which do recover—and that man may have been in an asylum 15 years, have been divorced, and then recover. He goes home and finds another man in his place, and he is deposed from the head of the household and family. He might not have the divine self-abnegation of Enoch Arden of going away and hiding himself, and you might have great difficulties arising in consequence.

34,994. But the proportion of recoveries between three and five years is 9 per cent., the proportion between 6 and 10 years is 1·9 per cent.?—The proportions of recoveries is nearly 37 per cent. of the admissions.

34,995. But I am speaking of after admission?—Oh, I do not know the statistics to which you refer.

34,996. So your Enoch Arden would be, perhaps, one out of a hundred?—Yes, or if divorces of lunatics became frequent perhaps one out of ten, but none the less dangerous.

34,997. And you particularly say in your proof that a certain proportion of people must be sacrificed for the good of the whole?—Yes.

34,998. Consequently, you are only sacrificing one man for the sake of the 100?—By conceding divorce to a few hundreds of husbands and wives of insane persons you would, I believe, wound and embitter thousands of lives, and debauch the whole community. The way in which they go on visiting for years and years and years their afflicted relatives in asylums is eminently touching, and it would be a great distress to many of them to entertain even the possibility of divorce.

34,999. Yet you speak of a type of insane person as practically a corpse?—Yes, but even a corpse has its claims. I saw in one circular of the Divorce Reform League which was sent to me, a statement that a woman might have to live with a husband who was a homicidal and bestial maniac. I say that is nonsense. The same evidence that would justify a divorce would justify her in shutting him up in an asylum; and if she took a divorce against a husband who had lucid intervals, then on his discharge her position might be very difficult. Then, again, I have said it would be very painful if crime should be admitted as a ground of divorce, that insanity should be put on the same ground as crime—if both were a justification for divorce.

35,000. Would you really hold that insanity is to be placed on the same parallel with any disease. You quote smallpox, for instance?—Oh, that is an acute disease.

35,001. But you quote it?—I quoted it with reference to its disfiguring effects. It is a disease with regard to disability for work; for the maintenance of the family, for any useful work or self-support which I mean. Insanity is in these respects on a perfect parity with a great many bodily diseases.

35,002. But take a paralysed person with, say, locomotor ataxia; a paralysed person is absolutely helpless, but may be a very charming companion?—Yes.

35,003. And capable of conducting the business of the family?—I should not say so.

35,004. But you cannot say that of a lunatic?—No, not always, although some lunatics do conduct business successfully, I admit the institutional treatment is the difficulty, but I do not see any difference really between it and a case of myxœdema. Take exophthalmic goitre. A man marries a woman, and her eyes start from her head and she gets enlarged thyroid, and becomes very impulsive, and is a great trouble in the house. She is not insane, but she is a burden. Is she to be divorced?

35,005. But a woman who has exophthalmic goitre or Graves' disease is still intelligent and capable of being a companion?—Yes, but only to some extent, and so are many of the insane.

35,006. And there is the question of public opinion?—Yes.

35,007. A man who divorced his wife for hopeless insanity may not be ill-criticised; but with a man that divorced his wife for small-pox or Graves' disease it may be different?—I do not say anything about acute cases of small-pox that are well in six weeks or so: but I believe public opinion would be against it amongst the humbler orders, and that a man who divorced his wife because she was in an asylum and was an object of sympathy would be looked at askance. I think in the humbler walks that would be so, and wherever there is still a sense of the sanctity of marriage.

35,008. Dr. Clouston did not include general paralysis of the insane?—He spoke of it. It is reported in the "Times."

35,009. Yes, by answering that it is generally incurable in three years?—Being so rapidly fatal.

35,010. He said he would not include it if he had to schedule insanity?—Dr. Clouston spoke of one or two experiments with regard to general paralysis that seemed to open out a hope; but at the present moment there would be no difference of opinion amongst medical men that general paralysis is incurable and would terminate in three years.

35,011. (Mr. Burt.) I have just one or two questions, Sir James. You are absolutely opposed to divorce?—I am.

35,012. Under any circumstances?—Under any circumstances.

35,013. Well, assuming that divorce is allowed as it is, would you place an unfaithful husband on the same footing as an unfaithful wife?—I do not catch the question.

35,014. Would you place the unfaithful husband on the same legal footing as the unfaithful wife?—No, not on biological grounds. I think every biologist would agree with me that a man is not on the same level sexually with a woman. In the first place, the consequences of infidelity are different; and there cannot be a question that the sexual passion is stronger and more aggressive in man than in woman. It is so throughout the animal kingdom. The man is katabolic; the female is anabolic—more passive and cool, and the temptation of the man is much stronger; so on biological grounds it is not the same. It may be that a stronger temptation demands the stronger restraint and requires the heavier penalty. I believe, in my own country—in Scotland—the sexes are exactly on a parity, but then in Scotland, taking the whole population, divorce is comparatively rare, I believe. But I certainly could not place the sexes on the same footing on biological grounds.

35,015. (Chairman.) I think you ought to be apprised of the fact that it is 200 cases for the Scotch population and 600 for the English?—I am only dealing with my own personal knowledge. In fact, in my own district in Scotland I have rarely heard of divorce. There are other forms of irregularity in the South of Scotland, but divorce is unusual.

35,016. (Mr. Burt.) Would it be a fair question to ask: How do you know that temptation is greater in the case of a man than a woman? Do you put that on medical grounds or as a matter of opinion?—I am not suggesting that that is a ground, but I only state a fact, as I believe it, that the man's sexual feeling is stronger; that he is exposed to greater temptation than the woman. It is not for me to say if that should be a ground for making different penalties.

35,017. But you put that forward as the main ground for making a difference?—Yes, the consequences may be very different in the two sexes.

35,018. (The Earl of Derby.) You have spoken chiefly of cases where there are children. I should like to ask if in cases where there are no children and the man's wife is put in a lunatic asylum and she may be in for 25 years with practically no chance of recovery would you give a man no chance for making a home for himself?—None at all. It is very hard. It occurs in other diseases. A man may marry a woman who becomes such an invalid that he is deprived of all marital rights, and that may go on for years and years and he has to bear it.

35,019. In those cases he is not deprived of her companionship; she may be living in the same house?—But I am taking a case of a confirmed invalid spending her winters, perhaps, at Davoz or some health resort and he getting no companionship; there are hundreds of cases of this sort. It is one of the penalties of disease, all disease has penalties connected with it.

35,020. Do you think it is as strong a case as where a man has no children and a wife shut up in a lunatic asylum for 25 years and not allowed to see her?—He should probably have taken more thought before he married her. She is probably a member of an insane family, or something of that kind. But in all these things it is necessary to get now a careful marriage selection. All my hopes are grounded not on granting divorce in the case of chronic lunatics, but on the prevention of insanity both by eugenic foresight and the progress of sanitation, temperance, and so on.

35,021. But as we do not prevent would not you give a man or a woman some relief?—No. Of course, I admit terrible hardship at times, but it is inseparable from our civilisation; it must be so.

35,022. (The Archbishop of York.) I want to ask one or two questions, from the purely medical side. Your opinion, I think, is that what is called expert evidence in any cases which had to be tried as to insanity before the Divorce Court would be an extremely varied and controversial thing?—Undoubtedly. I have not the slightest idea what practical scheme has been proposed before the Commission; whether it is proposed that a lunatic shall be divorced by a judge or a jury or simply on medical affidavits. I should think it would be most dangerous to allow it on medical affidavits—simply affidavits of a couple of medical men saying that the insanity is incurable. It would have to be by judicial authority, and then you would almost always get expert evidence on one side and the other.

35,023. Even in the case of recognised experts?—Yes, in poor cases even more so, because the poor cannot afford them. In the case of the poor who could not afford to take proceedings, the guardians would have to intervene. When a man is getting rid of his wife, and he is paying 6*s.* a week, the guardians might oppose it and say: Are you to throw your insane wife on the rates, but her case is not hopeless? In a bodily disease if a man can maintain his wife he has to do it, and the guardians would say, you have been paying 6*s.* a week for this woman, why should you throw her on the rates. They should oppose the divorce on that ground.

35,024 Do you agree with Dr. Jones that duration and not definition is the only way of getting at the degree of insanity?—Yes, duration; and even then I can tell you of the recovery of a case after 22 years. A man was supposed to be hopelessly insane for 22 years, and he perfectly recovered, and the Court of Chancery superseded him on affidavits and granted him control of his property. As to definition (I am sure all my medical colleagues will assent), we are not agreed as to the different forms of insanity. I have seen certificates in one case with one man calling it one form of insanity and another another.

35,025. But as to duration, would it not be necessary to prescribe for different kinds of insanity different durations?—Undoubtedly.

35,026. If they were to be regarded incurable for the purpose of divorce?—I think Dr. Clouston contemplated that when he proposed in one group of cases five years and in another 10 as the duration warranting divorce. He said in one form of insanity he would grant divorce in five years, and in another, in which recovery might take place at a later date, he would make it 10 years; and he would have a graduated scale; but medical men would not agree as to which part of that scale an insane man should go into.

35,027. So that in framing a clause for an Act of Parliament it would be necessary to prescribe different durations?—You would have to have a schedule.

35,028. And that would bring the definition to suit these different durations?—Yes, about which there would be endless difference of opinion.

35,029. With regard to the question of prevention; are you in favour of the State taking steps to see that all persons desirous of contracting marriage were able to show a fairly clean heredity?—That would be a very extreme measure, your Grace. I cannot understand the State interfering to prevent a marriage on medical grounds. I think the State might afford some facilities for avoiding undesirable marriages. For instance, I should allow the discovery that the woman had suffered from insanity to be a sufficient answer to a breach of promise action. If a man is going to marry a woman, and it is discovered that she has had a previous attack of insanity, I think that should be a sufficient answer. A man ought not to be compelled to marry a woman who has had an attack of insanity, or to pay damages for his prudential caution. As to the interference of the State, I suppose a man would succeed in a suit of nullity if she was actually mad at the time of marriage. I might mention the case of a medical friend of mine who was in active practice and became engaged to a young lady. He being a very busy man the courtship was short. He married her, and in the carriage on the way to the railway station he discovered that she was mad—had all sorts of delusions. He hesitated whether he should go back and give her up to the family, or go on. He went on, and spent the honeymoon on the Continent—she was mad all the time. On the way home from Calais to Dover he heard the cry, "Man overboard," and he saw his wife had thrown herself overboard. She had a crinoline on, and she was buoyed up and saved. Then the delusions disappeared, and they lived a happy married life for 20 years after, and there were children and all went well. If there had been evidence that before the marriage there had been signs of madness, then there might have been a suit of nullity. I have no objection to that.

35,030. Would you be prepared to enlarge the grounds on which a decree of nullity could be obtained?—Oh, well—coercion of any kind might be a ground, of course. I may say I understand that until 1873 all the wards of the Court of Chancery—all our lunatic wards were protected in that way—that if anyone married them the marriage was, de facto, null by Statute; there was no necessity for a suit to be brought. But in 1873 the Statute Revision Act set that aside, and now the Chancery wards are, I understand, on the same basis as ordinary lunatics, and it is a question of proof. But, of course, with existing insanity at the time of marriage there is no marriage at all; consent could not be given.

35,031. But would you be prepared to allow a decree of nullity in cases where there was reasonable proof forthcoming that one of the parties, though quite sane for ordinary purposes at the time of marriage, had a family history or a physical constitution of such a kind as to make it almost certain that insanity would arise?—No, that would be very dangerous, I think. Only on clear evidence that at the time of marriage either of the parties did not fully apprehend and understand the nature of the contract—not merely repeat the words, but understand the nature of the contract—should I allow it to be set aside.

35,032. (Chairman.) That is the law now; you must have a consenting mind?—Yes, quite so, but I would not allow a mere family tendency to justify a suit of nullity—that would be very dangerous, I think.

35,033. (The Archbishop of York.) Then I want your feeling about the proportion of divorces in the Church of England. A question was asked by the Chairman, and perhaps reported, which may give a very wrong impression of the facts, and I can only remove that impression by asking a question. You are aware that the reason why there is a large proportion of cases put down under the Church of England is that the law compels the Church of England to marry any parishioner that comes to the parish church?—Yes.

35,034. Therefore it would not be right to imply that the largest number of divorces come from the Church of England?—That is so.

35,035. With regard to the question of immoral consequences of husband or wife having insane spouses; that would, of course, be equally true whatever the character of the insanity was?—Undoubtedly.

35,036. Even if it was of a comparatively slight kind?—Undoubtedly, yes.

35,037. When you speak about being opposed to divorce generally, I gather you are opposed to it rather on general social grounds than on what may be called ecclesiastical grounds?—I am not indifferent to the ecclesiastical grounds. but it is on social grounds that I have spoken. I believe it is a most solemn contract for life, and that no one ought to be allowed to break it. It is a bargain for life. I have no doubt the abolition of divorce would produce great misery and wretchedness in some cases; but I think for the good of the community at large, and looking to the future, that it would be well to prevent it altogether.

35,038. You quite hold that belief, apart from any doctrinal view?—Yes, on social and medical grounds.

35,039. (Lady Frances Balfour.) You spoke about the artizan class, and that it was a great preventive

——?—I come in contact with a large number of them in Yorkshire.

35,040. I know. It was a great preventive if they have to pay for a wife in the asylum?—Yes, they have in accordance with their means.

35,041. They would not divorce in order to get rid of that payment, but because they want to start a new family and wife; marry again, which would be more expensive than the 6*s*.?—The 6*s*. would fall on the rates.

35,042. (Chairman.) Not necessarily?—Is a man to continue paying for his divorced wife in an asylum?

35,043. Very likely. He has to now, sometimes?—Then, I think, there would be very little divorce in the humbler classes on account of insanity; it would be the hope of relief from payment which would lead to divorce proceedings being taken.

35,044. I only interpose because we can make it a condition in the Divorce Court to the husband getting a decree—that he shall provide for her to prevent her being put upon the streets. It is a regular suspension.

35,045. (Witness.) As I point out, in that artizan's case, if I understand the proposal properly, he would not get the relief at the time it was most urgently needed. It is when the wife first goes to the asylum and there are young children on his hands that he most needs assistance.

35,046. (Lady Frances Balfour.) I am only trying to defend the artizan from the charge of getting divorce on the ground of economy. Because if he has to support his wife in the asylum he also has to support his housekeeper if the children are at home?—Yes, he has to support both, but I am assuming that divorce would relieve him from contributing to maintenance of his wife in a pauper asylum.

35,047. As to the relations between him and the housekeeper, I do not know whether morals are much helped by the wife being in an asylum. Then you make no distinction between consumption, paralysis, or cancer, which may be nursed at home, and the disease of insanity, which in most cases puts the patient away from the husband or wife?—I have pointed out the distinction you refer to. Of course, divorce would not be confined to patients who are in lunatic asylums, and there are a very large number of lunatics who still remain at home—who are living at home; a very large number throughout the country who have not been certified or sent to asylums, and it would equally apply to them. If a man wanted to get his wife turned out of the house, and she was insane, he could apply for a divorce, even if she were a mere harmless mental invalid. Regarding those who are in asylums, too, there is a very considerable proportion in the habit of going home from time to time in lucid intervals on trial and who are discharged relieved.

35,048. There is a proportion. Of course, that also brings in the consideration whether it is very good for the future generation that should go on?—The danger to future generations in the person of a discharged lunatic is not confined to one who is living with his wife. Of course, in the artizans' class there are a certain proportion of the wives labouring under bodily diseases in hospitals and institutions, and are away from home as much as the lunatics; cancer for instance. I have known of cases going on for six years, away from home all the time, undergoing operations and so on. It is just as hard upon that man as in the case of a lunatic.

35,049. It is more unusual that a cancer case should last six years?—I have known it last 20 years in a woman past middle age. I have said before that I think the difficulty is the institutional treatment of the insane.

35,050. You make no distinction between the disease which leaves companionship possible and the disease which removes all possibility of companionship? You make no distinction between the two?—What is the distinction you wish me to draw?

35,051. I only ask if you make no distinction between those diseases which leave companionship possible ——?—Certainly not; all disease more or less interferes with companionship. Insanity is a physical disease; it is a bodily disease accompanied by mental symptoms. There are scores of bodily diseases that are not called insanity which are accompanied by mental symptoms. Phthisis is often accompanied by mental symptoms. Insanity is a more grave and a more protracted form, but it is a bodily disease. This seems to me to be running counter to what ought to be our object; our object is to get it regarded as a bodily disease; to get rid of the prejudice against it. We are calling our asylums mental hospitals, in order that we may get rid of that stigma of insanity, and regard it as a physical condition to be treated as any other disease; and if you attach a penalty of this kind to it you run counter to that tendency.

35,052. (Mrs. Tennant.) Sir James, you feel that if there were the possibility of divorce for insanity, it might interfere with the care with which people enter into the marriage state?—I think so.

35,053. Have you considered that it might give care and prudence which is now absent, when relations wish to provide for a woman who is to their knowledge bordering on insanity?—I think, of course, that a great many foolish marriages now take place that would not be sanctioned by any medical authority between people with the same pathological tendencies, but I think that divorce would rather diminish the sense of responsibility with which a man enters on marriage, when there is insanity on both sides.

35,054. But I have in mind counter cases within my own experience, where relations have endeavoured to provide for one member of their family, feeling she is settled for life if they can succeed in marrying her?—Yes.

35,055. Do you think that it might help if they could feel she was, perhaps, not settled for life?—Because in those cases there ought to be self-control. I have known a case where there was hereditary insanity in the family—several cases, all from the same form of mental disease; and the three sons met round the father's grave: he was the last of the number that died insane—and they registered a vow that none of them would marry, and they did not; they lived bachelors and they died bachelors. That is a fine piece of self-control and abnegation.

35,056. But I had in my mind unhappily different cases, where a person about to be married is not capable of self-control, and where her family are endeavouring to provide for her by getting her married and off their hands?—In cases of property?

35,057. Not only. I will not say it is common, but it is within my experience in the case of working women: their families find a difficulty in supporting them, or they hope that marriage may restore their mental balance, and they succeed in getting them married, with the feeling that they are settling them for life. I ask whether if divorce were possible their security would not be less?—That is a matter of voluntary control. I do not exactly see how that applies to divorce.

35,058. If they realised that the man need not keep her for life, then they would not feel they were securing her prospects as they do now. I am trying to get the balance of advantage. You feel that the person contracting a marriage should observe greater care?—That is so.

35,059. But that he would be made more careless by the knowledge that divorce is possible?—I do.

35,060. And now I am putting it to you whether you do not feel that other persons—the girl's family—might not, if divorce were possible, recognise that the husband might get rid of his insane wife. Might not that produce caution where sometimes now there is none?—I do not think it would increase the caution, because in such cases there is now the risk of a suit of nuility. As it is, men come to a medical man and say: "Would it be prudent to marry this woman with her "family history." But if he was very much in love with her, and he felt: "Well, I could dispose of her if she goes mad"; I think that might diminish the sense of responsibility under which he enters into the contract.

35,061. Few sane men would consciously face the risk of insane children? But I am talking of cases which perhaps are not within your experience—if so I will leave the point—where a family thinking to do well for one of its members succeeds in marrying that member who is insane to a man who is sane?—For prudential motives?

35,062. Yes. They would feel less security in their act if they recognised that the man need not keep the woman for life?—Of course, it is very hard for a man with a large property to marry a woman and then he finds he has no children, but he cannot get divorce for sterility.

35,063. Dr. Clouston distinguished in his evidence about the visits of relations, between the husband and wife and other relations. Do you distinguish in the same way, or do you feel that the husband very often visits the insane wife, and the wife constantly visits the insane husband?—I do not think there is any distinction. Do you mean as to the attention paid by the husband to the insane wife?

35,064. I have not Dr. Clouston's evidence in front of me, but I think his statement was that the insane husband, or the insane wife, was not as often visited by the partner as he or she was by a mother, and I think he especially mentioned maiden aunts?—Oh, I have no doubt that is so, but, for instance, in the West Riding it was very difficult for the husband to visit his wife. He had to travel perhaps 15 or 20 miles, and he could not leave his work, but on the holidays the place was crowded with husbands coming to see their wives, and other relations coming to visit too. I have been extremely touched by the affectionate solicitude shown for women who have been insane for 20 years, and by wives for their husbands under long continued insanity.

35,065. Then you do not agree with that distinction?—I agree that the wife is often occupied in the household and she cannot get away, and she may send the children or a neighbour to visit her husband; but that is owing to industrial considerations; not to any lack of affection.

35,066. (Lord Guthrie.) You are opposed to divorce altogether?—I am.

35,067. You know at the present time the Courts can decree a permanent separation without divorce?—Yes, judicial separation.

35,068. Are you opposed to that?—No, if a woman and a man cannot agree they must separate.

35,069. That is not the point. Do you approve of the Courts preventing their return unless by mutual consent?—After a judicial separation?

35,070. Yes?—I cannot dictate to the Courts. I should have thought the Court would in every possible way promote reconciliation.

35,071. That is not the point. You are opposed to divorce altogether?—I am.

35,072. Do you approve of what for practical purposes, generally speaking, is the same thing as far as the State is concerned—permanent judicial separation?—I do approve of judicial separation. I see no objection to that.

35,073. Would you approve of judicial separation on the ground of insanity?—I do not see what effect it would have. There is the separation if one person is in the asylum and the other is not.

35,074. Then suppose a husband to be insane for a term of years, and his insanity is recurrent; then he comes out. Do you approve of the present position which is that he is entitled to return and to insist on cohabitation?—No, I should give the Court power to prevent that.

35,075. Then would you give the Court power to give judicial separation in such a case on the ground of insanity?—Yes, to prevent him from molesting his wife, decidedly.

35,076. And to prevent him insisting on cohabitation with her?—Yes, but that is not irremediable, apart from divorce. That man who for a time has been debarred from having access might completely recover, and then he would return to his family.

35,077. Would you give him power to come back to the Court and if he could establish that, then to return to his wife?—Yes, if he could establish complete and permanent recovery. Folie circulaire is marked by phases of depression and excitement and lucidity; and sometimes it is a small circle and sometimes a large one, and sometimes the sufferer entirely recovers.

35,078. Do you approve of a man who has been confined for a term of years in an asylum and comes out returning to his wife and procreating children?—I do not see how that is to be prevented. I do not approve of it. I should think the man would be very well advised to observe abstinence, but if he has been a long time in the asylum his wife has very likely passed the child-bearing period; if he has been 20 years in an asylum probably she has.

35,079. Supposing a wife is advised that while the husband has apparently recovered the insanity may return. Would you approve of his returning to her then?—I do not think any woman should be compelled to live in fear of her life. I recall a case where the judge said that no woman is compelled to live with a husband who is dangerous, but the remedy is not the relief of the woman but the restraint of the husband; so I should have legal restraint placed on the husband.

35,080. Do I understand in your view the decisive consideration of whether divorce should be given for lunacy is the interest of the insane person?—There are many considerations.

35,081. No, I am talking of the decisive one. I suggest to you from the point of view of the State the decisive consideration should be the interest of the sane spouse, and the children existing and possible; but I understand from you you think the decisive consideration—— ?—I should think every individual is to be considered in the matter.

35,082. I do not see how you can answer a question till you hear it?—The husband is the afflicted being. He is suffering from disease, and he is afflicted and especially in need of the protection of the State.

35,083. Excuse me, that is not the question. I have suggested to you one view that the decisive consideration should be the interest of the sane spouse, and from the point of view of the State and of the children existing and possible. Do you agree with that, or do you think the decisive consideration should be the interests of the insane person?—I think that all interests should be considered, but which is to be the decisive one is not a medical question, but one for the State.

35,084. Do you decline to answer the question?—I do not. I say that all interests should be considered and justly balanced; but the afflicted man is not to be ignored, and the really decisive interest, in my view, is public morality.

35,085. Suppose that divorce for lunacy were put under four conditions. Firstly, suppose it were confined to those in asylums; secondly, to those who had been in asylums for five years and upwards; thirdly, to those who have so been in asylums continuously; and fourthly, to those who are certified as in all human probability incurable. You think the number of cases would be reduced to a small amount?—Decidedly.

35,086. Now suppose it were so reduced, do you see in the interests of the State any objection to divorce for insanity being allowed under those four conditions—in the case of the small number to whom it would be applicable, and in whose cases it would only be the minority?—That does not in the slightest degree alter my opinion, because it would not only be applicable to them, but all insane patients would suppose it would be applicable to them; and the urgency for a change of that kind is the less, the less the number that would be affected by it.

35,087. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I did not quite follow your answers to Mrs. Tennant. The point I understood her to put was this. You were speaking of whether the change in the law would decrease or diminish the sense of responsibility with which the marriage is entered into?—Yes.

35,088. Consider this case. There is a woman a member of a family who is mentally deficient, not obviously, but really so. Her family want to get rid of her, and they persuade somebody to marry her without his knowing what her state of mind is; in other words they plant her on him, or commit a fraud. It is suggested to you that if a man who has been so defrauded could divorce that woman—if that were the law—the family would be less likely to commit that fraud, because they would see in advance that it would not always be successful. Now what is your view as to that. It is suggested that that would make them more careful, and not less careful before that marriage was performed?—In that case the man marrying a weak-minded woman like that there is a perfectly existing remedy in a suit of nullity.

35,089. No, I am taking a case where the present law of nullity would not apply: a person who is not mad in the sense that you could get a decree of nullity. That is an irrelevant case. Apply your mind to the actual point put to you?—But you assume she is weak-minded.

35,090. Well, there is a deficiency?—What does the deficiency amount to; it all depends on that.

35,091. Well, not to that for which a nullity could be got?—In a case like that a man is bound to satisfy himself as to the mental capacity of the woman he is about to marry, and if he does not I would leave him to himself.

35,092. Sir James, you are not doing yourself justice. I am imagining a case where a man is imposed upon?—I can scarcely conceive of such a case. If he has allowed himself to be imposed upon, he must suffer the penalty of having made a very bad bargain, and he cannot have a remedy. I have known a case where a man has married a weak-minded woman for her property.

35,093. No, do not go into something that is not the question. You would give him no relief?—No, not beyond what a suit of nullity affords.

35,094. (Chairman.) Would you let me ask you one more question. You said that there would be a difficulty in divorce cases in the judge arriving at his conclusion on medical experts' evidence. You are aware, are you not, that that always arises where the question of a sane or insane person is in issue?—Yes.

35,095. And it always has to be determined?—Yes.

35,096. And whether it is difficult or not it is constantly done?—Yes, but this would lead to a wide field of expert evidence.

35,097. But you know that is done with regard to wills?—Yes, and I have given evidence before your Lordship on several occasions.

35,098. Yes. One other point with regard to nullity. If I might state it in another way there might be cases where the person was really insane, though at the moment it was latent, and yet have had sufficient mental capacity to consent to a marriage, fully realising that it was a marriage?—Yes.

35,099. You understand that?—Yes, clearly.

35,100. Would you go so far as to say that while that is a legal binding marriage at present that the law should be altered to give the sane person a right to get a declaration of nullity if it were proved that the woman or man, as the case might be, were in fact insane though capable of giving consent at the time of the marriage?—Yes, undoubtedly—not able to give full knowledge and consent.

35,101. That is not bringing your mind to the question. I am assuming that they have in fact sufficient intelligence to thoroughly consent with knowledge of what they are doing, but that in fact they are mad in some way which would develop immediately afterwards perhaps, but which is proved to exist at the time. Now I want to know whether you would advocate a change in the law to admit of a declaration of nullity in such cases?—That would surely be a question for the Court, my Lord, as to what the mental condition of the person was at the time.

35,102. No, the Court can only administer the law. I am asking if you would allow a declaration of nullity in such cases?—Yes, I would. The great difficulty in cases of nullity is that, a marriage being an exceedingly disturbing and agitating event, it is suddenly followed by insanity sometimes; and the difficulty is to know whether the insanity commenced before or after marriage.

(Chairman.) I have to thank you on behalf of the Commissioners for your very valuable evidence.*

Dr. SIDNEY COUPLAND called and examined.

35,103. (Chairman.) Your qualifications are those of Doctor of Medicine and Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians?—Yes.

35,104. And you are one of the Commissioners in Lunacy?—Yes.

35,105. You have been good enough to prepare a memorandum to lay before the Commissioners as the basis of your evidence?—I have.

35,106. Some of it is so carefully detailed that I should like to ask you to read it, because it is statistics and I cannot really ask questions on it; and we can ask you questions afterwards?—Of course statistics are always difficult to follow when they are read, but I hope——

35,107. We shall have them printed after. I have a large number of tables that you propose to put in?—Yes. "The statistics appended to this memorandum are based on the returns which are annually made to the Commissioners in Lunacy, as well as on the figures published in the reports of certain of the county and borough asylums of England and Wales. Only facts bearing on the subject of insanity in married persons, and on the prospects of recovery are here included. (1) Number of the Insane.—On the 1st January 1910, there were under care in England and Wales, 130,553 persons certified as insane. Of these, 60,528 were males and 70,025 were females. (2) Proportion of Married Persons.—There are no available statistics of the numbers of married insane persons in the community, but only of those who are annually admitted to care. The yearly average of such admissions for the two years 1907–08 gives a total of 21,813 persons, of whom 9,537 were stated to be married. The proportion of the married to the total admitted was: males, 44·4 per cent., females, 43 per cent. Of the married males there were 3, and of the married females 9 who were below 20 years of age. The admissions at ages 20 years and upwards amounted to 20,523, of whom 9,826 were males and 10,697 were females." That is to say, the males were to the females as 100 to 109. "Of the former 4,669, and of the latter 4,861 were married." That is to say, 100 males to 104 females. The relative ages of these persons are given in the table (Table I.) which I have put in. "From this it appears that the proportion of married females below 45 years of age was almost the same as that of males above that age."

(Chairman.) The shorthand writer will insert that in your proof there.

The following is a summary of the table referred to:—

	Males.		Females.
	All Classes.	Married.	All Classes.	Married.
At 20 to 44 years -	55·8	43·6	55·5	56·0
„ 45 „ 64 „ -	33·4	45·3	33·3	37·8
„ 65 and over -	10·8	11·1	11·2	6·2
	100·0	100·0	100·0	100·0

35,108. (Chairman.) From those figures are you able to give us some estimate of the total number of married people confined in the asylums, say in each year?—Now, at the present time?

35,109. Or in January 1910?—Well, on an average there are about 20,000 admissions in the year, and there are now at present about 130,000 under care. I suppose one might roughly estimate the proportion of married from those.

35,110. That is all I care about. We do not want the precise details?—No. I might say there would be about six times as many as are admitted. That would be about 60,000.

* See also supplemental note by the witness, App. XV. p. 127.

35,111. Then the next table is "Comparison with General Population." Is that a useful table for us?—I do not know that it is. I thought it was rather interesting.

35,112. May we not take it now from the word "Nevertheless"?—"Nevertheless it will have been seen that in each separate age-period the proportion of the married was considerably higher in the general population than in the insane. This obtains for each sex, and the sum of such difference at all ages from 20 years upwards is expressed in the statement that, whereas in the general community, for every 1,000 persons of each sex there were 633 males who were married and 575 females, the proportion of married males amongst the insane admitted into asylums was 475, and of females 454 per 1,000."

35,113. Are these tables on the next page taken from the general table which you hand in?—Yes.

35,114. Because we will have those printed separately. "Recovery from Insanity," paragraph 4?—"The annual recovery rate reckoned upon the total number admitted into the county and borough asylums is about 36 per cent. From a study of the figures yielded by 43 asylums (see 61st Report of the Commissioners in Lunacy, page 10 et seq.) it is estimated that of those who were discharged as recovered (amounting to 37·3 per cent. of the total admitted) within a period of 20 years from the date of admission, nearly nine-tenths were so discharged within the first two years. The actual proportion was 88·8 per cent. A further 9·1 per cent. recovered in from 3 to 5 years, 1·6 per cent. in from 5 to 10 years, and 0·5 per cent. in 11 to 20 years. On this basis, with a total admission rate of 20,000 per annum, the recoveries in the whole period of 20 years would amount to 7,460, of whom there would have recovered ——" And I show that out of that number from ——

35,115. I should like to have those figures?—Out of 7,460, there would have recovered—

"Within 2 years of admission - -	6,625
,, 3 to 5 years of admission -	679
,, 6 to 10 ,, ,, -	119
,, 11 to 20 ,, ,, -	37

"There are no available statistics to show what proportion of the whole number of patients now under care may be regarded as incurably insane, but of late years several asylums in their annual reports have published a return in which the inmates in residence at the close of the preceding year are divided into three groups, according as to whether the prospect of mental recovery was considered to be (a) favourable, (b) doubtful, or (c) unfavourable. From the returns of 53 asylums, dealing with 24,228 male and 28,285 female patients in residence on the 31st December 1908, it would appear that the prospect was deemed to be 'favourable' in 3·5 per cent., 'doubtful' in 5·3 per cent., and 'unfavourable' in 91·2 per cent. (Table V.). It may then be fairly concluded that about 90 per cent. of those detained in asylums are the subjects of chronic and probably incurable forms of insanity, the remaining tenth forming a fluctuating community, of which many pass out of the asylum after a comparatively short residence, some of them (about 28 per cent. according to the L.C.C. asylums statistics) being re-admitted at longer or shorter intervals, owing to a recurrence of their malady, which in a certain number may eventually lead to their inclusion in the irremediable and gradually accumulating majority. Some idea of the amount of irrecoverable insanity may also be gained from the figures in Table VI."

35,116. I am going to ask you about those at the end?—"This has been compiled from the more detailed analysis contained in asylum reports. The table shows the number of cases under care in 65 asylums on 31st December 1908, distributed according to the form of mental disorder: Congenital cases, general paralysis of the insane, dementia-primary, secondary and senile, chronic mania and melancholia together furnish two-thirds of the total, and few of these can have but small prospect of recovery. (5) Changes in Asylum Population.—That recovery does occasionally take place after a long term of years is evident from the figures already cited, and from those set forth in Tables VII. and VIII. They indicate how small is the residue remaining under care of those who were admitted 20 years previously, the most marked reductions from discharge and death having taken place long before that term is reached. Many of those discharged as 'relieved' or 'not improved' are merely transferred to other institutions; but no small number return to their homes. It is probable that a great majority of these latter have sooner or later to be re-admitted to care."

35,117. The next is "Observations." May I just get the table in there?—Yes.

35,118. You have been good enough to supply us with some. Tables I., II., III., IV., V., VI., VII., VIII. Those show the points of numbers which you have been telling us in general language in the memorandum?—They do, my Lord.

35,119. But what I should like to get at principally is this. What number do you estimate of incurable cases are such as might be safely—to use Sir James Crichton-Browne's expression—predicted as incurable there are at any one time in the asylums?—About two-thirds of the total in the asylums. I should say out of these 65 asylums, where there are 64,000 under care, two-thirds of them, which would be about 40,000 odd, would be incurable. That is a rough estimate, selecting those forms of insanity which are on the face of them more incurable.

35,120. Roughly speaking, half of those would be married people or less?—Roughly speaking, half or rather less than half.

35,121. Then may we take it that in your view, as one of the Lunacy Commissioners, there are at any time in the asylums a very large proportion of married people whose cases are hopeless?—Yes.

35,122. That is so?—Yes.

35,123. Now you have sent us some tables which are in the form of a diagram?—Yes.

35,124. I am sorry to say the Treasury will not sanction our printing them. Is there anything on them you would like to explain before I pass on?—No, my lord; they simply illustrate the main points I have given in such a way that people can take them in at a glance.

35,125. They cover the points you have already dealt with?—Yes.

35,126. Now the observations?—"The question whether the insanity of a husband or wife should or should not be deemed sufficient ground for divorce is one to which, I confess, I have not hitherto paid any special attention. But the hardships and dangers incidental to such marriages have necessarily been brought before me in the course of my work, and it may be of use to the Royal Commission if I state briefly some considerations on certain aspects of the problem. There are two lines of argument which may be taken to support the plea for divorce, namely (1), that it would tend to prevent race deterioration, and (2) that it would afford justifiable relief to the sane partner from an unmerited and possibly life-long hardship. (1) The first, which may perhaps be styled the eugenic argument, involves the acceptance of the fact of inherited taint. It is certain that no small proportion of the mentally defective have had an insane parentage or some near collateral who was insane. The frequency of this association of an 'insane heredity' with other factors in the life-history of the insane is so marked as to warrant the conclusion that if the hereditary factor were eliminated the amount of insanity would be materially reduced.* If such a conclusion be valid, then the fact of insanity in a near relative, and a fortiori an attack of insanity in the individual, should be an absolute bar to the marriage of the latter. Failing such restriction, it might be urged that a certificate of insanity in the case of a married person should carry with it a decree of divorce. The justice and expediency of so drastic a measure as the second alternative may well be doubted; but it could be plausibly supported on the ground that a large number of married women who become insane (about 56 per cent. of those admitted into asylums) are still capable of child-bearing. Every year many such patients, having recovered from their attack of insanity, return to their homes, thereby incurring the risk of possibly adding to the mentally defective population."

* See Report of Royal Commission on the Care and Control of the Feeble-minded. The extent of the association of such heredity with other assigned causal factors is shown in a preliminary statistical study of the assigned causes of insanity contributed by the writer to the "Journal of Mental Science," January, 1910.

35,127. Before you go on to the next paragraph, have you considered whether there is any practical legislation which could be suggested to meet that branch of your observations?—The only thing, I think, is for there to be an absolute bar to the marriage of these people, but I do not think that is practicable.

35,128. How are you to test it and put it into operation at the time people are contemplating marriage?—You ought to have the whole family history of each of the parties.

35,129. And a certificate of the medical officer?—Yes.

35,130. Of fitness to marry?—Yes, something of that sort, but I do not think it is practicable.

35,131. Would you be prepared to recommend the Legislature to require before any marriage that there should be medical certificates of fitness?—No, I do not go as far as that. If it were done there would be much less insanity in the country.

35,132. Have we in England reached the stage of such legislation?—I think it would be impossible.

35,133. But that is an idea which you think ought to be borne in mind?—Yes.

35,134. Broadly speaking, you would try where you could to check marriage where there was unfitness?—Yes. Of course that would be only carrying out the idea of Sir Thomas More in his "Utopia."

35,135. Then the next point deals with the other branch?—Yes. I take it we all know what the hardships are; they have been enumerated by other witnesses.

35,136. I should like you to read that to make your evidence intelligible afterwards?—(2) "The hardships involved by a marriage with one who afterwards becomes insane, and who may remain so for years, are too obvious to need special comment." They have been repeated so often. "Against these two lines of argument must be set the case of the insane partner of the marriage. (1) The eugenic argument applies mainly to those cases where recovery takes place within a few months, or at the most a year or two from onset, and where, moreover, the illness may never recur. It is precisely in such cases that divorce would seldom be sought voluntarily by the sane husband or wife, and to permit it would manifestly be contrary to humane instincts. On the other hand, were opportunity for divorce restricted to cases of confirmed and presumably incurable insanity, the eugenic argument would be far less applicable, seeing that in the vast majority all risks of transmitted degeneracy would be obviated by their permanent segregation. Yet, even in these cases, divorce, whilst apparently not so essential for the welfare of the race, from the eugenic point of view, might still involve injustice, owing to the difficulty there is in defining "confirmed" insanity, since, as experience and statistics show, recovery does sometimes ensue from a mental derangement that has lasted for years. (2) Nor does it appear right that in order to alleviate the hardships of the sane partner to the marriage, the insane partner should be deprived of the sympathy and support naturally due from husband, wife, or children. That he or she is, in many instances, so deprived, does not affect the principle of the marriage bond. To break a family tie by sanction of law because of the mental illness of one member, is to adopt a course which would be universally condemned if the case were one of bodily disease, however chronic and disabling. The case of the mental patient would be harder still should recovery take place after a divorce has been obtained. The question does not appear to be a simple one, and of its necessity it is difficult to judge without an intimate knowledge of families where such cases of insanity exist. Doubtless there are many other considerations which would weigh on one or other side in individual circumstances. It is true that in the course of asylum visits one not infrequently meets with the subjects of chronic insanity whose existence has come to be practically ignored by those whose close ties of relationship should be a claim on their regard. On the other hand, it is equally true that there are numberless instances of an almost pathetic devotion to a mentally afflicted partner, which testifies to the fidelity with which marriage vows have been kept. And many an asylum patient, whose prospect of recovery is practically nil, is kept in touch with his or her family by correspondence, if not by frequent visitation."

35,137. If I might summarise what you have said there, you have put some arguments on both sides?—I have endeavoured to do so.

35,138. But I should like to know if you heard Lord Guthrie's questions as to the four conditions. Assume that those were complied with, on which side of the fence would you come down?—I think I should still be on the side of the insane. I feel I am a sort of guardian of the insane, and I do not think the position of the insane is sufficiently recognised, or, I might say, that there is sufficient allowance made by the public generally.

35,139. Now, may I ask whether that is not looking at this subject rather too much from the point of view of those whom you specially have care of?—Undoubtedly that is so; I admit it.

35,141. If you look at it from that side it presents a different aspect, does it not?—I do not know that in a large number of cases there would be such hardship by the family having an insane parent in the asylum. I always think that might be exaggerated. I think it is a great consideration whether they shall not really still retain their link with the insane parent, however incurable.

35,142. Might I ask you whether you think that sufficiently considers the case of the poorer classes. In other branches of this inquiry we have had this class of case presented, that amongst the poorer classes a man, looked at from this point of view, is practically obliged to have someone in his house to look after his children and himself, and he has no accommodation such as in the houses of the well-to-do, where there are separate rooms and so on; and that the relations inevitably lead to immorality. And so also the converse case of the woman is put. Do not you think the matter is worthy of consideration from that point of view, where there is a hopeless separation between the husband and the wife?—I think, my Lord, under Lord Guthrie's conditions, as Sir James Crichton-Browne pointed out, a certain number of years must elapse, and then the man has endured his hardship for the very worst period, and has got over it or become accustomed to it. I should think the hardship would not be so hard as time goes on and his children grow up.

35,143. Might not he say that if he had a hope—the case being represented from the outset as incurable—that after a time he would be free, that that would enable him to perserve in right conduct which he could not otherwise perserve in?—I do not know. I hold a brief for the insane.

35,144. If I might respectfully suggest it—you seem to be in rather a balanced state?—I am. As I say, I have never thought of the question before I was invited to give evidence.

35,145. Then I think we must judge of it in the light of your facts?—Yes.

35,146. (Mr. Brierley.) Assuming the four grounds that Lord Guthrie has mentioned, and also assuming that the law is administered as carefully as one expects from an English Court of Justice, would you fear that the case of a person having been divorced on the ground of insanity, and afterwards recovering, would be otherwise than very rare indeed?—I have no doubt it would be rare.

35,147. I suppose divorce on the ground of incurable insanity is no new thing in other countries, though it would be in this?—Yes.

35,148. And I suppose their experience on a point of that kind would be of some value?—Yes.

35,149. We have had a Memorandum put in to-day that incurable insanity has been a ground in Prussia ever since 1797; that is, considerably more than a hundred years. We have also had it stated that not in one single case had a person divorced on the ground of insanity ever recovered. That being their experience, would you really anticipate much risk (in granting a divorce on the ground of incurable insanity) of any mistake being made in that respect?—No, I do not think there would be much risk, but of course that is not the whole of my argument.

35,150. No, I quite understand that?—Yes.

35,151. On that one particular point?—Yes, on that one particular point.

35,152. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) Can you consider a greater hardship on a woman than having to cohabit with a man who is an habitual drunkard?—No, it is very hard.

35,153. And can you consider a harder case than a woman having to cohabit with a man who comes out of an asylum with the prospect that he may go in again?—I think they are on a different footing. The man that comes out of the asylum would come out because he was thought to have recovered.

35,154. But the woman—having regard to her feelings and position—is not the hardship the same in the one case as in the other?—Oh no. From what one judges from the women one sees visiting their husbands when they are insane, I think they would welcome them back, and it would be a great joy to them to have them back from the asylum if they recovered.

35,155. But, supposing it was not, ought not she to have the option of putting an end to the marriage tie?—I do not think the two cases are parallel. For my own part, I should much rather give divorce for habitual drunkenness than for insanity.

35,156. (Lord Guthrie.) I ought to know, Doctor, but I do not. You have given statistics of insane people. Are those limited to those who have been certified?—They are.

35,157. Are all certified insane persons in asylums?—Oh no, a great many are living out of asylums in the care of people in private life; and a certain number in their own homes even.

35,158. Could you divide your total into those in asylums and those not in asylums?—It would be possible. I could not on the spur of the moment. You will observe that all my statistics with regard to recovery, and so on, apply only to asylums, as it is only those we have statistics of.

35,159. Is there any real distinction in the condition of those certified people, differentiating those in asylums and those not?—There is a large group of cases which could not be treated outside asylums—which must go to institutions.

35,160. Mania?—Yes, certain forms of mania.

35,161. And suicidal melancholia?—Oh yes, a large number.

35,162. The total which you have given, both the gross total and of the married persons, are those limited to asylum patients?—No.

35,163. Or do those include those in private homes and in their own homes?—Yes, all certified lunatics; I do not think there is an exception. Might I just verify that, my Lord.

35,164. (Chairman.) If you please. (The witness referred to a book.)

(Witness.) No, it does not include those who are living in houses apart from asylums and hospitals. Of course they are only a small number.

35,165. (Lord Guthrie.) Would you be able to furnish the Commission with that number?—No, I am afraid not. There are no statistics whether they are married or single.

35,166. But of the gross?—Oh yes, I can give you those at once.

35,167. Then there are no statistics of the married of those out of asylums?—No. There are only about 600——

35,168. And it might be fairly taken as a similar proportion?—I should think it might be.

35,169. Then, I see that Dr. Clouston uses the expression "registered insane persons.' Does that mean certified?—The same thing in our country.

35,170. You give the certified as 130,000 in England and Wales?—Yes.

35,171. Well, there is some confusion somewhere, because he says in the proof I have that there are 125,000 registered insane persons known to exist in the United Kingdom?—I noticed that in the newspaper report. I could not make it out. I think it was probably on a par with another misprint where he was made to say there were 100,000 criminal lunatics, which is obviously a mistake. It is 1,000.

35,172. (Chairman.) Yes, we had that corrected?—Yes; in the paper it was reported 100,000.

35,173. (Lord Guthrie.) Then I noticed in those figures he says "not including imbeciles and idiots "from birth." Do your statistics include those or not?—They do; they include all those in idiot establishments, but there are a large number of idiots not certified. It is all those certified in this country.

35,174. Can you give us the number of idiots or insane people, roughly, who are not certified in England and Wales?—I am afraid not.

35,175. Would it be hundreds or thousands?—I have not the least idea.

35,176. Am I right in saying there are practically none?—Oh no, that would be wrong. We know there are some.

35,177. But a thousand?—I have never attempted an estimate of that sort. When we go to workhouses we find here and there certain numbers who are obviously insane, and we require their certification; but there must be a good many in the country; the village idiot still exists I suppose.

35,178. Then your statistics do not include those in workhouses?—No, not the admissions. The total number under care does. The 130,000 includes those.

35,179. Or criminal lunatics?—Oh yes, it includes criminal lunatics.

35,180. May I take it in this way, that a patient on admission may be roughly classed as expected to recover or expected not to recover. Would that be too popular a way to put it?—Oh, much too much so. I should say no medical man would make a prognosis on a case that is just admitted.

35,181. How soon could he make a prognosis which would enable him to say: I expect your friend to recover; or, I do not expect that one to recover?—May I leave that to my colleagues? I have no experience of that myself.

35,182. Certainly. The word "hopeless" has been used pretty often in the course of this inquiry. Would you apply that word "hopeless" to any case of insanity?—I should say no.

35,183. You would say as you did about bodily diseases—as a doctor always does—"Where there is "life there is hope"?—Yes, I would be optimistic.

35,184. Are there any cases where recovery is scientifically impossible?—Oh, yes.

35,185. That are scientifically impossible?—Yes, general paralysis of the insane for instance.

35,186. Where there is no difference of opinion amongst experts?—Yes.

35,187. Any other but general paralysis?—I should think some of those cases Dr. Clouston referred to: secondary dementia, where there is marked degeneration in the brain.

35,188. They would be absolutely impossible of recovery, and they would be cases where any fear of divorce would not affect the patient's mental condition or comfort in any way?—No, but the question of fear of divorce would arise long before that, I imagine; long before they fall into that condition.

35,189. And might be an element of driving them into it?—Oh, undoubtedly; I quite agree with what Sir James says about that. I do not think that is sufficiently appreciated—the effect that all this has on the mind of the patient. We meet with so many and talk with so many about their condition, and most of them dwell on their separation from the world and being deprived of all their rights, and if this idea was added that they might be deprived of their husband or wife, I think it would be a very great burden, and possibly a great source of increase of their mental disorder.

35,190. Is not that subject to this, however, Doctor, that in a large number of cases the symptom is aversion to their nearest and dearest?—Oh, well, in a certain number of cases, but I should not think a large number. Here, again, I speak not as an expert, but only by mixing with them. No, it is the other way; so many of them deplore the fact that their friends have left off visiting them.

35,191. Have you had any experience to answer this question. Have you ever known a case where a recovered patient was refused cohabitation by the wife or the husband to whom he or she returned?—I have never heard of it.

35,192. They always take them back as far as you know?—As far as I know.

35,193. Would you agree with Sir James that in such a case there ought to be a power somewhere to enable the wife or husband to refuse to have the recovered person return?—Did Sir James make that statement?

35,194. He did, subject, he said, to evidence that if the recovery turned out to be complete, then ——?—You say, if it was incomplete.

35,195. If a person is let out in the hope that it will be all right and that nothing will recur, would you approve of the wife being able to say:—You are not to come back until a certain period has passed; and of getting protection against the man?—I am not prepared to go so far as that.

35,196. At the present moment she has no power to keep him out?—I think it would depend a good deal on the form which his insanity took. If his insanity was associated with homicidal impulse and so on, I think the dread of recurrence of that would justify her in not having him back for a long period.

35,197. And in getting protection?—Yes; but I do not think so in all cases.

35,198. Suppose, Doctor, that divorce was allowed for insanity, if the insanity of a wife, say, had resulted from the conduct of the husband. In that case, clearly, if divorce was allowed generally, you would disentitle that man to have a remedy?—Yes, I should say so.

35,199. Have you known such a case?—I cannot say that I have.

35,200. You have not?—No.

35,201. It would be a rare case?—It is possible.

35,202. But if such a case occurred you would, of course, disentitle him to any remedy?—I imagine so.

35,203. I see at the end of your proof you speak of numberless cases of an almost pathetic devotion to a mentally afflicted partner which testifies to the fidelity with which the marriage tie has been kept. Do you think that is a sequitur?—Yes, it is an indication that he still loves and regards his wife.

35,204. Is not that quite consistent with certain instincts of nature driving him to a certain course?—I do not know; I should have thought, if he still felt affection for his wife, however afflicted she was, he would restrain those. That is why I put that in.

35,205. (Sir Frederick Treves.) With regard to one point that Lord Guthrie mentioned, would you endorse this statement by Dr. Clouston: "There are very few "cases indeed where I should feel justified in giving an "opinion that any case is incurable within twelve "months from the onset"?—Oh, quite.

35,207. On one point of your figures—your gross number of 130,000 covers all cases of certified lunatics?—That is so; all that are known to us.

35,208. But then your cases of recovery, when it comes to 9·1 per cent. for three years and 1·6 per cent. for six to ten years, those are based on cases only in asylums?—That is so.

35,209. And I take it that fact does not disturb the conclusions?—I should think not.

35,210. The cases not in asylums are comparatively few?—Quite so.

35,211. Though the figures are not dealing with quite the same solid mass the general conclusions are not different?—No; the recovery of those in private care I should say are higher, because they are not such severe cases as a rule.

35,212. But we should not be wrong if we took your figures as generally correct for the whole mass?—No.

35,213. Then I take it the cases of lunatics who would resent divorce proceedings are not very numerous, are they? Some lunatics would very much resent?—Yes, those suffering from delusional insanity would undoubtedly, because they are very intelligent people; they feel the hardship much more of being shut up, and complain most of their confinement.

35,214. But the number is not very great?—The proportion of delusional cases is not so high in comparison with the others.

35,215. Yes, Dr. Clouston gave us the numbers?—Yes.

35,216. Then you say that as a Commissioner your interests and sympathies are naturally with the insane?—Undoubtedly.

35,217. As a matter of fact are there any interests that concern the insane in connection with divorce in really incurable cases. Taking the mass of incurable lunatics with whom we are dealing now, and regarding the matter of divorce, which is the only matter under discussion now; has the larger proportion of those lunatics any interest?—Do you mean, are they capable of appreciating things?

35,218. We are told by Dr. Clouston that the bulk knew nothing about divorce and were indifferent to the visits of their friends?—I think you would like to hear other evidence with regard to that indifference to their friends. I cannot speak as against Dr. Clouston, but I should think in very many of the most demented cases there is just a gleam—that is the last thing to go very often—of family affection. It is only to that extent that the question of divorce would come in.

35,219. We get at last, then, to this basis with Dr. Clouston; the lunatic of whom you can say, he is incurable; he is totally beyond any possibility of understanding a single detail about any divorce and he derives no comfort from the visits of his friends. With such a person you would say: they have no interests—or have they?—I think I should agree with you, but I do not think it would be necessary to alter the law for their sake; I do not think there would be many applications in such cases. They are evidently very chronic cases; they have gone on for years. I do not suppose anybody would want to take proceedings.

35,220. We were rather led to suppose that in some cases of terminal dementia that state may be reached within, say, five years?—Yes.

35,221. Another point is this. It has been suggested in obtaining a certificate of incurability that the case should be submitted to three medical men, one the medical man under whose personal care the lunatic is, and the other two, two experts in lunacy. Now do you really think there would be any likelihood of much miscarriage of justice in decision as to the incurability of the case?—Oh no, I think three men of expert knowledge, if they are agreed upon the question, might safely guide one.

35,222. Considering that those who recover after an interval of, say, three to five years only come to 9·1 per cent.?—Yes.

35,223. The probability of a wrong conclusion being arrived at must, I take it, be small?—It must be small. Might I just remark I think the whole question ought not to be made one as to the individual concerned only; but the very fact of divorce being added to their other disabilities is the last straw almost; there is hardly anything left for them and they are regarded, as I think Dr. Jones said, as dead. I think that is an attitude which the public ought not to take towards their insane.

35,224. But practically they are dead?—They are practically treated as dead; and I have brought down here a book, the second edition of which was published ten years after the man was in the asylum, and which is issued by the publisher as by the "late" so-and-so; and that man is still in the asylum and has been for 40 years. The publisher considers him dead, and that idea ought to be got out of the public mind. They are still members of the community, and, as far as possible, should be treated so.

35,225. But there are some even beyond that ——? —There are some who are perfectly mindless.

35,226. Then, Lord Guthrie spoke of a wife's insanity as possibly due to a husband's misconduct. As far as we know, that would be due to a case of general paralysis of the insane?—That is the only instance I could think of.

35,227. And inasmuch as that does not come in this category?—It would not come into the four considerations.

35,228. It being rapidly fatal?—Yes.

35,229. Then, speaking of the eugenic side of it, you say "every opportunity for divorce restricted to "cases of confirmed and presumably incurable insanity, "the eugenic argument would be far less applicable." You are speaking again from the point of view of the insane; but if there were divorce, I take it it allows the sane wife to bear healthy children, and the sane husband to be the father of healthy children, does it not?—Oh yes, from that point of view. You are quite right. I was only thinking of the eugenic argument as applied to the insane person.

35,230. So, taking the eugenic argument as applied to the sane person, there is something to be considered?—Oh yes. undoubtedly.

35,231. (Sir George White.) You admit the severity and the number of hardships that exist under the present system?—I do.

35,232. Then may I put this point: the number of recovery cases in two years you give as 88·9 per cent., and taking three years further on as 9·1 per cent. Therefore within the limit of five years you have practically 98 per cent. of all that are going to recover. Now will you weigh the interests of the husband or the wife and the interests of the State with regard to the hardships that you admit are not equal, and hardships that might occur to the two per cent. that are left of possible recoveries. What I want to bring your mind to is that residue of those affected, if the law is altered, is practically only two per cent. of the possible recoveries; and yet we are to continue admitted hardships in all forms on the one hand as against the two per cent. on the other?—Yes; two per cent. of those who were discharged as recovered within 20 years of their admission. Out of 20,000 admissions these would number 7,500, so 2 per cent. would be 150. Of course, if one tries to balance these things the scale weighs much heavier on the one side than the other; but one still has the idea, as I say, that it is not simply the individual; it would not only be the interest of these 150, but the whole community of lunatics would be affected by the change in the law. It would be recognised that if they become permanently insane all their family ties would be broken, and I think that is a hardship which they ought not ——

35,233. A hardship on whom?—On the insane.

35,234. Then you will remember, of course, that the hardship comes on that proportion of the insane who are less likely to recover and therefore would be less affected in all probability by these outside circumstances?—But many a chronic lunatic, I should think, has as fine and sensitive feelings as a sane person. The insanity does not always deprive him of all feeling.

35,235. Of course you have to weigh the hardships?—I should not weigh them at all. I am afraid I would say that I do not see the necessity for the alteration in the law. There must be hard cases always; we have to submit to it, and it is a very great hardship for a person to have a wife or husband becoming insane, but I think it is one of the inevitable things. I am afraid I have got to that position.

35,236. Then you have spoken of the fidelity shown by, say, the wife to the husband whilst inside the asylum. If the law is altered, it does not compel that wife to get a divorce against her husband; and, therefore, where these feelings existed to any strong degree, then the divorce would not be sought?—True; but on the other hand, they only form a small minority. Those that are quite faithful, and we want if possible to increase the number of those attached to their insane relatives. It would not increase that number if they felt they could get rid of them entirely by law; they would not go on visiting them at all; they would be neglected almost ab initio.

35,237. But if there is this refined feeling of fidelity, would the effect of the knowledge that they could get a divorce reduce or drive that feeling away?—I think it would lead to few being visited; the sane partners would be likely to form other attachments. It is not only wives and husbands but children too. No, I think one must put the insanes' side as strongly as possible, because the world at large does not recognise it.

35,238. You have no figures to give us on the matter that arose with a witness last week, as to the total number of insane as compared with, say, ten years ago?—I did not think it was material to this inquiry, but it is published every year—the numbers, how they rise. It does not show the actual increase of insanity, but only of the certified insane.

35,239. (Chairman.) May I take it the statistics you have given cover all lunatics within the jurisdiction of the Commissioners?—They do.

35,240. And are those either in asylums or in homes or at private houses?—Yes; those that refer to the general numbers refer to the whole. The 130,000 embraces all certified persons, including those in workhouses or in single care or out-door paupers.

35,241. Over what people have you jurisdiction—those in asylums?—We have over all of them.

35,242. Those in homes and those kept in their own private houses?—We have all.

35,243. All where they have been brought before the magistrate and ultimately certified?—Yes.

35,244. But nobody else?—No.

35,245. The Orders may allow them to be kept at home or in a home, or sent to an asylum?—That is so.

35,246. Then, does any question of religious views enter into your consideration?—No, I should say not. I have not been influenced in my opinions, perhaps not even by humanitarian views. I have spoken merely as a member of the community.

35,247. Then one other matter. You think that the notion that a suit might be brought against some of the delusional lunatics—if that is the right word to use—might affect them?—Undoubtedly I should.

35,248. To what member would you apply that?—Of the delusional cases?

35,249. Yes, of the delusional cases?—Oh, I should think it would be very difficult to say; but mostly the delusionally insane person does not believe he is insane; therefore, the large majority would feel it and resent it quite as much as——

35,250. What number of married delusional cases are there?—I am afraid I cannot give you that.

35,251. Well, of the whole?—Of the whole there are just about a tenth who are suffering from delusional insanity.

35,252. That would reduce the married cases on the other certificates by a twentieth?—Oh yes; if they were half that would be so.

35,253. Now those cases—following up Sir George White's question—there would be only cases operated upon when the option of the sane partner was brought into play. If there were the fidelity which you have spoken of, then the option would not be exercised I take it?—No.

35,254. And it would then apply only to a certain number of cases in which there was no fidelity left?—Yes.

35,255. And when the option to obtain a divorce was claimed?—Yes.

35,256. Do you think that would be likely to affect a lunatic if the relationship had become such between them that the person outside was no longer desirous of associating with the lunatic under any conditions?—I think it might. I do not know whether I quite appreciate your question, my Lord, but there is no doubt that many lunatics do feel very severely the deprivation of the society of their friends and relatives.

35,257. Yes, but what I was getting at was this: in cases where there was a great attachment the person outside would say: Well, then I leave it where it is, and I visit and pay attentions and so on. Those cases would not be within the divorce consideration, and would not be applied for; but in those cases where it was applied for, it would only be applied for where all desire for intercourse had ceased?—Yes, on the part of the sane.

35,258. Then how would that affect the insane persons, if they were informed all desire for association had gone, whether you come out or stop where you are?—Well, as I say, they feel it very much now.

35,259. Yes, but I do not see how it adds to it?—I do not see why you should give relief to those people who have not shown sympathy to their friends. It seems to me that those that seek relief largely will be those who have lost all sympathy for their husbands and wives. Why should we give them relief?

35,260. The suggestion may be that if you do not they will form ties which are illegal, as we gather from evidence they do?—Well that applies more to men than women, of course, but I should have thought that if a man is a right-minded man he would not do such a thing. Seeing that such a large proportion of the community are single and not married ——

35,261. If everybody were right-minded we should not be sitting here?—Should we legislate for the wrong-minded?

(Chairman.) I should like to thank you, Dr. Coupland, very much indeed on behalf of the Commissioners for your very interesting and valuable facts.

Adjourned for a short time.

Dr. FREDERICK NEEDHAM called and examined.

35,262. (Chairman.) What is your full name?—Frederick Needham.

35,263. Have you medical qualifications?—Yes; I am a Doctor of Medicine.

35,264. Have you anything to add to that?—No, I do not think so. I am one of the Commissioners in Lunacy.

35,265. Were you also a member of the Feeble Minded Commission?—I was, my Lord.

35,266. You have prepared a short memorandum of some points?—Yes; it is a very short one I think.

35,267. Have you it before you?—Yes. I should like to say, my Lord, before I begin, I do not in any way represent the Lunacy Commission. The Lunacy Commission were asked to give evidence and they were obliged to say they had no collective opinion on this subject, but that their medical members would, if the Commission wished it, place their experience and such knowledge as they possessed at the disposal of the Commission. Therefore, anything that I say, I say entirely on my own account.

35,268. The first paragraph of your memorandum deals with a different date to what we have already had. It deals with the 1st January 1909?—Yes.

35,269. We had the 1st January 1910 before. Would you kindly just read us the first paragraph?—"On the 1st of January 1909 the certified insane known to be under care were 128,787 persons in England and Wales; 22,244 were admitted during the year 1908, and of these 9,507 were married, showing a ratio of 8·4 per 10,000 to the whole married population at the time of the Census of 1901. The Commissioners in Lunacy have no record of the total number or proportion of married persons certified and under care, and it would be exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, to obtain the information."

35,270. We have had various figures given us amounting to many thousands. Are you able to state approximately what you estimate the total number of married persons under supervision is?—I think I should accept Dr. Coupland's statement.

35,271. I think he said 60,000?—About 60,000.

35,272. Somebody yesterday I think said 50,000?—Yes.

35,273. It is immaterial for our purpose which it is, but it is a very large number?—Yes.

35,274. The next paragraph deals with the relation of divorce to insanity. Perhaps you would just state your views about that?—I should like to say that the difficulty of prognosis, the difficulty of saying what patients are going to recover and what patients are not going to recover, is a very great one. I have known a very great number of patients considered to be insane recover after a shorter or longer period; very often after long periods.

35,275. Would it be possible to say that there are a number who for a certain length of time of supervision might reasonably with safety be pronounced to be incurable?—Yes, I think so; these cases of gross brain disease and so on, in which you could certainly say that recovery could not take place.

35,276. Were you present when Lord Guthrie formulated four conditions as a basis upon which a divorce proceeding might be instituted?—Yes.

35,277. What would be your view about giving divorce for insanity, subject to conditions of a somewhat similar character?—Personally, I object strongly to any extension of facilities for divorce. I think that in the case of insanity it would introduce a very dangerous element. I quite agree with what Sir James Crichton-Browne said in that particular; that it would make people much less circumspect in their entering into marriage even than they are at present, and at present they are extraordinarily careless. It is no uncommon thing in my experience for people to consult me as to whether they should or should not marry a certain person who had been insane or who had the strongest possible tendency to insanity, and not in the least take my advice, but simply marry with the almost certainty of insanity supervening.

35,278. Take the case that I ventured to put to Sir James Crichton-Browne out of a letter that I read. I do not know whether you heard that?—Yes.

35,279. Which is the case of a man, judging from his occupation, who would apparently have married an ordinarily healthy person, because he is a working man. How would you cope with that class of case, where there is a family to be looked after, and a case, apparently, of hopeless insanity on the part of the wife?—Of course, I do not think it requires any additional facts to what are within one's own knowledge, or any argument, to show that there must be tremendous hardship constantly occurring, and the only question in one's mind is whether you would not, by introducing the element of divorce into these cases, add an additional hardship instead of taking away a hardship.

35,280. Would not that apply to every ground of divorce—even the present ones?—No, I do not think it would apply to the present ones, my Lord.

35,281. Would you tell us, if you can, what ground you base that view on besides what you have already said?—As regards insane people, I think that the introduction of divorce for insanity would add a tremendously great additional terror to the present stigma of insanity. I think that throughout the country the insane people who are in asylums or out of asylums would be tremendously hampered and hindered and distressed by the introduction of an additional stigma such as this would be.

35,282. Would that apply to those cases that Dr. Clouston mentioned at the beginning of his evidence of secondary dementia?—It would apply to a certain number of cases of secondary dementia in which recovery takes place, because I do not agree with Dr. Clouston that recovery does not take place ever in secondary dementia.

35,283. But I am speaking of cases of reasonably certain incurability?—No, I think people altogether devoid of mind, as so many of these people are, or practically devoid of mind—that whatever was done of that kind would not much affect them, but it would affect very much the whole body of insane people, a very considerable proportion of whom are going to recover, and I think it would interfere very much with their recovery.

35,285. Can you look at it from the point of view of the sane person that is left to bear the hardships that you have spoken of?—Yes, I can, my Lord. It appears to me that what applies to insanity applies to other diseases which are also disabling. I should think phthisis; I should think locomotor ataxia of certain kinds, and chronic rheumatic arthritis, all of which disable people.

35,286. Those do not lead to complete separation necessarily?—No, but I was going to add, in many cases of disablement from cases of that kind patients are necessarily separated from their friends; cases of confirmed and long-continued cancer lasting for years can have disablements of various kinds in which people are taken into institutions for the incurable, and so on. There are a great many of them.

35,287. Of course, people who enter into the matrimonial relationship naturally contemplate they will meet with the ordinary vicissitudes of life, of which disease is almost certain at some time?—Yes.

35,288. Or of old age when decrepitude comes on?—Yes.

35,289. But do you think they contemplate when they marry an apparently sane person that they will be in an asylum after?—No, I do not think so; but I do not think when people marry as a rule they contemplate any physical disablements.

35,290. Is that quite sound; do not we all anticipate that we shall be subject to various disablements and illnesses?—I think we all know it, or at all events we all discover it.

35,291. But none of us contemplates finding oneself in asylums; at least, I hope not?—No.

35,292. However, are there any other points in your proof which you think are worthy of bringing to our attention. I think the figures about recovery are much the same as we have already had?—Yes. I do not think there is anything else, my Lord.

35,293. (Mr. Spender.) It seems to me we are in some slight difficulty about the statistics of recovery. The last witness gave us two figures I think, which looked on the face of them to conflict; one, of the irrecoverable patients in asylums, and some recoverable ones. Could we get closer to the figures by analysing the various kinds of insanity, and putting outside the general paralysis cases and the cases which various witnesses have called irrecoverable from lesions of the brain or degeneration of tissue? Could we put these outside and deal with the recoverable cases, putting out senile dementia and others that may be written off as irrecoverable?—Yes, that could be done, but you do get, in what you consider irrecoverable ones, a certain number of recoveries, which would vitiate anything that you did in that way.

35,294. You cannot put on one side of the line cases like senile dementia and call them irrecoverable?—Yes, I think you can get a certain proportion—I think it is a comparatively small proportion—of people that you can say for certain cannot recover.

35,295. And you do not think that would largely affect the statistics of what are acknowledged to be recoverable cases?—No, I do not think so.

35,296. Then your view is a very strong one that, supposing there was a prospect, however remote, of divorce following, it would be a factor in the treatment of the patient—a deleterious factor?—I think it would have a very bad impression on the patient.

35,297. You think even if it had to be a matter of five years?—Yes, they would say, as they say now: "We are pariahs; we are cast out; this is an additional indignity cast upon us."

35,298. Do you think it would be a material factor in serious cases?—Yes, I think so. And a very curious illustration is this. In the county of Lancaster they built an asylum for chronic and incurable cases, and they did not write over the doors, "This asylum is "for incurable and chronic patients"; but the patients discovered it very quickly; the patients refused to work; the attendants lost all heart, and the asylum became so demoralised altogether that the committee had to come and ask us to allow the asylum to be used for acute as well as chronic cases; they found the segregation of chronic cases like this was demoralising the whole establishment.

35,299. And you think that if there were a presumption that after a certain number of years the sane partner would have the option (not that there would be the compulsion of divorce), you think that would have an operative effect on them?—Yes, I think it would have the same bad effect from the point of view of the insane.

35,300. You would admit there is another point of view?—Quite.

35,301. You have to take the two factors; but your view is that it would introduce a serious new factor in the treatment of the insane?—It would, and I need hardly say that our sympathies are very largely on the side of the insane, as they ought to be.

35,302 (Sir George White.) I understand you agree that when two persons are contemplating marriage they do not give consideration to the possibility of insanity or disease of any kind?—I do not think it enters generally into their consideration.

35,303. Is that quite consistent with what you state, that if facilities for divorce were extended to some cases of insanity, that people would be much less circumspect in forming such alliances than they are now?—Yes, I think so, because I think they would feel there was possible relief. When I say that, I am talking of cases where people know that they are running a very definite risk; cases such as I have mentioned, where people have consulted me as to whether they should marry.

35,304. Yes, but I understood your answer referred to cases in general?—No, cases in particular.

35,305. Then may I put this question, apart from your sympathy with the insane, which is a natural sympathy, are you in favour of the present law of divorce, or are you against divorce in any circumstances?—No, I have nothing to say against the present law of divorce. I should be sorry to see it extended but I have nothing to say against the present law of divorce.

35,306. In this expression of sympathy with the insane, do not you overlook to a certain extent the condition in which the partner may be who is outside. Take the cases, of which I know several, where wives are left outside to get their living as best they may. I have a case in my mind where the husband has been back five times, and a comparatively young woman gets her living by letting lodgings, and her husband comes back for a few months, disturbs the whole arrangement, perhaps is very angry that she has lodgers, and all her prospects are ruined and the household upset; and yet apparently (it has been going on for six or seven years) there is no chance of permanent recovery. Is it not a great hardship, and also serious from the point of view of the State as to children?—Certainly.

35,307. And yet you think there is a disadvantage in giving relief?—I think you have to balance the hardship which exists with the hardship which you would introduce, and my conviction at present is, it is not well to enlarge the reasons for divorce.

35,308. (Sir Frederick Treves.) Very properly and naturally, Dr. Needham, you speak in the interests of the insane, and the one argument in your mind is that if insanity becomes a ground for divorce it would be a stigma on lunacy generally; it would still further damage the position of the insane. Do you think that is overbalanced by the amount of distress occasioned to the sane by these marriages?—Yes, I think it would. My own impression is that if you alter the law of divorce you would not have a very very large number of people who would apply for it on the ground of insanity.

35,309. You think not?—I do not think you would. That is a mere matter of opinion.

35,310. With regard to the possibility of certifying. Dr. Clouston rather left this impression in our minds, that the insane person he was contemplating was a person of whom you would say this: The case is incurable, the man or woman has no conception of divorce or what it means, and no intellect to appreciate it, and, thirdly, that he or she derives no comfort from friends?—Yes.

35,311. That is an absolute mental vacuity?—Yes.

35,312. Would it be possible in such cases to give a certificate with a little more certainty than you describe. You say it would be extremely difficult to predict with any reasonable degree of certainty?—Yes.

35,313. Would you use as strong a term as that?—Yes, I think so.

35,414. That almost reads as though it is scarcely possible to do it?—I think it is not possible. You get such extraordinary cases of recovery where you least expect it that you could not give a certificate of that kind.

35,315. I suppose the number of cases in which there would be a miscarriage must be very few?—It depends on what you mean by very few.

35,316. Well, you say that the recoveries after three to five years are only 9 per cent.?—Yes.

35,317. If you take that in the mass of figures, it is a very small number, because you have to reckon with the failures among the nine only?—That is quite true; but I fail to see from my point of view why you should do gross injustice to nine people and inflict a great deal of injury on a great many other people in the way I have indicated, for the sake of attaining what may be an advantage or not.

35,318. But the nine are a mere drop in the ocean compared with the vast numbers, are they not?—Oh, yes, quite.

35,319. And Sir James Crichton-Browne made it very emphatic that he thought the few might be supposed to suffer for the mass?—Yes; I have not been able to bring myself to see that it is proper that you should do wrong that good may result to somebody.

35,320. If it be wrong?—I think it would be wrong.

35,321. Then it has been suggested that in settling what would obviously be a very difficult question, three experts should be employed, the medical officer of the asylum, or the medical person in charge of the lunatic, and two other experts?—Yes.

35,322. Do you think that evidence would satisfy you if you heard it?—No, it would not satisfy me, for the simple reason, Sir Frederick, that before I was a Commissioner, which I have been for nearly 20 years, I was a superintendent at two asylums, therefore I may consider I am an expert myself, and I would be extremely sorry to have a question of that sort decided on my evidence.

35,323. And two others?—And two others. Because I know perfectly well that with the best intentions I should be finding myself constantly contradicted by facts. Patients would recover whom I did not expect to recover.

35,324. Then with regard to this argument that if you admit insanity you should admit other diseases, such as chronic arthritis and phthisis. You would hardly say that phthisis and terminal dementia are on the same level?—I see the difference. I see (and one cannot fail to see) the great difference between insanity, taking it generally, and other diseases, taking them generally; that in the one case you get segregation away from home, and in the other case you do not necessarily.

35,325. And moreover, the victim of phthisis, as has been pointed out, may be a charming companion to the very last?—Yes.

35,326. The man may be capable of managing his affairs and looking after his children, and even conducting business of a kind?—Yes.

35,327. You could not say that of insanity?—No; but you have cancer and lupus, and other disfiguring diseases.

35,328. But there is no impairment of mind necessarily?—No, but then you get a considerable number of cases of paralysis in which you get considerable impairment of mind.

35,329. In that instance you get persons who are of unsound mind?—No, not certifiable, and therefore not able to be sent to asylums. You are dealing with people who are disabled for the purpose of companionship to a large extent, but not sufficiently disabled to be obliged to be sent away.

35,330. Disabled mentally?—Yes.

35,331. I suppose the only disease you would put on anything like a parallel with insanity is leprosy, because then they are segregated?—Yes.

(Chairman.) That is a ground in some countries where that prevails, but happily we do not have it here.

35,332. (Mr. Burt.) I just want to be quite clear on one point. I did not distinctly hear your reply to Sir George White, but I understood you to say you are not entirely opposed to divorce?—Yes, I did say so.

35,333. Would you be opposed to any alteration in the law of divorce as it exists at the present time?—Well, that is a general question which I think I could hardly answer unless I knew what the proposed change was to be.

35,334. What I had in my mind was the equality of the sexes?—Yes.

35,335. Assuming you have divorce, would you be in favour of placing women and men on the same legal footing?—Yes, I think so. I do not see why you should make a difference.

35,336. (Lord Guthrie.) With regard to the effect on the insane, Doctor; do you attach chiefly importance to it owing to the fact of the existence of the option or to the exercise of the option?—Oh, the existence of the option.

35,337. The knowledge that the option would be possible?—The knowledge that the option would be possible.

35,338. Supposing that to the four conditions that were previously specified there was added this one; that if it were proved to the satisfaction of the judge that granting divorce would either prevent or imperil recovery he should be entitled to refuse it. Would that affect your opinion in any way?—No, it would not affect my opinion because I think it would be impracticable. I do not see how the opinion of the judge expressed in a particular case would affect the question.

35,339. Because it is not the exercise of the option but the existence of it?—Yes.

35,340. In the case of many lunatics, they never would suppose, would they, that the option would be exercised?—Oh, in the case of many lunatics, certainly not, my lord.

35,341. They would reject the notion, would they not?—Well, a great many patients would be so certain of the affection of their friends that they would reject the notion at once.

35,342. Would it be where there was no affection and the lunatic knew it?—No, I think the general impression upon the patient would be this: "Here am I, degraded by having a disease which separates me from my fellow creatures; they are going to add to me the additional degradation of putting me in the position of having no rights at all by giving an option which might take away my civil rights."

35,343. Do you think that would weigh with many?—I think it would with a very large number, but it would not with a considerable proportion of insane people.

35,344. And the cases where it would weigh, would not they be cases where the wife (if the husband was insane) never came to see him. If she showed affection after he was put in you would not expect in that case that the element would play a part, would you?—I do not quite follow.

35,345. Suppose after the man was put in the wife continued to write to and see him and manifest affection; the idea would never enter his head then?—No, it might not.

35,346. It would be in the case where no such attention was paid?—It might be so.

35,347. You gave a case of the use of the word "incurable" affecting the patient. It so happens that in Edinburgh we have a hospital for incurables, and I have several times objected to the use of the word, and I have been told that they do not care a rap and that it does not affect the spirits in the least. Of course they are sane people. It would be different in the case of insane people, would it; they might brood on it?—I do not dispute your facts with regard to Edinburgh, but I do not believe it with regard to incurable hospitals generally. The sister of a man in one of the incurable hospitals happens to be in my care and I have taken considerable interest in her; and he writes to me continually about her from time to time; and he always carefully obliterates from the head of the letter the word "incurable." That is the place at Streatham.

35,348. That is what one would suppose; but such a thing would weigh more with insane people, who are more likely to brood over things?—I should think so; but this is a striking illustration. It struck us very much; we were very much astonished at it.

35,349. We have had statistics about the percentage of recoveries, such as the case that Sir Frederick Treves mentioned, of 9·1 per cent. recover in 3 to 5 years and 1·6 in from 3 to 10. What does recovery there mean; does that mean liberated?—Oh yes, recovery means liberated, necessarily.

35,350. But then you would require to consider that that percentage is of people who are not recovered permanently but who afterwards come back again?—Yes.

35,351. The percentage would be still further reduced then?—Yes, the ultimate percentage.

35,352. Can you give us any information of how much this 1·6 in from 6 to 10 years would need to be further reduced?—No; I should think that that would be discounted; I should think that would remain a permanent figure.

35,353. Is it discounted, or is it not simply the case of discharged patients that 1·6 per cent. who have been in from 6 to 10 years are in point of fact discharged without regard to the fact that a lot come back again?—No, but the probability is that if the people have been from 6 to 10 years in recovery they would not have rapid recurrences; they would probably remain well. The cases in which you have recoveries with recurrences of the attack are cases of acute insanity; some of them what they call circular insanity, in which you get alternations of depression and excitement, or cases in which you get pure excitement or pure depression coming on acutely from time to time, recurring in months or in years.

35,354. That leads to this question. Is the percentage of recurrences greater or smaller in proportion to the duration of previous insanity?—Oh, probably greater.

35,355. The longer the previous insanity the more likely it is to come back, or the other way?—No, the other way.

35,356. But still, there is a percentage of people who are discharged as recovered, say after six years, who do return?—Yes, no doubt.

35,357. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) Your main objection, Doctor, to the extension of the grounds of divorce to insanity arises from the chances of recovery?—Yes, that is one of the objections.

35,358. When you remove chance of recovery one great ground of your objection goes?—Yes.

35,359. Therefore, assuming you could be positively certain that lunacy was to be permanent, there would be no objection to divorce on the ground of insanity, would there?—Yes, I think there would. Personally, I should have an objection to the extension of divorce to insanity altogether.

35,360. But there is no mischief done in that case to the insane spouse at all?—No, but you get the other objections I have mentioned; you get the objection that the knowledge of the existence of this power is disabling to the whole of the insane throughout the country.

35,361. You have dealt with that matter, but I understand you your greatest ground of objection is the chance of recovery?—That is one of my objections; I should not like to say my greatest, because I have not considered the thing in proportions.

35,362. You can have no experience at present of what would be the effect of knowledge of option of divorce in the case of a person who is permanently insane?—I can only judge from what the influence of other things is on the insane mind. I have no doubt of it.

35,363. (Chairman.) Your last point is that it might affect their recovery?—Yes.

35,364. But supposing we deal only with the cases that are admittedly incurable and there is no recovery to consider?—No, my lord, but it would affect the whole body of insane people who are under treatment—the knowledge that this disablement might be put upon them. It would affect the whole body of them, and would, I think, militate very much against their recovery.

(Chairman.) Thank you very much for your evidence, Doctor.

Dr. E. Marriott Cooke called and examined.

35,365. (Chairman.) Are you a medical doctor?—Yes.

35,366. What are your qualifications?—Bachelor of Medicine in the University of London.

35,367. Are you a Commissioner in Lunacy?—I am.

35,368. You have been good enough also to prepare a memorandum?—Yes.

35,369. I gather your views would be individual, too?—Yes, that is so. I have prepared a few notes irrespective of my colleagues, but I think the evidence I have to give is very much on the lines of that of my colleagues, Dr. Coupland and Dr. Needham. I have known that Dr. Coupland was preparing statistics, and I understood you only required statistics from one of us, so I have not submitted any. But I dare say there are certain points upon which the Commission may like to have my views.

35,370. You say in your notes, "in a certain pro- "portion of cases insanity is brought about by the "patient's own errors?"—That is true.

35,371. But that "in the majority of instances the "sufferer himself is in no respect responsible." Is that in hereditary cases?—It is not limited to hereditary diseases.

35,372. You do not, as I gather from this Memorandum, think that divorce should be treated in any different way from other forms of incurable complaints?—That is so.

35,373. Why do you say that?—For more than half a century, those who had the care and treatment of insane persons have been labouring for the recognition of the fact that insanity is a disease, and any action that would now place insane persons on a more unfavourable footing than those who suffer from other forms of incurable diseases would be, in my opinion, most unfortunate and unscientific.

35,374. The difference has been pointed out to us over and over again, that in insanity cases there is the cessation of mental communion and there is physical separation also, but that that is not so in the ordinary case of disease?—Of course, in many instances the separation is not complete. Ample facilities are afforded in our county asylums for friends of patients to have intercourse with them, and in many instances that opportunity is taken advantage of so far as the means of the relatives will permit. I have no doubt that in the county and borough asylums it is purely a question of expense that prevents the intercourse being more frequent.

35,375. But there is that different existence?—There is; though, of course, as my colleagues have pointed out, there are instances of bodily disease where the patients are bedridden for years. Take for instance certain cases of paraplegia, or those of epilepsy that are unfit to be at home, but where the person is in no way insane, there is enforced separation there.

35,376. You say further on, in your proof that you have not had any expression of wish for divorce by any of the visitors?—I simply state that for what it is worth. It is a fact that while I was superintendent of two large county asylums—first at the Wilts County Asylum some 30 years ago, and then at the Worcester County and City Lunatic Asylum, where I was Medical Superintendent for about 18 years, and where I had nearly 1,200 lunatics under my care, I never heard any relative express a wish that he or she might be divorced.

35,377. I suppose they all knew they could not possibly get a divorce?—I daresay they knew it.

35,378. Because the actual fact is quite inconsistent with the mass of correspondence that has been addressed to us?—Well, I think a good many of them might have said, if they felt it: "I wish I was not "tacked on to my husband any longer as he is in this "unfortunate condition." Without expressing a wish for divorce they might have indicated a wish for separation which they did not.

35,379. The next point in your proof is that you think something should be done "to prevent the fact "being withheld from a person who is about to marry "that the person he proposes to marry has either a "congenital mental defect or has suffered from an "attack of insanity"?—I think that is the only instance in which I would suggest that divorce might perhaps be allowed. I have known of several instances in which the greatest hardship has occurred from these facts being withheld.

35,380. Deliberately?—Knowledge deliberately withheld of insanity having occurred, or of there being a mental weakness. Marriage has taken place and the patient has broken down soon after. I have in mind instances in which it has resulted in a most unhappy life between husband and wife, and been most deleterious to the children. I think that here the question of deliberate deception arises which does not occur in other cases.

35,381. Then you would perhaps accept the view that that might form the foundation of a decree of nullity?—I would.

25,382. And possibly if there be children a declaration of legitimacy so as not to affect them?—Yes.

35,383. That would affect your view?—Quite so.

35,884. Then you suggest that means should be devised to prevent such a fraud, as it is really. Are there any other means except the one you have now mentioned that could be devised?—No.

35,385. (Lord Guthrie.) Can you give me any idea what proportion of discharged cases return?—I went into this question years ago, and I think you may take it that of every 100 persons admitted into a county asylum there are 25 who never return after discharge. The average rate of recovery in asylums varies from year to year, something between 33 to 35 per cent. of the admissions. Of those 35 patients who are discharged out of every 100 some are readmitted; some of the readmissions again are discharged; some are readmitted, sometimes perhaps as many as four times, and a few even more. But the nett result is that of the 35 patients there are 25 who ultimately stay out.

35,386. There are 5 who come back?—Oh, more; there are 8 to 10 who come back, and some of those are discharged again. But ultimately, of the 100 persons originally admitted there are 25 who stay out permanently, and who are never heard of again.

35,387. And some 8 or 10 who return?—Come backwards and forwards; some of them ultimately die in the asylum. 25 remain permanently out of the asylum.

35,388. Now take a person who has been in the asylum more than once. When he is discharged are there cases where the doctor says to himself, "He will be back soon"—expects him to return?—Undoubtedly.

35,389. In such a case, Doctor, you know at the present moment that the wife to whom he returns has no protection against his insisting on his resuming living with her?—That is so.

35,390. Do you think that there ought to be a remedy in that case, entitling her to get from some protection against his insisting on cohabitation?—I have no doubt there are many women who are exceedingly pleased to receive their husbands back to them—actually to live with them—but who would be glad if cohabitation could be avoided; but I cannot remember a woman ever saying to me that she would rather not have her husband back.

35,391. In such a case as I have put every medical man would advise that there should be no cohabitation?—It would be desirable.

35,392. Do not you think that the State ought to lend its aid to assist a woman in preventing what you say——?—In theory, perhaps; but in practice it would be exceedingly difficult.

35,393. You mean it would not be often availed of, do you?—I do not see how it could be enforced.

35,394. Why not; if she could go to a court and get judicial separation temporarily or permanently to prevent the husband insisting. The police would not assist her; they would not turn him out. He goes to the house and insists on her living with him as a husband. Do you think that is a proper state of matters?—I doubt very much if the majority of women would take advantage of such a provision.

35,395. But supposing there are women who would do what they ought to do; do not you think the State should intervene to assist them?—I am very doubtful whether it is a matter in which the State could assist.

35,396. Because of practical difficulties?—Practical difficulties. May I refer to one point on which you asked me a question. A doctor says, "Now this "patient will be back very soon."

35,397. Yes, probably back very soon? — Yes. There was a provision inserted in the Lunacy Act of 1890 requiring that the Medical Officer, in order to keep alive the Reception Order, which is the document under which a person is placed under care, must at certain intervals, first of all at the end of one year, and then at the expiration of another year, and subsequently at the end of two, three and five years, and thereafter at the end of every five years, give a certificate of continuing insanity. Now there are persons as to whom after a time of treatment in an asylum it is very difficult, if not impossible, to give a certificate of insanity, though they may still be in a very unstable mental condition, and in such cases discharge is imperative by the operation of that section of the Act. The Commissioners often have reluctantly, against their will, to insist on the discharge of such persons from care in consequence of that provision. We should be inclined to allow such patients to remain in the asylum, but owing to that provision being introduced into the Act of 1890, which, in my judgment, has considerable disadvantages, there are a number of persons obliged to be discharged who under other circumstances might with advantage be retained.

35,398. You say you never knew a case where the wife, say, had expressed regret with regard to an insane husband that she was still tacked to him?—Personally, I have not.

35,399. Now Sir James Crichton-Browne told us that he had had cases where the wish had been expressed that the insane man was dead, and even proposals that he should be smothered. Have you never had any of these cases?—The only instance I know of is this: Epileptics, as you are aware, are occasionally liable to turn on their faces and be suffocated in their fits, and the only instance in which I can remember anybody making such a reference was a mother who wrote to me and said she was sorry to hear her son was so troublesome and hoped it would not be necessary to smother him. I do not say I have never heard a person say, "Well, it would be a blessing if God took him." That would be the utmost. But one hears that in all sorts of diseases; that it would be a mercy if God took the person who was suffering from some form of malignant disease; but I have never heard anything more than that with reference to any insane patient with whom I have had to do.

35,400. And do you agree with the evidence we have had, that the wife or husband on liberation has in every case gone back to live with the other spouse?—I cannot say that. I have known a few instances of desertion while the patient has been in the asylum.

35,401. But apart from cases of desertion, in every case that you remember had the liberated spouse always gone back to live with the sane one?—Ultimately. Sometimes in the case of the county asylum, as a matter of precaution, the discharge first of all takes place to the workhouse.

35,402. (Mrs. Tennant.) You told us that you have had in your experience certain cases of concealed insanity prior to the marriage. Were those peculiar to any one class or spread over the classes?—They were limited to the upper classes.

35,403. Do you think the concealment was sometimes well meant?—Yes, it has been in some instances in the hopes of causing mental improvement.

35,404. (The Earl of Derby.) Have you known cases of a man or a woman going back—living with the wife or husband, as the case may be, and children being born, and either the husband or wife, as the case may be, coming back into the lunatic asylum?—I do not think I quite follow your question. Is it the return of the patient ——

35,405. A man is in a lunatic asylum, he is discharged as cured; he lives with his wife, and the result is that a child is born; and that man comes back into the lunatic asylum?—Oh, yes, I have known many such cases.

35,406. And that child has very little chance?—Very little. And that is by no means infrequent in the case of a woman being discharged. Some women are particularly liable to puerperal mania. Puerperal maniacs as a rule get quite well; they are some of the most hopeful cases. Some of them after one attack get perfectly well and have healthy children, and are able to bring up their family and have no recurrence. I have had several instances of that kind, where all the children are healthy, but the opposite sometimes happens, the woman after each confinement being afflicted with puerperal mania, and in many instances the children are defective. One sees many instances of that in the asylums. It is almost impossible to go to a county asylum without finding several instances of a mother being there and some of her children.

35,407. You would agree that under those circumstances it would be perfectly legitimate for the husband or the wife, if you would not give them divorce, to apply for a judicial separation?—No, I am not sure that I am willing for that. My point is, why should you make a distinction in insanity? If divorce was to be extended to other cases of hereditary disease it might be done, but why should you make insanity the one exception. It is no doubt very desirable from the State's point of view that all hereditary diseases should be stamped out, but if you begin with one I think it should be done with all. Why should you make a distinction between phthisis and insanity, or cancer and insanity, or syphilis and insanity?

35,408. Is not insanity one of the most growing evils there are at the present moment?—Quite so, but so is syphilis. What is worse?

35,409. No, but insanity is a case where you have detected it. The other cases you do not always detect, but here is a case of insanity where you have detected it, and where you have the case actually in the asylum, and you know he must be insane, and that if he goes out and children are born, that those children must inherit insanity. Having that case in mind, would not you stretch a point?—I do not want insanity penalised, as it were. I do not want our lunatics to be able to say, "I am the only person afflicted with a disease that is put on a par with wrong-doing. Why should I, on account of my disease, be penalised like those who have done wrong?" If you extend divorce to all hereditary diseases I am inclined to change my opinion, because the insane would say: "I am no worse off than anybody else that suffers with an hereditary disease;" but I do not think it is fair that the insane should be singled out.

35,410. No, but you know what the great danger of lunacy is, and how hereditary it is?—So are other diseases.

35,411. Yes, but other diseases are not so well known and do not come under control at any time. Having once got lunacy under control, are not you prepared to say the control extends to this extent? The others—phthisis and so on—you do not get under control in the same way?—Not unless the other hereditary diseases are put on the same footing. I think it is treating unfairly one section of the community that is greatly to be commiserated.

35,412. Yes, but my point is that it is the only one of the diseases that you mention which you do get under the control of a medical officer at any time; none of the others are?—Oh, pardon me. If I may refer to the disease, syphilis, mentioned just now. See how persons afflicted with that disease are often for a time under treatment in hospitals and elsewhere, and yet there is no control exercised over them as regards their discharge, with the result that the disease is often propagated. Surely that ought to be dealt with.

35,413. (Sir Frederick Treves.) There is one point, Dr. Cooke, arising out of Lord Derby's comment on which your opinion would be very valuable. One witness told us this, speaking of asylums, and it took me rather by surprise. He said it frequently happens that the wife demands the bread-winner, or the husband demands his wife's release from an asylum to look after the home before convalescence is fully established, with consequent relapse, re-admission, and possibly children born in the asylum. We asked whether such demand could be acted upon in defiance of the opinion of the medical superintendent of the asylum, and we were told that it could be?—Any three Visitors of an asylum can discharge a patient, irrespective of the opinion of the medical officer, and if such circumstances are brought before the Visitors as to make them think they are justified in discharging a patient, the medical superintendent has nothing to say to it; though I think, in the great majority of instances, the Committees of the County and Borough Asylums would be largely influenced by the views expressed by their medical superintendent.

35,414. You see the impression that must necessarily be left in the minds of those who heard this is that a certain number of lunatics whose convalescence is not by any means established are allowed to go abroad and to cohabit with their husbands or wives, with the result that children are born. Would you say that is a common occurrence?—I could not say that it is not a fact. If a man came to the asylum and said, "I am prepared to do so and so; I am prepared to look after my wife; I have means; I am willing to do all that is necessary," and the Committee of Visitors on inquiry were convinced that that man's statements were reliable, it is open to them to say, "We do not think it is the best thing for your wife, but you wish to have her at home with you, and you can take her."

35,415. Although she has not recovered?—Although she has not recovered.

35,416. Perhaps it would not be fair to ask if you as a Commissioner think well of that practice?—I think it would be exceedingly hard to say a man is never to have his wife at home if he is prepared to look after her. There are many people in this country very insane who are living with their relatives. It is against the spirit of the law to require a man or a woman to be shut up if their relatives are in a position to look after them. The Lunacy Law to a great extent is founded on the principle that it does not interfere with lunatics in their own houses so long as there is no payment, and they are properly looked after.

35,417. You quite see that it looks as though extraordinary facilities were afforded for the propagation of children who will be imbecile or possibly insane?—Yes, but of course you cannot ignore the fact altogether, I think, that you must expect a husband and wife to be reasonable in such circumstances. No doubt some are quite unreasonable, but I take it the majority would be reasonable in such circumstances.

35,418. We are told in one asylum no less than 30 babies were born in the asylum in two years; and we are led to suppose——?—30 babies born in the asylum in two years?

35,419. Yes?—That is very extraordinary; I should think in every county asylum of any size there are two or three women confined every year, and some of those may never have been there before. They may have been admitted as a result of a mental breakdown due to pregnancy; but I never heard of such a number as 30 women in two years being readmitted in one asylum in a pregnant condition. I cannot say it is not true, but it is very unlikely.

35,420. That rider was not added, but coming immediately after a statement of the number of women that come out and have children, and then the fact that 30 were born in two years one naturally infers that those children are the children of the mothers who have been readmitted?—I do not think that should be assumed, because many of those may have been women who had not been previously patients. But in any circumstances 30 from my experience in even the largest of our county asylums where there are 2,500 patients would be a most unusual number, and I can hardly imagine it was a fact; but I cannot say such was not the case.

35,421. (Chairman.) You were asked some percentages about recovery. Can you give me any percentage of those who are admitted into asylums and never go out of them?—It would be about 65 per cent. Out of every 100 there are 33 to 35 who recover, so that it would be the remaining 65.

35,422. Then may I take it that there are 65 per cent. of the persons admitted to asylums who live the rest of their lives and die there?—That is so. Well, no; I think that would be hardly correct, because you would have to allow for those who are discharged relieved.

35,423. Can you give us it fairly roughly—a sufficiently approximate idea?—I should have thought 60 per cent., but that varies a good deal; but, I think, speaking generally, you might put it at 60 per cent.

35,424. Sixty cases admitted to an asylum out of 100 never go out again?—Yes.

35,425. Die there?—Yes.

35,426. And may I take it from the certificates we have that one half of those are married people?—Dr. Coupland is no doubt strictly accurate in his statistics. I am quite prepared to accept his figures.

35,427. Then, in answer to Lord Derby, I gathered that you said there is another disease under control in a manner somewhat similar to lunacy cases. So I understood you. You indicated that another disease was a subject of control in a somewhat similar way to that that occurs in cases of lunacy?—No, I wished to indicate that there were persons suffering from certain diseases whose relatives, though the patients were not under control in the sense of being in an asylum, were obliged to be separated from them.

35,428. May I take it there is no other form of complaint except lunacy as to which at the instigation of someone the State steps in and secludes and controls the patients?—No, not in which the State steps in, but I should say that sane epileptics that are sent to homes are in a somewhat analogous position. It is thought desirable to separate them from their relatives—those that go to homes like Chalfont St. Giles and the David Lewis Epileptic Colony.

35,429. They go voluntarily?—Yes.

35,430. And can go out whenever they like?—Yes, but as a matter of fact they stay. Their disease is such that they have to be separated from their friends.

35,431. But they go in by their own consent?—Yes.

35,432. And so with the habitual drunkard?—Yes, but the difference between habitual drunkards would be that they would not be allowed to leave under a year, whereas the epileptic in Chalfont St. Giles and other similar colonies could go when he liked. There is no detention.

35,433. Then there is no other form of complaint known to human beings in which the State steps in and takes control and absolutely holds the patient subject to its disposal?—No.

35,434. (The Archbishop of York.) The habitual drunkard can be put in by the magistrate.

(Mr. Brierley.) Yes.

(Witness.) I thought your Lordship confined your remarks to patients; you can hardly call an habitual drunkard a patient.

35,435. (Chairman.) Are they entitled to come out at any time by their own wish?—No, I think not, I have not the Inebriates Act thoroughly at my fingers' ends, but I think they must remain for a year.

(Mr. Brierley.) Well there are inebriates' reformatories and inebriates' retreats. The retreat you can go into by consent and you must consent to stop for any period not exceeding two years. The other you can be committed to for three years and you have no right to come out.

35,436. (Chairman.) But leaving that out, there is no other case where the State takes control and keeps control as long as it chooses?—No.

35,437. (The Earl of Derby.) That is the question I wanted to get at before. It is the only complaint in which the doctor on behalf of the State certifies that a man is to be detained and that man cannot leave until that doctor certifies that he is safe and is cured and can go out?—Until the Visitors or other discharging authority permit.

35,438. Well, somebody that exercised the same authority?—Yes, but not the doctor who sent him in.

35,439. I mean it is not a case of three years or one year, but it is as long as the certifying authority considers it is safe for the rest of the community for that man or that woman to be discharged?—Not in all instances, because in the case of a private patient, the person who acts in the position of what is called the petitioner—that is the person who applies to the judicial authority to make the order—the discharge absolutely rests with him, and he can discharge the patient at any time he thinks fit, subject to one provision, namely, that the superintendent of the asylum, or the medical officer of the house can give a barring certificate if he considers that the patient is dangerous to himself or to others; but otherwise, no matter how insane the patient is, if the petitioner orders the discharge the holder of the patient is at once obliged to set him free.

35,440. Does that only apply to private patients?—Yes. In the case of paupers discharge rests entirely with the Visitors.

(Lord Guthrie.) The doctor referred to patients discharged only as relieved. Is it a fact that the patients are habitually discharged whom the doctors cannot say have recovered.

35,441. (Chairman.) Would you kindly follow up what Lord Guthrie suggests. Is it a fact that patients are discharged from the ordinary asylum when there is no proof that they are completely recovered?—From pauper asylums?

35,442. Yes?—Occasionally, but not very frequently.

35,443. From the private asylums——?—There is no bar to that beyond the one I have just mentioned. In the public asylums the Visitors of the asylum have to be satisfied that the provision for the patient in case of discharge is sufficient, and in that event, though of course the medical officer may be consulted, the order is made by three Visitors. In public asylums the ordinary order of discharge is made by two Visitors on the advice of the medical superintendent that the patient is recovered; but in the other instance, though the medical officer is in the great majority of instances consulted, the discharge rests entirely with the three Visitors of the asylum.

35,444. Now you are speaking of the private ones?—In the private ones that rests entirely with the petitioner, in private cases. Of course, now and again a person is admitted on a wrong order, and we take the initiative and say, this person must be discharged, but that is a matter of routine only.

35,445. Are all those matters you have spoken of dealt with by the Lunacy Act?—Yes.

35,446. We can study the provisions there?—Yes, in the sections dealing with discharge.

35,447. Do you find in practice that people are allowed out and return?—Oh, undoubtedly. Particularly, I should say, to a greater extent in establishments where there are private patients: their relatives being in a better position to look after them, they wish to try and see how they get on with them and whether they can manage them at home.

35,448. Does that occur from public asylums?—Yes, but not so largely. There is generally the question of means.

35,449. Does that amount to this, that in those cases where they are found to return, the patients, when they went out, although apparently well enough to go, are not so stable and so fixed that they are never likely to return again?—There are certain cases that promise well, but after a trial, they are obliged to return. It is proved that they cannot stand the strain or even the ordinary little worries of life; we often find that. And there are a certain number of people in private establishments whom we know are subject to recurring attacks of insanity, and whom the relatives are glad to have at home during the intervals of the attacks.

35,450. In reference to one or two answers you made to some of the Commissioners as to the difference between insanity and other diseases of a serious character, you said, I think, that you could see no reason why insanity should be dealt with differently as regards divorce from those diseases?—I should very much regret to see it dealt with in any other way.

35,451. Because you said the patients would not like to feel they were stigmatised, whereas other persons suffering from serious complaints were not?—Yes, that they were the only people suffering from disease put into the same category with persons who have committed wrong.

35,452. Would you advocate that all those diseases should be grounds for divorce?—In theory I would, but whether that is practicable is a matter of great doubt. Theoretically it would be an excellent thing for the State if it was made absolutely impossible for persons who are afflicted with hereditary disease to propagate children.

35,453. And a step in that direction would be allowing divorce on those grounds?—On those grounds. Whether it is practicable is another point; but in the interests of the State it would be a great advantage.

(Chairman.) I have to thank you very much on behalf of the Commissioners for your very valuable evidence, doctor.

Dr. Robert Reid Rentoul called and examined.

35,454. (Chairman.) Is your name Robert Reid Rentoul?—Yes.

35,455. Are you practising in Liverpool?—I am practising in Liverpool.

35,456. I think you communicated with the secretary with a view to presenting some of your views to the Commissioners?—Yes.

35,457. Now, we have had your proof before us and I find a good deal of it is what I might call argument or discussion, and I therefore propose only to ask you some points on which I want to get your evidence?—Yes.

35,458. You must recollect that we have been sitting a great many days now and had so much evidence that a good deal of the main points are very fully before us. I have your last memorandum, and I want to take your evidence as to the question of whether or not, what you term half divorce or judicial separation, should remain as a remedy or whether it should be abolished?—Do you mean, my Lord, in ordinary cases of life, or with regard to lunacy?

35,459. As a general ground of relief?—I should do away with that altogether.

35,460. And wherever that is given at present you would give grounds of divorce?—Yes.

35,461. And would you include in that lunacy?—I would give a divorce in cases of marked lunacy.

35,462. Where it is incurable?—Where it is incurable.

35,463. How long would you test the curability for?—There is no cure, my Lord, for insanity.

35,464. I mean how long after it has been continuous ——?—Four years, I would say.

35,465. The next point I want to ask you is with regard to re-marriage after divorce. You have expressed the view here that a co-respondent when found guilty should never be permitted to marry the guilty wife?—Yes.

35,466. Or the guilty husband be permitted to marry the guilty woman?—Yes.

35,467. That is an opinion, I take it. It is not founded on any facts?—It is founded on some of the United States' Acts.

35,468. I think you may take it we have all the laws of the United States in a large Bluebook?—Yes.

35,469. Then, again, "That no guilty party in "divorce proceedings shall be permitted to marry any "woman until 10 years after the granting of the "divorce"?—Yes.

35,470. There again you refer to the United States' laws, some of which have that provision?—Yes, not 10 years, but a series of years.

35,471. You put 10 years?—Yes.

35,472. You mean in the United States there is a series of years, but not a fixed 10?—Not a fixed 10 years.

35,473. Then you have also suggested from the same laws, "that the injured wife should be permitted "to drop her married name and take her maiden name "if she so wishes, provided that none of her children "are given into her care or control"?—Yes.

35,474. That, again, is taken from the United States' laws?—Yes.

35,475. That is why I am shortening this evidence very much, because we have had so very much of all this before from the actual books in which it is all to be found. Then the next ground for divorce which you maintain, is wilful and continuous desertion for four years and upwards?—Yes.

35,476. And that then the marriage should be dissolved—that is at the option of the petitioner?—Yes.

35,477. And the guilty person be forbidden to re-marry until 10 years after dissolution?—Yes.

35,478. Again, you take that from the United States' laws?—Yes, but not the 10 years.

35,479. In case of crime the husband or wife having been imprisoned for five years or upwards the marriage should be dissolved and the guilty person forbidden to marry again under 10 years?—Yes.

35,480. That is also taken from the United States?—Yes.

(Chairman.) Now, if you will allow me to say so, having got your opinion on those particular points, I do not think it is really necessary to trouble you any further.

Adjourned.

Winchester House, St. James's Square, London, S.W.

THIRTY-NINTH DAY.

Wednesday, 2nd November 1910.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HON. LORD GORELL (Chairman).

The Right Hon. THE EARL OF DERBY, G.C.V.O., C.B.
The LADY FRANCES BALFOUR.
The Right Hon. THOMAS BURT, M.P.
The Hon. LORD GUTHRIE.
Sir FREDERICK TREVES, Bt., G.C.V.O., C.B., LL.D., F.R.C.S.
Sir LEWIS DIBDIN, D.C.L.
Sir GEORE WHITE, M.P.
His Honour JUDGE TINDAL ATKINSON.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.
EDGAR BRIERLEY, Esq.

The Hon. HENRY GORELL BARNES (Secretary).

Mr. MONTAGUE HUGHES CRACKANTHORPE, K.C., called and examined.

35,481. (Chairman.) Your name is very well known to us, but to get it clearly on the notes, you are one of His Majesty's Counsel, and have had a large experience at the Bar?—Yes.

35,482. Since then you have been writing on various subjects?—On some subjects.

35,483. You are also a member of the Eugenics Education Society?—I am president of that society.

35,484. I gather from a note at the end of your proof that what you say is to be taken as your own views, and not as embodying views taken by the council of the society or the members of the society individually?—If you please.

35,485. You do not wish to represent them, but express your own views?—That is so, but at the same time I may add I have no reason to suppose that my colleagues on the council of the Eugenics Education Society would, as a body, differ from what I have said, or what I may say to you to-day.

35,486. You have sent us in a memorandum which we have all read, but I propose to ask you only a few questions upon it, because a good deal of it is historic or dealing with the Acts of Parliament, and so forth. We have the materials ourselves on those points. If you will allow me I will ask you a few questions, and ask you if there is anything you desire to add?—If you please.

35,487. First of all, with regard to the views about marriage and divorce, you consider there are only three different ways of looking at the matter?—Yes.

35,488. One, that marriage is a sacrament and is indissoluble; two, that it is a civil contract dissoluble at the instance of either party by reason of certain acts or defaults of the other party; thirdly, the eugenic theory, which you propose more fully to deal with, that since marriage is an institution for (among other things) the continuance of the human race, it should be subject to regulation by the community, which must be either helped or hindered in its progress by the children that are born into it?—That is my view.

35,489. That is the eugenic theory. You proceed after that to refer to historical matters and I pass entirely by those points. Will you take page 11, where you begin with the principles with which you are immediately concerned. Will you read it, and explain it in any way you desire?—"With an eye both to domestic happiness and to the progress of humanity, eugenics urges the importance of 'right selection' before marriage, holding that without such selection the vows of love and fidelity exchanged at the altar may, and probably will, turn out to be a mockery. For the same reason eugenists protest against the giving in marriage of young women by their parents and guardians with a view to secure what is vulgarly called 'a good match.' A really good match requires not only mutual love, but common or reciprocal interests in life; that is to say, either that both parties should be interested in the same things, or, better still, that each should be interested in the 'things' of the other, while cultivating separate interests of his or her own. This is the key to that intimate association and friendship which stands the test of time. This it is, when there are added to it the 'things of the spirit,' that makes a happy home. Eugenics, although it primarily means, as everyone knows, 'good breeding,' also includes good environment. It therefore lays very great stress on the happiness of the home, for happy homes make happy children, and happy children have far better chance than unhappy children of growing into good and useful citizens." May I say that I have from time to time looked at the reports of the evidence of the witnesses who have preceded me, and I have observed a singular silence with regard to children. They have spoken of the married parties: what should be a ground of divorce as regards the parties; how that divorce may work hardship, and so on, but they have left out of account apparently the children for whom, according to the Church of England, and according to the eugenic view, marriage is, I will not say primarily ordained—I have to use words which to me are not exactly the phrases I should like to use, but I will use the received words—for which marriage was primarily ordained, or at any rate secondarily ordained. That is the first observation I make on that class of evidence. There is a good deal of talk also outside this Commission. With regard to the point I am making in this paper, that marriage should not be entered on without proper safeguards against it turning out to be disastrous, it seems to me that that is not only the experience of humanity, but it is also commonsense and intelligible. At present no precaution whatever is taken, even by those who hold that marriage is indissoluble, to avoid those results which would probably follow if all the facts regarding the heredity, past life and otherwise, of the married parties were known and considered. In other words, to put it very shortly, the State at present and the Church, or rather I should say the Church first and the State next, allow what are promiscuous marriages, that is, marriages without forethought as to the biological conditions of the parties, as to their tendency to lunacy or their actual affliction by certain well-known racial poisons, either communicated to them involuntarily, or incurred by them by their own vice. All those points are left out, and the result is that divorce is frequently brought about by the impossibility of people living together when their true nature is revealed to each other. That applies not only to diseases but also to temperaments, although I would not go so far as to suggest in the present state of public opinion that the example of Austria, Sweden, and Switzerland should be followed in allowing divorce on the ground of what is called incompatibility of temperament, or, to employ the German phrase, insuperable aversion. I should not think public opinion is ripe for that. I should hope it would very soon so ripen on the subject that those marriages would not be brought about, because more care would be taken before people betrothed themselves to each other.

35,490. May I say, after discussing that matter somewhat further in the paper I have, on page 13 you proceed to sum it up. Will you read it?—"One half of eugenic teaching is, accordingly, concerned with the production of the fit; the other half with the elimination of the unfit. By fitness or unfitness are here meant the presence or absence of that amount of health which goes to make up civic worth and usefulness. These two halves are complementary to each other, since selection implies rejection. The first half is called positive or constructive eugenics, and its earliest exponent was Sir Francis Galton, in his 'Hereditary Genius' (1869) and Natural 'Inheritance' (1889). It justifies its name by teaching one generation to be at once the architect and the builder of the next, using the best available materials. The second half is called negative or restrictive eugenics. It teaches the restriction, or restraint, of marriage whenever and wherever the materials to hand are so inferior that they ought not to be used at all. It follows from these definitions that, according to eugenics, marriage and divorce come under the same moral law. Just as there are marriages which, in the interests of the race, ought not to take place, so there are marriages (examples will be given presently) which, having taken place, ought, in the interests of the race, to be dissolved. The doctrine that, once it has been solemnised by the Church, marriage is indissoluble, appears to the eugenist to be, even on biblical principles, irreligious, because inimical to the welfare of humanity, since man 'having been made in the image of God,' humanity is of all Divine institutions by far the best and the highest. The present is not the occasion for presenting even a bare outline of the biological and biometrical researches on which eugenics rest. Those who master this knowledge should study the writings of Francis Galton, August Weissmann, J. A. Thomson, R. H. Lock, Karl Pearson, Archdall Reid, Alfred Ploetz, and others. I do not say that all these authorities are agreed. They are not. But there is enough agreement between them to establish this proposition — that insanity, feeble-mindedness, syphilis, tuberculosis, and any other diseases (including eye defects) are inherited in the same way and to the same extent as are stature, ability, and eye-colour. Direct transmission from parent to child in the sense in which a letter is transmitted through the post, there, of course, is not, for disease, whether mental or bodily, is not a material thing. It is a process which runs its course in some part of the human frame. Tuberculosis and syphilis offer as good an illustration as we could desire. Both are due to specific microbes, but the microbes themselves are not transmitted, for the simple reason that it is the germ-cell that carries the heritable factors, and the microbe cannot form part of the organisation of a germ-cell. What is inherited in each case is, as Thomson points out, a predisposition to caseous degeneration of tissues and a vulnerability to the very kind of microbe which first invaded the parent, should such microbe at a critical moment attack the child or full-grown man. This degeneration or vulnerability may not manifest itself till late in life, or until the second or third generation, the prior generation having been passed over. In the above enumeration of heritable 'defects' I have purposely left out 'habitual drunkenness' or 'alcoholism,' about which a controversy has for some months past been going on in 'The Times' and elsewhere. Let us see how that controversy stands. I will begin by citing the testimony of Dr. Sullivan, a high medical authority, who has written a treatise on 'Alcoholism.' He tells us that in many defective nervous developments of humanity parental alcoholism exercises a causal influence on offspring. In epilepsy such influence has, he says, been noted by one careful observer, in 21 per cent. of the cases, by another in 29 per cent., by a third in 20·2 per cent. In idiocy it has been traced to the father in 471 cases, to the mother in 84 cases, and to both parents in 65 cases out of 1,000. In 150 idiots and imbeciles, whose family history was investigated by a well-known mental pathologist, Dr. Tredgold, it was found present in 46·5 per cent. of the cases, usually in association with insanity or other neuropathic conditions. In prostitutes it has been found in 82 per cent., and in juvenile criminals of weak intellect in 42 per cent. Has this record of facts been displaced by the now famous 'memoir' lately issued from the Galton Laboratory and based on the examination of certain children attending elementary schools in Edinburgh and Manchester? I do not think it has. One would not expect traces of the 'alcohol taint' to be discoverable in a child of tender years; in fact, its non-appearance in such children proves nothing. What we want to know, and what the 'memoir,' limited as it was in its scope, does not tell us, is whether the tendency to excessive drinking is more strongly manifested in adult life when the parent was a drunkard than when the parent was not a drunkard."

35,492. There are two propositions in that, first the propositiou which deals with matters before marriage. Have you any practical suggestion to make as to how that position is to be dealt with?—Although what I suggest must not be taken as ripe for legislation, because popular opinion has to be formed, and, of course, this Commission has enormous power in forming public opinion, I should say that what will have to be aimed at in the future, perhaps in the near future, are legislative provisions whereby licences to marry should not be granted except upon some prima facie testimony, it may be in the form of a medical certificate, or at all events of something which would prima facie establish the fact that there was no such hereditary transmissible defect in either of the parties as would prejudice the children which might be born of that marriage. Let me say why I hold that. It is all a question of point of view. A eugenist like myself regards the future quite as much as he looks back upon the past; indeed he cannot alter the past, but he can alter the future. His aims and objects are directed towards the future: he considers that one generation, if I may use the phrase, is a trustee for the one that follows it. He believes in the improvability of humanity by humanity's own exertions, by humanity availing itself of those biological laws which have been, to use again an expression which is popular, but which I rather object to, revealed, because everything is revealed which man can discover by the intelligence with which he has been gifted. I call that a revelation, and a revelation which is being made from day to day. Unless we take advantage of those truths brought to light by intelligent research and labour of man, guided or not guided by a higher intelligence external to ourselves, or guided or not guided by the immanent Spirit which illumines the highest humanity, in either case divine laws are worked out. Those who would neglect those divine laws which have been so discovered, appear to me not to have comprehended the true principles of religious life or useful citizenship.

35,493. That pretty well exhausts, or at least sufficiently so for the purpose of to-day, the position before marriage. Is there anything you desire to add upon that?—It is perhaps germane to observe, although I do not know that it is within the reference of this Commission, that I think actions for breach of promise of marriage, which is an ante-nuptial business, ought to be abolished. Actions for breach of promise of marriage work very badly for the community and are anti-eugenic. Let me remind you—you do not require to be reminded—of the debate that took place in the House of Commons in 1879, when Sir Farrer Herschell—he was then Mr. Herschell, Member for Durham—moved a resolution for abolishing actions for breach of promise of marriage. It was the third time he had moved that resolution, and he moved it in a new form, because he made a proviso that if the plaintiff could show that pecuniary loss had been incurred by reason of the promise having been repudiated, then that pecuniary loss might be made the subject of an award of damages, but nothing more should be awarded than the pecuniary loss incurred. In that debate I recollect very well it was argued, and it is my argument, that breach of promise of marriage actions work mischief, Sir Farrer Herschell on that occasion put this case: It is no defence to an action for breach of proimse of marriage that the defendant has spent the greater part of his life in a lunatic asylum, although that, of course, being known to himself, he might on that very ground refuse to perform his promise.

35,494. You mean assuming that kind of action stood, it should be an answer to say that there was an unfitness?—Quite.

35,495. In either party?—Either party. Then Sir Henry James pointed out (all this is in Hansard; I think the date is May 1879) that the existence of an action for breach of promise of marriage led to this. When people occupying good social positions become engaged, one party or the other makes the fact known speedily, very often to the friends and relations, and it becomes social gossip, social property, that is to say, in the circles in which those persons move, but before the engagement has proceeded very long the parties, on better acquaintance, discover that they are wholly unsuited to each other, that there is no prospect of their temperaments or tastes becoming assimilated, but public opinion, which is fostered by the existence of this form of action, prevents either of them from withdrawing. The result is, when they go to the altar, as it is called, and it is not an inappropriate term when the marriage is ill-assorted, the parties are conscious within themselves, in spite of the splendour of the ceremony and the large gathering and greeting of friends, the marriage is not going to be a success. Sir Henry James pointed this out very clearly, and that is a point I myself take when anybody says that actions for breach of promise of marriage are useful.

35,496. You bring it in on the point you mentioned to begin with, that, being a case where unfitness was found, there should be at any rate a complete answer to such an action. Does that exhaust matters prior to marriage? You have correctly said they are not strictly within the scope of the Commission. I gather you think they bear very largely on the matter of divorce afterwards?—Yes. There is one other matter, and that is the publication by banns. Under the Act of 1753, 26 George II., marriages which up to that time might have been contracted almost consensually were required to be published beforehand, The publication of banns at the present day I consider to be futile, owing to the well-known fact that locomotion or change of residence is so easy now as compared with what it was in 1753, that the persons to whom the banns are published may not know anything of the persons whose names are mentioned. In a village where people live in a small circle it may be all very well, but in large towns or in a city like London it seems to me preposterous to suppose that that so-called publication is any real publication at all.

35,497. May I pass on to the second branch of the eugenic position, which is indicated in the last paragraph that you read, which is taking it up after marriage has been contracted. Will you explain the view, as bearing on the question of divorce, where marriage has taken place. You have two positions, one you have made plain, as to the position the eugenists take up with regard to the necessity for more precautions being taken in entering into marriage. The other point is, what are the grounds upon which they place their views with regard to divorce, assuming that the marriage has taken place?—The best way to deal with that is not by generalising, but by putting a concrete case. I will take the case of lunacy, because that is a strong case. Suppose that after marriage, there being no presumption against perfect sanity before marriage, one of the parties gives signs of lunacy. Those signs grow until at last the party—let me take the wife, say—has to be put under restraint, and she is away for years. I am now thinking of an actual case. She is away say 20 years, but not continuously, because during those 20 years for short periods she is discharged from the home that received her, on the footing that she was cured. That she was not cured is proved by the fact that three months afterwards she had to go back to the restraint from which she was emancipated. From time to time children are born. I am dealing with an actual case in my mind, but one does not wish to particularise too much. Children are born. In the case I am thinking of two children were born; one of them, about the time when she became adult, destroyed herself, committed suicide. I refer to another case in that paper that occurred in which a man by his own act became non compos because he developed the drink habit late in life. although he had served in Her Majesty's Navy very creditably—I think there is no harm in saying that, for all the parties are dead—and at last had delirium tremens and had to be put under restraint. He had several children by the lady whom he had married, four or five. What happened to those children? I know as to two of them. Only a few months ago in a flat the sister was horrified when she went into her brother's room by finding him hanging from a hook fastened to his door. She herself was a splendid woman; she went on with her work, but the shock, accompanied by the weakness of constitution which she had inherited from her father was such that she broke down absolutely and died quite in the prime of life. I could give you other instances.

35,498. We would rather have your conclusions?—The conclusion I draw is that lunacy, whether curable or incurable, if it is intermittent is eugenically the worse of the two, because there is freedom of action left, and the result is that children are propagated. Although it is quite true that in a sense when you marry you take your partner for better or worse, the consecrated language of the Prayer Book—and I do not wish in the least to quarrel with it—I say that you should not take children or propagate children for better or worse. If you do, you ought to be restrained, because to propagate children for worse is simply to abdicate your duty, to commit a wicked act, a selfish act, and an act which must hinder the progress of the community of which you are a part.

35,499. What is the remedy you propose?—I propose in those cases that the cohabitation should be rendered impossible, that a person should not be let out of an asylum in order to live with his wife and propagate children. Precautions should be taken. I am not formulating an Act of Parliament; you would not expect me to do it, but public opinion will tend in that direction. Acts of Parliament are easily formed and framed when public opinion is rightly formed.

35,500. How far would you go in allowing divorce to be obtained in such cases?—I would allow it for the sake of the parties themselves. I am confining myself now to the parties themselves. I think it is absolutely cruel that a man should marry a girl of whom he knows very little except having met her in society, regarding her as a charming object and perhaps nothing more; that he should, I say, marry that woman, and shortly after marriage, whether hereditarily or not I do not care, she should show that she is of unsound mind, and have to be put away, and remain away for years and years and years, and that man be made a celibate against his will. I think that is extremely hard on the man, and, turning the thing round, it would be equally hard on the woman.

35,501. Would you go further than those who would suggest that a case for divorce should be made where insanity is incurable, and say where it exists and is recurrent?—I do, provided that the medical testimony is that it is not a mere momentary temporary aberration, but recurrent, because I regard that as a permanent state.

35,502. You regard that as incurable except where it was a temporary aberration?—It falls under a different head. It is intermittent and dangerously intermittent, and should be ranked as incurable.

35,503. You rather sum up the position as to indissolubility on page 17 of your proof?—"It will be observed that I say the marriage should be indissoluble, not that the parties should be entitled to a judicial separation only—and for this plain reason. It is monstrously unfair that a healthy, and perhaps young, woman—and the same, mutatis mutandis, holds good of a man—should be condemned, it may be for life, to involuntary celibacy for having ill-selected her partner, or (as often happens) for her partner having been ill-selected for her." Then I deal with judicial separations, and the Act of 1895.

35,504. I would like you to read that, because you have evidently thought this out very fully?—"Here, however, a distinction must be made between different strata of society, between what are called 'the classes' and what are called 'the masses.' Under the Act of 1895 (referred to already) power is given to stipendiary and other magistrates to make an order for separation against deserting or brutal husbands. These orders appear to me to stand on a different footing from orders for judicial separation pronounced in the Divorce Court. A wife cannot apply for a magisterial separation order unless she is living apart from her husband, and her main object usually is to obtain maintenance for herself and her young children out of her husband's weekly wages. She does not in most cases wish for a divorce in order to be able to marry again. Of matrimony, indeed, she has already had too much. But here, too, she ought to have the option after, say, twelve months of separation, to convert her protection order into an order for divorce. She may have an opportunity of making a fresh start in life by a worthy marriage, and, if she desires to be free, why (except on the sacramental theory) is she to be held bound when all the three purposes of marriage have, in her case, been frustrated? The three purposes being the procreation of children, mutual society, and the avoidance of sexual sin. It is, I know, said that the husband, at all events, should remain bound as a punishment for his misconduct, and that the innocent wife cannot therefore be freed. But surely this is a worthless argument, for there can be no greater desecration of marriage than to insist on its continuance merely to penalise the offending partner. For the realisation of their general ideas, for the achievement of their general purpose, eugenists do not at the present moment make their appeal to the Legislature. They rely on the growth of public opinion—the oracle without whose favourable word no parliamentarian ventures nowadays to stir." When I say "for the achievement of their general purpose" I put in the word "general" deliberately and with an object. The Commission for the Care and Control of the Feeble-minded examined that subject and they came to the conclusion that feeble-mindedness, although it was spontaneous in its origin, whatever that word may mean, was certainly hereditary, and the National Association for the Care and Control of the Feeble-minded has been urging the Government of the day ever since that Commission reported to make provision for the segregation of the feeble-minded, so that they should not marry and propagate children with the feeble-minded defect. Last July, I, as president of the society with which I am connected, attended, as part of a deputation, the Prime Minister in Downing Street. I may say that although the Prime Minister had an urgent engagement and had to leave, the Home Secretary and the President of the Local Government Board remained, and both spoke.

35,505. I suppose it was sufficient to make it public?—It was quite public; it was reported. There were reporters present and the deputation proceedings were reported in all the papers, certainly, at least, in "The Times." The Government were sympathetic, and the Home Secretary was good enough to say he was very much struck with what I had said, speaking in the eugenic sense only, and Mr. John Burns seemed perfectly satisfied with the arguments we presented. The National Association have long been urging this Government to bring in some law whereby segregation of feeble-minded persons should be effected. They have promised to consider it. The Prime Minister said it was a most important matter. He would not commit himself, naturally being Prime Minister he could not without consulting the Cabinet, but he was very sympathetic, and the others I have mentioned were on the same line. Therefore, although for their general purpose the Eugenic Society does not press for immediate legislation, yet for the particular purpose of the segregation of the feeble-minded it does so press. There is no inconsistency of conduct in their pressure and not pressing at the same time, and as a member of the deputation which attended last July, in Downing Street, I urged that very point.

35,506. You have indicated the lines on which legislation might proceed in a further direction so as to prevent marriages of the unfit, and dissolving them if there was unfitness?—Yes.

35,507. The next part of your proof gives some instances. Do you think it necessary to go through hem?—No. I have already anticipated one. I do not wish to emphasize those private cases, although there are many others I could have mentioned.

35,508. May I take it your views are supported by instances that have come before you personally which you can verify?—Certainly. There is a case I heard of in Scotland when I was in Edinburgh, after this case was in print.

35,509. At the close of your proof you summarise it. Might I ask you to give us that?—This is put exceedingly shortly, but I will read it if you will allow me. "(a) Marriage—according to eugenics—a privileged, yet terminable contract, a contract of supreme moral, spiritual, and social value, not an indissoluble bond. (b) Restrictions on marriage to be based, not on decrees of General Councils of the Church, but on known laws of health and human progress. These laws, once ascertained, to be as binding on the consciences as the decalogue. (c) Marriage not to be entered on unless there are present soundness of body, saneness of mind, and unity of spirit. These conditions fulfilled, marriage takes on a sacramental quality; without them, incalculable misery may ensue. (d) The mission of eugenics—the education of public opinion on the great question of the relations between the sexes. (e) Public opinion once fully and rightly formed, the required legislation will follow automatically, unchecked by futile party friction or by wearisome debate."

35,510. You have sent to us in addition a small paper, most of which I thiuk you have already covered but I should like to ask you about one passage on page 3, which follows the first point about the State requiring sound conditions of marriage, and it then proceeds to say what is there stated?—This is only a rough outline. Once let the State require sound conditions for marriage, it follows that when these are so unsound that future children would be tainted at birth, separation or divorce should be obtainable so long as the wife is not past child-bearing. This is required by considerations for the national welfare, which are the foundation of national morality.

35,511. So far you have dealt entirely with the question of fitness. Do you wish to present any views as to questions that arise not strictly in connection with fitness, but for conduct which breaks up de facto a marriage tie, for instance, desertion extended over a long period of years? You have not touched upon that. Do you propose to go into that question?—I will if you invite me. I do not wish to press my opinions upon you, but if you invite me I should say with regard to penal servitude, which is involuntary desertion caused by the act of the criminal, I think a wife is entitled, if her husband is sentenced to seven years penal servitude and she is a young woman, to consider her husband as dead, and be entitled to a divorce.

35,512. Would you apply that where the husband has wilfully deserted his wife?—A long desertion implies a complete alienation of affection and probably a transfer of his power of affection, if he has any, to another person. I think the wife has been so injured, and the great purpose of her marriage, mutual society, so frustrated, that she is entitled to be free.

35,513. Would that principle apply to cases where the treatment of the wife by the husband had been such that it was no longer safe for her to live with him?—Certainly. I put it as high as this; wherever the cohabitation would be dangerous to health, not only dangerous to life, I think that ought to be a ground for divorce.

35,514. Do your views result in this, that where those conditions arise the remedy is not by separation but by divorce?—Yes, because I have a strong objection, as many other people have, to these long judicial separations. I think they lead to gross immorality and are very unfair. It is a timid policy which is afraid to say "Divorce" because of some notion that marriage is indissoluble. The a mensa et toro separation was invented by the canon law, and judged by 19th and 20th century facts it is very disastrous, whatever it may have been when first started. It is a historical thing. One can understand how judicial separations took such a prominent part in the Act of 1857, because legislation proceeds gently. Judicial separation was obliged to be there to replace the ecclesiastical decree of separation a mensa et toro, which had been established for many centuries.

35,515. That leaves one further point to ask you upon, and that is important, because what you have said covers all the cases which have been suggested—if I have omitted anything it is my fault—where the object of marriage is frustrated. There is a point you have not touched on, and that is the equality of the sexes. Have you considered that? That is, supposing the grounds of divorce for a woman are the same grounds as for a man?—I would like to say a word upon that. I have touched upon it in the paper, and I daresay I have not expressed myself as fully as I should. It is contended that there should be perfect equality between the sexes. It is sometimes put on biological grounds, sometimes upon the ground of the rights of the woman, and thirdly, it is put upon the moral ground, because it is said the sin of the man is the same as the sin of the woman. Those exhaust the three grounds I have met with by which the absolute equality of the sexes is claimed. Biologically, of course, the sexes are not equal, and never can be made equal, any more in man than they are equal in the protozoa. I agree with what a witness said yesterday—it is the only point on which I do agree with him—that the equality of the sexes cannot be biological. It is not a biological fact. The sexes start equal, but when they attain the age of adolescence, they differentiate; and again, to use a phrase which is popular, I use it because it is so, nature has ordained that they shall differentiate, and for an obvious purpose. In the one case the man has to evolve qua man: in the other, the woman has to "involve" qua woman, because she has to be the mother of the future race. It is that involution, meaning thereby that intricate complexity of the woman which differentiates her from the man. Therefore the logic is defective, because it starts with a false premiss that man and woman are equal. I repeat, they are not biologically equal. Then before the law how should it stand? If you regard matrimonial misconduct as an offence you are treating it from a judicial point of view by the fact you are calling it an offence. I have some knowledge of criminal law; I had 15 years' experience of it. In all offences you must consider the consequences. We do not send a man to the gallows because he points a pistol at a man and tries to shoot him, but the pistol misses fire. You cannot say that you must not look with the eye of the law at the effect. It is impossible to argue that the effect of matrimonial misconduct on the part of a man is the same as matrimonial misconduct on the part of a woman. I go further than that, namely, on the ground of expediency. Marriage I regard as a very sacred thing, a very solemn thing, certainly, and as an estate not to be lightly put an end to; but if the equality of the sexes were perfect, as some people say it should be, if a single act—I have called it an isolated act, Lord Mersey called it an accidental act—I do not appreciate that phrase——

35,516. To relieve his mind possibly; that term is to be found in the debates of 1857. It is not a new term?—I have no doubt it is quite right. It is a good mediæval logical term, an "accident" is no part of the real man's being qua that man: provided it is an "accidens separabile," and not an "accidens inseparabile." Further, when there is a single act proved against a man, if that were to be followed by the same consequences as the single act of misconduct proved against the wife, then divorce would be made too easy, because it would be perfectly possible by a little collusion to bring about a divorce. May I put a concrete case?

35,517. Certainly?—It is not a real case, but a case that might happen any day anywhere. A man and wife after they have lived together a little time find they do not get on so well as they expected, not an uncommon thing to happen to young people during a few months of marriage, for obvious reasons. The estate is new, the discipline, for marriage always is discipline, is new, and for a man the unusual restraint involved creates a feeling that he is not his own master. The wife also often finds that her husband is not the perfect being she imagined when she was "in love" with him and engaged to him. Just imagine these two persons: they have a difference, the man says, and she says, "It is a pity we are married": though they do not say it in terms. The man says to himself, "There is a law now, by which if I commit a certain "matrimonial offence she can divorce me; I will give "her the opportunity." Now, there are at least 60,000 women in Great Britain who are plying the trade of prostitution. I investigated that fact 40 years ago, and the number no doubt has much increased since, but I put it at 60,000. All a man under those circumstances has to do is to compromise himself, as the phrase is; it is generally applied to a woman, but it could be applied to a man if this law were passed. He has only to take up with a woman, taking care that somebody observes him; he has only to go to a house of accommodation—I will speak in plain terms—with that woman, be there a certain time, talk to her perhaps about the sadness of her life, try to reclaim her, and come away. His wife hears of it, "The very case I want," she says. She brings a petition for divorce, alleging that single act: the man does not contradict it: he says nothing: he does not defend it. The result is that all for that single act she can get a divorce. The woman could not do the same thing. There are not 60,000 male prostitutes in London or England. She could not do it. If she did go through that process, if it were possible, she would be a degraded woman: the man would not be. It is useless to shut one's eyes to the facts of bachelor life and also useless to shut one's eyes to the fact that the clients of the unfortunate women, as they are called sometimes, the victims of circumstances more often than not, are very often married men. It would be ridiculous to deny that: it is a patent fact known to everybody who knows the world. In that case I say they are not equal. If the wife did that she would have to do something which would degrade her as a wife. The man in the case I put would be doing something he thought was best for him and his wife without committing a matrimonial offence, and what could the King's Proctor say? If the parties were discreet—you, Sir, have immense experience of what King's Proctors and Queen's Proctors could do—I do not see how the King's Proctor could stop that decree being made absolute at the end of six months if the husband kept his counsel, which of course he would do.

35,518. May I suggest you are not aware that can be done at the present day in the easiest way possible?—I daresay it can.

35,519. I will tell you how it is done. Assume there is the collusion which you mention, but not detectable. You have only to go to the expense of the wife writing a letter to the husband who does not come home, saying, "I want you to return to me," and his declining to do so, and it follows at once he is liable to a suit for restitution. Upon that suit being got through, which is done if he does not appear, desertion for two years is declared, and then she adds to the one act of adultery one cause of desertion, and obtains her decree. Your difficulty will not be got rid of at the present day as it stands. That is the commonest form possible. Sir George Lewis pointed it out, and it is a form well known to me?—I am quite aware of that.

35,520. Except for the poor, who would not be able to afford the expense of that restitution suit, there is no practical difficulty whatever in a woman getting a divorce for one act of adultery now?—The King's Proctor cannot stop that.

35,521. I am pointing out that abolishing the decree of restitution would effect no different result to what at present exists, except in the case of those who could not afford it?—I quite follow.

35,522. There is one other point in that answer you have made, that for the one act a woman can get a judicial separation?—I know, but a woman who will get a judicial separation for one act is a remarkable woman. I do not believe in such. If she is getting on well, I do not believe a woman would say the offence is unforgivable, even if she believed in it. There may be nothing to forgive, but the form might be gone through.

35,523. Does that exhaust that point?—Yes.

35,524. I think I have gone through the whole of your proof. Is there any other point I have not asked you about which you think worthy of our attention?—I do not think there is. Parenthetically, with your assistance, I have been able to introduce another point. I think that foolish marriages are often made by parties who are too young to marry at all. The common law fixes the marriageable age for girls at 12 and for boys, I cannot call them anything else, or lads, at 14. I think that is much too low. I think, considering the solemnity of the marriage state and the consequences to the community that may follow, it is absurd that the age of puberty should be treated as the marriageable age. I believe the only State in North America in which our common law rule of 12 and 14 is adhered to is Virginia. In every other State in North America it is raised to 16 or 18. Consider how absurd it is. Under the Criminal Law Amendment Act the age of consent is, I think, 16. There is a considerable agitation in the country to raise it to 18.

35,525. For a woman?—The consent of the girl against whom the offence is committed is to be raised to 18. Nobody has suggested, apparently, at least I have not seen it, that the age of consent to marriage should be raised. That is one of the anomalies of the English system, where you have no over-ruling power but spasmodic opinions excited here and there by individual cases under the Criminal Law Amendment Act, and the publicity given to them, when every day a marriage may be had under that age, and clergymen, as I understand it, might have an action brought against them if they said to the parties, "You are too young." That is one of the extraordinary things of the present system. If a minister, where banns have been properly published, or there is a special licence, were to say, "I happen to know you, you are one of my parishioners: I know your mother was a lunatic, your father was in an asylum, your brother committed suicide, and nothing will induce me to marry you," and an action was brought against that clergyman, he has no defence in law. I do not say they will get damages, and what the ecclesiastical authorities would say I do not know.

35,526. What ought it to be raised to?—I should say it ought to be raised certainly to 18 for women (I should be glad to see it raised to 21 for men), because women no doubt are much more forward in their development in many things. I should put it at 18 and 21, because getting the consent of the parents is no difficulty.

35,527. At present that can be got round in a moment?—That can be got round in a moment. Not only that, but if the marriage takes place, the marriage abides; you cannot annul it.

35,528. Would you, in addition to raising the ages, advocate that more effective means should be taken with minors to obtain an actual proof of consent by parents or guardians?—Certainly that ought to be done.

35,529. At present they take the affidavit of anyone who applies?—In France that consent has so much normal weight that there is a celebrated case of a great literary man who wanted to marry an actress. I know it is a fact. His mother was living, and lived to a great age. She said: "Not during my life will I consent to your marrying that woman." He married her at 50; she was 50 and he was about 65.

35,530. If I remember the law in France rightly, a man required no consent after he was 30. There were some conditions up to 25, but the French have lately reduced the age somewhat?—Twenty-five is the age in France.

(Chairman.) I think that exhausts all I require to ask you.

35,531. (Sir George White.) The proposition with which you terminate your proof are the ideals you wish to bring public opinion up to?—That is so.

35,532. Therefore they are educational rather than legislative?—Quite true.

35,533. At the same time you will bear in mind any practical work this Commission can do must be legislative in character?—All I could expect this Commission to do would be to give an impetus to the ideals which I think might help greatly, although it did not propose definite law.

35,534. Do you consider that public opinion is ripe for any changes in the way of increasing facilities for divorce?—As far as I know, from the circle I move in and the representative character I hold in communication with a number of persons, I think it is. That is a matter of opinion: I have no statistics. I know by what I see and hear on all sides.

35,535. In your opinion such a question as insanity might be dealt with?—I think it is very strongly held that it might be dealt with.

35,536. May I put it to you whether the opinion to which you have given expression as to maintaining the equality of the sexes is not a little lowering of the ideals to which you have given expression in the propositions with which you conclude your proof, the idea of maintaining the present inequality of the sexes in regard to divorce?—I am glad you have given me an opportunity of meeting this. Of course, the equality of the sexes should be much more brought about than it is by the present law. I think a man who persists in committing adultery should be divorced. I understood the Chairman to take that for granted. I have not read that passage.

35,537. (Chairman.) Perhaps you would state to what extent and in what position you would place the woman?—I do not think I could do better than read what I say about that, because I put it in carefully considered words, and it is a pity to give a second version:—"No; the weak feature of our existing law, and one that gives to the injured wife just cause of complaint, is that no such distinction is made in our Divorce Court between the simple and the aggravated adultery of the husband as is made in our criminal courts between 'common' and 'aggravated' assault. The adultery may have been committed in circumstances of indignity to the wife, for instance, under the common roof; it may have been so promiscuous and persistent as to imply deep moral degradation, that is, on the part of the man; or it may have been so focussed and concentrated upon a particular individual as plainly to indicate to the wife that her husband's love has gone elsewhere. Yet in all cases the wife's only remedy is 'judicial separation,' which enables her to keep him at a distance, but does not carry with it her freedom. It is a grievous hardship to a young and innocent wife to be tied fast to an irreclaimable libertine whom she despises and probably hates, but who is careful not to commit any other matrimonial offence which would entitle her to a complete release." Then I go on to the case of the man.

35,538. (Sir George White.) There is no practical difference of opinion on the statement there put forth, although I understood you to say that a single act of adultery on the part of a woman degraded her but did not degrade the man in the same sense?—I did not mean that. I said if a wife took the step that I supposed the man would take—which I need not detail again—a woman could not do that without being already an unwifely woman, but the man might not be otherwise than a good husband.

35,539. Is not that opinion contrary to the idea you hold in regard to other matters? Does it not occur from a wrong moral sense in the community?—I do not think it does, because I cannot measure sins by objective acts. It is not the way Jesus Christ measured them. He said: "Whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart." The subjective mind is not the objective act.

35,540. The man does not commit the less sin?—I do not know about sin. I cannot judge the sin.

35,541. I presume you would be also in favour of extending the law of divorce so as to give the same facilities between the classes?—I would if it could be done. I know the difficulties about that, but I am not competent to speak on it.

35,542. In regard to insanity, I take it you put before the Commissioners distinctly that intermittent lunacy is in your judgment just as incurable in those cases, and therefore should be a cause for divorce the same as if it had been declared absolutely incurable?—Yes. Matrimonially considered it is more detrimental than the other, because one means restraint and the other does not.

35,543. Have you considered the durability of the insanity, 1, 5, or 12 years—what it should be before the divorce should be obtained?—I could not measure it by years. The lesion of the brain might be explored by Röntgen rays, and you might discover the man could not recover unless he made fresh tissue—made a fresh brain, practically.

35,544. With regard to separations, if a woman goes before a bench of magistrates and gets a separation and a maintenance order, if the circumstances exist at the end of 12 months, that should be a prima facie case for a divorce?—Twelve months or some other similar time. If they are parted for a time that is prima facie evidence they will not come together again.

35,545. In regard to restriction on marriages on some grounds such as you suggest, you would not feel that is ripe to be dealt with by legislation?—No, I do not think it is, but my Society exists for the purpose of forming public opinion on such matters.

35,546. (The Earl of Derby.) You say you would like to see marriages only allowed after a medical certificate had been given. That is your ideal?—That is the ideal.

35,547. In the event of anybody being debarred from marriage owing to a medical certificate, do you not think, with men and women being what they are, there would be a great increase in illegitimate children in this country?—I really could not say, possibly it may be so. I do not think illegitimate children are a terrible thing. I may mention that I am strongly in favour of legitimation by subsequent marriage. I think it is grossly unfair a man should be branded all his life because he was born out of wedlock when his parents are living together, and that he should be set apart from the rest of the family who are of the same flesh and blood.

35,548. I agree with you, but from the ideal point of view it is equally bad for the rest to have an illegitimate child born of unhealthy parents as it is to have legitimate ones?—Quite.

35,549. The effect of such a certificate might be to throw on the world more illegitimate children, who would have less chance of being well looked after than legitimate ones?—That is perfectly true.

35,550. Is not that so?—Yes. There is a great deal to be said on that; it is an argument but not a dominant argument, because I think the other is the stronger. You cannot make any change without some disadvantage.

35,551. One of the cases you gave was of a naval officer; apparently he was a perfectly sober man till after he had left the Navy, and then he took to drink?—I presume he was sober while in the Navy or he would not have remained. It was not long after. It was in consequence of having no discipline to control him.

35,552. The whole point is: were these children born before he gave way to drink or after?—Born after. The fact is this: when the man got better and was said to be cured, he wrote to his wife's father (she having in the meantime gone to live with her father), not to the wife, and said "I propose to come home and resume my position as a husband," or words to that effect. The father communicated that to his daughter. The daughter said: "I can forgive him all his infidelities, but I can never forgive him for giving his children a lunatic for their father."

35,553. The lunacy came on as the result of drink?—Yes.

35,554. Was that drink habit taken to after the children were born or before?—I believe before.

35,555. Because that makes all the difference?—It is a difficult question to answer. I have always understood it was before.

35,556. (Lady Frances Balfour.) We have had your view that the two sexes should not be equal in the eye of the law. Would you alter the law as it stands?—Yes.

35,557. You would take away cruelty as a necessity?—Certainly, provided there was what I have called aggravated adultery.

35,558. You would make it equally for aggravated adultery and for desertion?—Certainly.

35,559. In feeling that the woman has not the same grievance as the man has in what we have called accidental infidelity, you take into account that accidental infidelity may convey to her great disaster in the way of disease and other things?—Certainly. Of course, then, that is cruelty, and therefore you have the two ingredients of divorce at once.

35,560. It makes it rather more serious for her than it would be for the man if the wife committed an accidental infidelity. She is less likely to yield to pressure?—It is a question of probability. One would have to consider who was the communicating party. I agree it is more easy in the one case than in the other to communicate that disease.

35,561. Also, of course, she has more pressure of different sorts of temptation. She may do it of necessity, for livelihood or anything else?—Yes. There is no doubt that is so. "Pressure" was your word?

35,562. Yes?—Of course there are some men about in the world whose affairs are generally carried on with married women. There are such men.

35,563. It seems to make the biological argument a little unfair towards the woman?—You must balance that against the wide door open to collusions. Like all legislation and everything else in life, it is a question of probabilities. You cannot do more than balance one against the other and consider which way the scale inclines. I think a single act of adultery inclines against making that a ground of divorce per se.

35,564. Collusion necessitates the disappearance of that spiritual unity which you lay great stress upon, which makes marriage a sacrament. If there is collusion it means the marriage has ceased?—The parties unite in agreeing that they should disunite. They are for putting an end to an intolerable condition of things, or what they consider to be intolerable, although it might be smoothed down in time.

35,565. Why do you object to collusion, then?—I do not think the law ought to be taken advantage of by collusion, because, if so, that is a shockingly bad example. Collusion and connivance are things which the Divorce Court, according to its traditions, subject to what the Chairman may say, has always set its face against.

35,566. (Mrs. Tennant.) Do you not foresee greater difficulty in defining aggravation in a matter of infidelity than in a matter of assault?—Yes. Although I use the word "aggravated" I should not like to define it. "Aggravated assault" has a special meaning because there have been a number of cases upon it. I use the term to indicate something that is not an isolated or an accidental or a single act. That is all.

35,567. Is it not very difficult to arrive at the something which is not isolated?— Yes, it is, but it is difficult to arrive at what are proper grounds for voluntary separation. When are the parties so much at arms' length that any solicitor who knew his business, or any family friend interested in the case, would say: "There must be a separation; it is useless to bring them together." Judges very often, I believe, in the divorce and certainly in the other courts, desire to bring about a reconciliation. I have seen reports of cases—the Chairman will correct me if I am wrong—where the Judge has said "I shall adjourn this case for three or four days, to see if the parties can come together." He thinks they can, naturally: at least he desires that they shall have an opportunity. The opportunity has been already exhausted before they came into court, and they say "No. The fact is it is impossible under the circumstances. The condition of things may arise from an infinite number of causes. It may be impossible to compel the parties to make up their quarrel, and you have to say "The only course is separation." The same thing happens with a divorce.

35,568. Do you think that it would be safe to use "aggravated" as a basis? What would be aggravating to one woman would not be to another. Might it not be left to her?—I would not leave it to the wife who was so hypersensitive as to seek divorce for a single act. I would not take her ipsa dixit any more than the law takes it for legal cruelty. I should not take the hypersensitive nature: I should take a normal woman. That has been threshed out with regard to cruelty and could be equally with regard to a single act of adultery.

35,569. Would you distinguish between an isolated act, one single act, and an act isolated by years, repeated in two or three years?—Again, an act isolated by years is not a repetition of the act. For practical purposes it is not the same thing, just as with regard to an offence in the criminal law. If a man comes before a criminal Judge and somebody produces a conviction against him which is 15 years old, I should say, and I do not believe there is any criminal Judge who would not, "I cannot take that into account in passing sentence." Where criminality is separated by long intervals it is wiped out. There should be a limitation of time with regard to character as there is with regard to crime.

35,570. That was not the class of case I had in mind. It is improbable any wife would take action in such circumstances. We may rule that out. I was thinking rather of an act repeated in a couple of years. That would hardly fall under "aggravated" or a similar definition?—Of course, if you put a couple of years, that is a shorter interval and is more difficult. The wife may say: "You made such tremendous promises on the last occasion I cannot believe you again; my confidence in you is broken." That is a stronger case, but I would leave a certain amount of discretion to the Judge, because that is where judges are so useful, not only in declaring the law, but in using discretionary powers.

35,571. I suggest you might leave a certain amount of discretion to the wife?—That is sic volo sic jubeo: it is my wish, therefore my command. That is a different thing.

35,572. Take another point of view. Do you not see a danger in dealing with a matter of this kind, which is grave and may have very grave consequences, in the way that one treats the first week in the Workmen's Compensation Act. Is it not taking a material point of view?—I think to take advantage of the first act is to put the case on very material grounds, and to forget the human nature which underlies.

35,573. I think you ignore my point, the discretion of the wife?—I want to know what wife.

35,574. The wife may want to know what husband?—But there are wives and wives.

35,575. I do not wish to pursue it, but there are husbands and husbands?—There are husbands and husbands. After all it is impossible to formulate the thing.

35,576. (Lord Guthrie.) You have written a book which touches incidentally upon this question, namely, "Population and Progress"?—A book it is in a sense, but it is made up of a series of essays the first of which was written 40 years ago.

35,577. In addition to work of that sort and articles in magazines, you have had experience of practical life. You are a Bencher of Lincoln's Inn, and Chairman of Quarter Sessions in Westmoreland?—I have been.

35,578. Are you President of the Eugenics Society?—I am.

35,579. You said, and I agree with you, that many witnesses before us have seemed to ignore or unduly to minimise the interest of the children. Do you not think you, as well as many witnesses, have fallen into another error, namely, by forgetting that marriage involves a question of sex instinct and passion which cannot be reduced to rules of proprieties in the ordinary way, and which will be always different in that respect from all other contracts?—I do not think we have forgotten that.

35,580. You have not mentioned it?—That underlies the thing, because it is part and parcel of us. We cannot escape it. We must bring to bear the traditions and customs in which we live.

35,581. Does not that account for this, that while the views you have given utterance to as to restraint of marriage have been advocated and held by eminent persons for the last 2,000 years, if not more, they have never been given effect to?—Because biology is quite a recent science. The explanation is that we have only recently discovered the difference between the somatic cells and the germ-cells.

35,582. You consider that the propriety of restraining the marriage of the unfit is a recent proposal or suggestion?—No, it is as old as Theognis, who lived in the sixth century B.C. and wrote a caustic poem on the subject.

35,583. Has it not been found in every age, race, and country, impracticable?—I do not think so. What was impracticable in one age may be practicable in another. It depends upon the scientific knowledge of the time. Look at Plato's Republic. His ideas were splendidly eugenic, but he had nothing to back him: he had no facts. Aristotle had no facts, although he was a master of facts. Theognis had no facts: but he was an idealist.

35,584. May I suggest that while you have facts you admit you have no proposals that are practicable?—I do not say that. I point to the legislation of the United States, which is not only practicable but practised.

35,585. In order to carry out your views, would not segregation be the necessary result with the unfit, looking to this, that preventing their marriage does not prevent reproduction by them?—The whole of the class of the unfit could not be dealt with by segregation. The feeble-minded, who are a class of the unfit, could be.

35,586. It involves that necessarily, as far as practicable?—Certainly, but public opinion will do a great deal without legislative segregation.

35,587. Is it not the fact that in marriage the degeneracy of one partner mental and/or physical may be neutralised by the special fitness mental and physical of the other?—I do not think so. According to Mendel's doctrine, which turns on the separation of the unit qualities of the parents, bi-parental reproduction leads to the development of quality A. belonging to one partner in one child and of quality B. belonging to another partner in another child: in other words there is a separation of the unit qualities which Mendel proved to be true of plants, and which many people think is true of humanity.

35,588. That is a question on which there is a great difference of opinion?—But there is a growing agreement of opinion in favour of gametic segregation.

35,589. Is there not this view, that it may neutralise the defect for the immediate generation, although it may reappear?—It is possible. A plus and a minus will together make nothing, but the prevalent scientific view is that in descent plus makes plus and minus makes minus.

35,590. Your views as to restraint would only apply where the woman is not past child-bearing?—Yes.

35,591. In regard to the question of collusion and the question of a single act of adultery, do you know how the facts stand in countries where women are on an equality with men?—I do not know how that is, but I say in my paper, and you no doubt will be able to say if I am right, I should be surprised to find in Scotland, for instance, a single act of adultery made sucessfully a ground of divorce, where there was nothing more.

35,592. If it be the case that in Scotland, where we have had equality for 350 years and we have a vast number of these cases reported in our books down the centuries, and I myself have had a great many hundred cases to deal with, in no single case I know was a divorce suit ever brought by a wife on the ground of a single act of adultery, is it not very academic, this proposed distinction?—No. It seems to me to be a practical proposition.

35,593. Why make the law different when such a case has not been known? May I add this: have you known a case brought for a single act of adultery?—I cannot say I have.

35,594. Have you heard of such a case?—These things are not discussed, even in the recesses of the clubroom.

35,595. Then you have not heard of such a case?—I do not know that I have.

35,596. You have suggested that there may be collusion between husband and wife by an arrangement under which the husband would commit a single act of adultery?—I have suggested that.

35,597. Or did I understand that the suggestion was that he would go and appear to commit such an act?—It was.

35,598. The case you referred to was not a single act of adultery at all; it was a fraud?—I agree. I was supposing the law said a single act of adultery on the part of the husband would entitle the wife to divorce; he would only have to go through that pretence in order that she may get the divorce, and it would make divorce too easy.

35,599. We have had the law for 350 years, and we have had wives changing their minds and going back on every kind of conceivable arrangement with the husbands, and disclosing fraudulent arrangements with a view of having it reduced. If I tell you that we have never had such a case, if I tell you that in the cases I have had the most secret correspondence has been disclosed and I have never seen such a suggestion, do you think it is anything more than academic?—No, but I should say in answer to that, your practice shows you have not the perfect equality, because the law says the wife might have redress and does not use it; therefore the redress is dead, the letter of the law is dead, and the inequality remains.

35,600. I have never known a husband bring an action for divorce against his wife for a single act of adultery. Does that show the law is unjust in giving the right?—I do not know. I think many have been brought in England.

35,601. Are they reported?—I do not know, but I am certain there are many such cases. I do not say there have not been other reasons at the back of it, because if a man loves his wife he might say: "If she has gone wrong with that man once, I have too great an affection for her to take advantage of it." I have known cases of condonation of that sort.

35,602. Is it your view, supposing not a fraudulent case but a real case occurs, of a wife finding out her husband has been guilty of a single act of adultery, she should in no circumstances be entitled to judge the indignity sufficient for her to get a divorce?—No. As I answered Mrs. Tennant, I do not think that it ought to be a woman's option to do it and have a law to support her in it. The law must either say aye or no, that a single act of adultery on the part of a man is ground for divorce, and if it says aye, all sorts of contrivances in England would be resorted to. I do not say the English are as ingenious as the Scotch, but they are very clever in finding out how to avoid the law.

35,603. Do you say in no circumstances should a woman, for a single act of adultery on the part of her husband, get a divorce?—No.

35,604. In what circumstances should a single act of adultery warrant a woman in getting a divorce?—In no circumstances, where the only proof was the objective single act. If the Court knew nothing more than that I should say it ought not to grant a divorce, on the ground of public policy.

35,605. In what circumstances?—I do not quite follow.

35,606. We are considering proposed changes in the law. You admit that the law at the present moment, which in no circumstances gives the wife a right to divorce for a single act of adultery, is wrong?—Yes.

35,607. In what circumstances do you propose that the law should be altered?—I have mentioned three or four. I read them when I was examined a moment ago.

35,608. Does it come to this, in circumstances where the indignity to the wife is substantial?—That is one.

35,609. Do you think that men, looking to what you have said about the difference and inequality between women's and men's nature, are able to judge better than a woman of what is sufficient indignity to her? I will take you and myself. How can we judge what is sufficient indignity to a woman? You admitted the total difference between our point of view and constitution?—This is a puzzle that might be put with regard to most Acts of Parliament. They sometimes lead to an absurdity whether you read them one way or the other. I am afraid I am too old not to know you can put these cases without end.

35,610. You have considered this matter so fully. Have you any views on publication?—Yes. My views are only the views of a member of the public. I do not think that publication should be suppressed. There was a famous case with which you had something to do as judge, if I am not mistaken, which occupied the attention of the public from day to day. The papers never sold better in London; the placards were large. While that case was going on it was a serial, a journalistic de jour en jour, one heard the phrase: "Who is the lady involved now; who is smirched now," and if involved, smirched she was. For in these cases, even if the smirch is removed next day, it remains as far as that lady is concerned. So it goes on, slanders are propagated and the prurience of the public is stimulated. Meanwhile, the newspaper folk ask of each other, "How far may we go next time?" That ought to be stopped. I think it has a shocking effect. The rag and gutter Press of this country is growing day by day. You cannot walk along the streets without seeing it, and if this Commission can put a stop to it as far as divorce is concerned it will be doing enormous public benefit. The Press have lately been taught they must not talk about a man arrested on a warrant, and say that, "He has made a confession." The divorce law ought to teach the same lesson with regard to publication. Suppress altogether, I would certainly not. A great many people are deterred from kicking over the traces because they know their disgrace will be published, and publication is a tremendous restraint. It should not be piecemeal publication, but in some form, either the judgment of the Court or something or other which the Court allows to go forth, consistent with the independence of the Press. In the interest of the public morality I think it should not be a serial, a nauseous prurient tale sold with avidity and gulped down.

35,611. Would it satisfy you and meet the requirements you have indicated if the names of the parties, the nature of the offence, and the result as found by the judge and his judgment were given?—I think it would be very dry reading. I should desire something more. A great deal is to be learned from the Divorce Court. Immense moral lessons are taught there.

35,612. How much further would you go? Would you allow the evidence of witnesses to be published?—I would, but that is a matter of discretion. One would have to be a Press editor to know how to do it. It could be done. Human nature is not to be carried on in the dark although it leads to divorce. Nothing is worse than attempting to cover up things; it stimulates curiosity. I say that with regard to all the relations between the sexes. There is a great deal too much covering up, which leads to great curiosity. Sometimes vice is nothing more to commence with than curiosity indulged, although it ultimately becomes a habit.

35,613. Would you in such cases have the Court open to the public or not, apart from reporting?—As a former practitioner at the bar I object to a closed Court, except for in camera cases which cannot be heard in public.

35,614. Are these cases to which you refer where there are prurient details such as the one you have mentioned, not in camera cases?—I think the judge ought to have a discretion to tell the Press, the Press are always willing, I understand, to act upon the limit, not to report so-and-so.

35,615. I may tell you in that particular case if I had known what was to happen I should have heard it in camera. Do you think I should have been right?—Perfectly.

35,616. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) You have made a life-long study of eugenics?—I have been doing a lot of other things besides. I had to make a living at the bar for 40 years.

35,617. You are not only the President of the Eugenics Society, but practically the founder?—No; Sir Francis Galton, the Hon. President of the Society.

35,618. You are one of the original members?—I am an original member.

35,619. Is it a society with a great many members?—Yes. It publishes a Review, the popularity of which may be shown by one fact, that it pays. It circulates in our Colonies and in America.

35,620. Have you any recollection of the number of members in England?—I could not say. There are at least 400 subscribers. A branch has just been established in Dunedin, New Zealand, of which the Attorney-General of New Zealand is the President. A branch has been established in Liverpool, another is being established in Birmingham and Manchester, and there is in America an eugenic section of the "Breeders' Association" which is making researches into defective family histories, under the direction of Dr. Davenport. This association has lately received considerable financial assistance from a private source. My society, if it had the same help, would number many hundreds of members.

35,621. It would grow?—Yes.

35,622. Substantial financial help would develop it?—Yes, but as it is the Society is growing largely amongst educated people and is a great success.

35,623. The principle you advocate is where there are certain defects present in either party before marriage, that marriage ought not to take place?—I think it is better it should not.

35,624. And, further, if the marriage has taken place under these circumstances, it ought to be in the option of the unblemished party, if a woman, providing she is not past child-bearing, to put an end to it by divorce?—Yes.

35,625. I want to test that with a case. You have mentioned two such leading matters as tuberculosis and syphilis as hereditary taints?—Yes.

35,626. Let us take the case of a man with an undoubted tubercular taint. He is perfectly well, in the prime of life, and married. His wife finds out that there is this tubercular taint. You would say that was a right ground for divorce?—For separation. I do not think I say divorce in all those cases.

35,627. Do you mean what we call judicial separation?—No, voluntary separation.

35,628. Supposing he did not wish to separate, it would come to a marriage under those circumstances that ought to be dissoluble at the instance of the untainted and unblemished party. That would be a case for divorce?—I have said so. I do not withdraw that.

35,629. I do not want to hold you to anything you do not wish to adhere to. If that is your view, two or three things emerge from that. I should like to ask you first of all, does that not give a great opportunity to a woman in the case I put, to get rid of a husband, not on account of the tubercular taint, but because she is tired of him?—Of course, if people do not play fair, but I am supposing that they are playing fair.

35,630. You attach very great weight in another context, I mean in the equality of the sexes point, to the opportunity which a change of the law would give to one partner, the wife, to get rid of the husband for the accidental adultery, to make that an excuse really for the terminating of the marriage by collusion. Does not the same difficulty arise if the law were such that a tubercular husband was liable to be divorced from his wife on account of that?—It certainly would, but it would not be playing fair. It would be perverting the law to another purpose for which it is not framed.

35,631. I want to ask you a practical question. Supposing that divorce takes place, you have a man in the prime of life with tubercular taint, but perfectly well. How are you going to prevent that man getting another family? How can you prevent his setting up another establishment?—By creating such a sound public opinion that no man would dare to do it. I rely upon public opinion. We are all governed by public opinion in our immediate surroundings. Start with a sound public opinion, and a man will no more do that than pick a man's pocket at his club.

35,632. The whole of this inquiry about the enlargement of divorce has at the back of it the natural craving of the human being for sexual relations—put it how you like?—It assumes that.

35,633. You have a man perfectly well, perfectly capable, in the prime of life, and you shut him off from all converse with the other sex. Is that practicable?—There are other ways—I cannot go into them—in which that desire should be satisfied.

35,634. I think it is very necessary to go into them. What are you thinking of?—I am thinking of the limitation of families.

35,635. In this context what does that mean? You have a man who is divorced, and you say there are means by which the natural craving of the sex can be dealt with without the evil of getting children. What do you refer to?—One way is sterilization, asexualization. I do not say I am in favour of that, but I say there is that, and some American laws permit it.

35,636. That means some surgical operation?—Yes, perfectly harmless.

35,637. Harmless so far as the man's health is concerned?—Yes.

35,638. Do you suggest that is the means of meeting the difficulty I have put to you?—No, but I say this thing exists. I am not recommending it.

35,639. If you do not suggest it, do you suggest any other means?—Let those who are driven to it find it out for themselves.

35,640. Do you suggest any other means of meeting that very practical difficulty?—Let me put this case, a woman has produced a fifth child. The doctor goes to the husband and says, "Your wife has had a very bad confinement. If she has another I will not answer for her life. You are in the prime of life. You hear what I say." What is the husband to do? Is he to have a sixth child? These questions are very nice and difficult questions which cannot be answered categorically. A man will find a way out: it depends on temperament. He may say, "It is a matter of indifference to me whether I am conjugally united to my wife or not."

35,641. Observe the difference between your case and the case I put to you. In your case the man has got his wife and is married, and he is called on to exercise a greater or less degree of self-restraint. In the case I have put to you the man is freed: you have divorced him; he is an unmarried man?—I follow you. I am afraid I interrupted the thread of my own discourse. I ought to have gone on to say, as that man rather than have a sixth child will abstain from having intercourse with his wife, so that other man, knowing if he has intercourse with a woman he is liable to bring into the world tuberculous children, will, with the pressure of public opinion which will be brought to bear upon him, abstain.

35,642. Are you not attributing to that man a perfectly unusual amount of heroism? In the circumstances I put to you, he has been divorced on account of the taint which has not become active?—With great respect, I think not. I am attributing to him that cowardice which will not face public opinion on a vital question.

35,643. You think that where there is insanity and it is intermittent, there ought to be divorce, and you put particularly the case of the insane wife?—Yes.

35,644. What is to happen, supposing you have a case of that kind and there is a divorce, the woman being a young woman, and after one of the outbreaks of insanity she recovers and wants to come home. She has been divorced. What is to happen? What do you propose to do with her?—Supposing she recovers?

35,645. I do not mean entirely, but intermittently, during one of the intervals?—He has to exercise the same restraint as in the other cases. He is not to make her the mother of a lunatic.

35,646. I am assuming he has exercised the right you think he ought to have, and has divorced her. What is to happen to that woman?—It is a new case, but no doubt it could be provided for. If a man comes out after seven years' penal servitude and finds his wife gone, having divorced him, what is to happen to him? Society will provide for those cases.

35,647. Is that your only answer for dealing with the case of what is to be practically done with the woman? Supposing she is a poor woman, who is to support her?—He may have to support her.

35,648. Do you propose that the husband who has divorced his wife and married another should still be liable for the support of the former wife?—I have not thought out that point. The vital point is so great that the subordinate points fall into shadow. You cannot think of them all at once. I think of the main points. Society will solve the others.

35,649. If I may put it in that way, you think of one side of the difficulties but you do not suggest a way out for the other side?—No, because it is a subordinate difficulty. The bringing of a lunatic child into the world does not count against the fact that a wife finds herself without a husband after she has recovered from lunacy.

35,650. You said you were dissatisfied as to the adequacy of banns of marriage. Have you any suggestion of a more effective way of letting the public know of an impending marriage?—I think all marriages ought to be civil. The State might publish them in a matrimonial gazette officially established.

35,651. We have the civil marriage law now, and we have machinery for notices of marriage in lieu of banns. Do you think that works better than banns?—I do not think it does. It would work better if an affidavit or certificate had to be furnished in order that the information might be gathered in. The notice would be made public.

35,652. The object of banns and notice to the Registrar is to make it public?—They are not properly made public at present.

35,653. I agree, but what is it you suggest as a substitute? Publication in the London Gazette will not be effective publication?—I suggested an official matrimonial gazette.

35,654. Do you really think if there were an official matrimonial gazette people would take it in and notices in that would reach the public?—I do not see that anybody could be pressed to say how the State is to publish the fact that persons are going to marry. The State will find that out.

35,655. You have no suggestion?—I would rather not make a suggestion.

35,656. In that context you rather blame both the Church and the State for not making more inquiries with regard to the fitness of persons before they are married?—I hardly like to blame the Church, because the Church has inherited things from its forbears when these things were not thought of.

35,657. It is also tied by the State. The Church authorities have no power?—I am not blaming them. I say banns are out of date.

35,658. With regard to the age of marriage, you suggest 21 for men and 18 for women?—I suggested it in answer to the question of the Chairman.

35,659. I should be sorry to be understood to say I think that earlier marriages are wise. Supposing you made that the law, how will you provide for the continence of young men till they are 21? Take the labouring class?—Only by raising the male morality of this country, which wants raising—the standard of morality.

35,660. Which is to come first, the improvement in the average morality of the race or the limitation of the age of marriages?—I do not see how you can put them in opposite scales.

35,661. Chronologically is yours a practical suggestion you would like to see adopted to-morrow, or are you waiting for the improvement of the race before you have it?—No. You will have to wait a generation or two for that.

35,662. You would desire the law to be altered now?—Yes.

35,663. If it were altered to-morrow so that no man could marry till he was 21, what do you suppose would be the condition of morals of the working class young man between 18 and 21?—We should have to deal with the social evil, which has not yet been effectively dealt with, and we should then make men more moral.

35,664. If they could not marry?—Certainly, by raising the standard of morality and withdrawing the casual attractions put before every young man in every city.

35,665. You would increase the attractions. If women could not marry till they were 18 the tendency would be to increase rather than decrease the number of prostitutes?—Women are not naturally inclined to prostitute themselves. Women are naturally chaste and men unchaste. It is well known that many of the young women in this country who work in factories marry too young. It was only yesterday I heard a very distinguished woman, who is thoroughly acquainted with the working classes, say she got into a train in Liverpool when girls were coming from the factory. She was riding third class to witness these people. They trooped in, there was not a woman over 18. They were working hard all day just in the prime of their adolescence. On the face of them, on the figure of them, there was stamped incapacity for motherhood. When they marry what is the result? The children they produce are rickety, as it is called, rickets being a general degeneration of bone, one of the most frequent sources of feebleness. My informant knew what she was talking about. Such is the result of too early marriages.

35,666. I do not see how this bears on early marriages. Do you say these rickety girls would be better without labour?—Certainly. They were too young when put to this work, and they could not stand it. They cannot stand the work when their frames are not well-knit together.

35,667. I am not suggesting that early marriages are wise, but as a practical measure how will you prevent them without producing a serious evil?—I do not think it will be produced. I believe in the chastity of women.

35,668. Do you believe in the chastity of men?—I do not, not if you speak generally.

35,669. That enters into this problem if you do not allow a man to marry till he is 21?—So it does, if you do not allow them to marry when under 18.

35,670. Although you have been asked so many questions on the point of equality of the sexes, I do not understand the reason on which you advocate the continuance of the inequality. I understand the biological argument, and the argument that passion is stronger in man than in woman, but I do not understand your view as to accidental acts of adultery. I do not follow why an accidental act of adultery should be followed by different results when it is committed by a man from when it is committed by a woman. You have given the one ground of the possibility of collusion, and I follow that. Is there any other?—Yes, that women bear children and men do not.

35,671. How does that bear upon an accidental act of adultery?—Because the woman by a single act may become a mother, and the man cannot become a father.

35,672. It is the confusio prolis argument?—Partly.

35,673. You mean the woman, after an isolated act of adultery, may become a mother, which may or may not be put down to the husband. Is not that the point?—Yes, quite.

35,674. Has it occurred to you, after an accidental act of adultery by a man there is always a danger, for instance, of his infecting his wife?—That was put to me by one of the other Commissioners. Of course there is that danger, but that is cruelty.

35,675. That is addressed to a different point. On the question of the evil consequences or the gravity of the consequences, I suggest to you that is a consequence which quite equalises the possibility of confusio prolis?—It seems to me, putting it on the chances only, they are so enormously against the communication of disease from a single act of adultery that it is a negligible quantity.

35,676. You think the danger of infection from a single act is very remote?—I do not mean that the danger from a single act is remote if the partner is already infected, but that the chance of such infection being present is usually remote. One who has lived in the world and has experience of the world knows that.

35,677. I understand what you say as to the greater ease, the greater temptation if you like, of a man to commit adultery than a woman, by reason of the facility of occasion for it, but is that an argument which has much weight in the present day? With the far greater independence of working women particularly and their separate lives, which are so much more a fact than they were when you and I were young, I should have thought the opportunities of misconduct were not so very much different with women than with men?—Except that women have a natural instinct for chastity which men have not, as a rule.

35,678. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) Sir Lewis Dibdin put an instance in which there would be great hardship, where a woman came out from an asylum in an interval of soundness of mind, and found she was divorced. That could easily be provided for as regards her mode of living by giving alimony when the decree is made. The power exists now, I believe, or could be made to exist. I should like your opinion on one other subject. Supposing a petitioner petitions for divorce, and there is no doubt about the guilt of the respondent, but the petitioner is also an offending party. Would you take away the discretion that exists in the Court to say that a divorce should not be granted in that case?—No, I would leave that discretion unimpaired.

35,679. But in the way it is now exercised?—I am not sure I know sufficiently how it is exercised.

35,680. Practically speaking, with very few exceptions, the petitioner who is shown to be an offending partner, whatever may be the offence of the respondent, gets no relief?—I would not allow that. I do not think a man ought to be debarred by having that thrown in his teeth. It might be an old offence and yet I believe, subject to the Chairman, that for all time an act on the part of the petitioner of matrimonial offence would be a perpetual bar to his getting a divorce. I do not know if that is so, but I think it is shocking and wrong if it is.

35,681. I rather gather that you disapprove of judicial separation and would substitute divorce for it?—Not wholly, because under the Act of 1895 I think judicial separation works well.

35,682. That is only temporary separation. You think it should be temporary and not permanent?—Permanent, too.

35,683. In the ordinary sense of a judicial separation, for instance, the wife brings a petition for judicial separation on account of the adultery of her husband; that is a case in which there should be a separation, or a divorce if there is to be separation?—If for a single act, nothing beyond judicial separation. If for repeated acts, I would give divorce.

35,684. In cases where a petitioner has the right to a divorce, would you take away the option so as to prevent the petitioner saying: "I will not have a divorce but I will have a judicial separation"?—No, I would not do that. I would leave her free one way or the other, because a judicial separation might ripen into divorce hereafter. I would not debar her from the half-way house if she likes to enter it.

35,685. There are many cases in which the woman, out of revenge, being entitled to a divorce, simply goes for judicial separation so as to prevent her husband from remarrying. Do you approve of that?—No. I do not approve of her motive, but I think she ought to have the option. I disapprove of her action entirely.

35,686. (Chairman.) I have the letters from the Secretary to the Council of your Society, who asked if they might present witnesses, and being told yes, your name was sent, but I gather, as you told us to begin with, you are not putting it as a representative opinion, but your own opinion?—The explanation is this. It was considered who should represent the Society. I was nominated at once and I accepted the office. I want to guard myself against this: beyond the eugenic view I do not represent the Society, and nothing outside that paper should be taken as the expression of the Society.

35,687. You are taken to be representing the eugenic view, but other matters you have given your own personal opinion upon?—Yes.

35,688. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) With reference to the marriages of young infants and the consent of parents, you are aware that neither under the civil marriage Acts nor the Church Marriages Act can infants marry without the consent of parents?—I understand that if they do, the marriage is not null and void.

35,689 The marriage is valid, but the clergyman has no right to marry them, and the Registrar has no right to solemnise it?—I did not wish to represent the contrary. All I said was the marriage stands.

(Chairman.) Subject to this, the clergyman at present and the Registrar take the affidavit of the applicant himself, (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) No, that is for a licence.

(Chairman.) I do not think the consent of the parents has to be verified other than by affidavit.

35,690. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) The clergyman may take whatever steps he thinks right, and in modern times he has been punished for not taking proper steps?—It is evaded by people writing down they are 21 in the register.

35,691. I am not on the sufficiency of the law, but the facts?—If they do, the marriage takes place and stands.

35,692. (Chairman.) I only meant to get from you that whatever is the law you think proper steps should be taken to ensure that it is a true consent; that is all?—Yes.

35,693. (Mrs. Tennant.) On the question of equality, you suggest that there might be collusion by an act or a pretended act of infidelity on the part of the husband. Might there not be equal collusion by an act or pretended act repeated in the short period of a week, which would possibly come within the definition of "aggravated"?—There might, but collusion repeated in that way would indicate such a settled determination to get rid of the union that the parties had better be separated and even divorced.

35,694. I am putting it to you that both examples of collusion would indicate the same situation. The only difference in the case I put is that instead of pretending on one occasion this husband pretends it on four or five occasions in the one week. It is a very simple matter. It does not cause delay?—That is a new ingenious fraud on the law which the law will have to take cognizance of and stop. When the law is defrauded from time to time, my experience of legislation is that to put an end to such defrauding the law has to be amended.

35,695. Assuming the intention to evade, there is no distinction between pretending the commission of the offence once and on two or three occasions in the same week?—One is a plot and the other is not. It is a different attitude of mind altogether.

35,696. Is not all collusion a plot?—Repeated acts of collusion seem to indicate a different matrimonial condition, pointing to estrangement.

(Chairman.) I should like to thank you on behalf of the Commissioners for your very careful evidence, which has been most instructive to us. I am sure it has been a great deal of trouble to you to prepare such valuable evidence, and I am afraid we have subjected you to a great deal of trouble in giving it.

Dr. Frederick Walker Mott called and examined.

35,697. (Chairman.) You are an M.D., Physician to the Charing Cross Hospital, Pathologist to the London County Asylums, and Fullerian Professor of Physiology at the Royal Institution?—Yes.

35,698. Your name was supplied by the Eugenics Education Society on two points?—Yes.

35,699. You have also sent a publication in the British Medical Journal of a paper on the "Hereditary "Aspects of Nervous and Mental Diseases"?—Yes.

35,700. I have read that through with great care. As far as I follow it is purely of a medical character?—It is quite of a medical character.

35,701. Therefore, I think, it would be more instructive to us if I asked you generally on the two points which the Society has mentioned, which you propose to deal with as bearing upon the subject of divorce?—Yes.

35,702. The two points in the latter associated with your name are insanity and inebriety. I will take insanity first?—I may apologise for sending this paper, but it deals with the facts which I have been studying for some years as pathologist to the London County Asylum in reference to hereditary insanity. It gives a large number of facts showing the relationship of heredity to insanity based on data, which, I think, are incontrovertible. I should have sent a summary, but I was going to Berlin when I received the notice that I had to furnish an epitome. I must apologise for sending this long paper.

35,703. You need not apologise, but the long paper is too medical for the purpose which we have before us. What we want to get is the bearing this question of divorce has with regard to insanity?—Yes.

35,704. I have no doubt you could put that in your own way?—Yes, some years ago I gave evidence before the Royal Commission on the Feeble-Minded, and I endeavoured then to find out the relation of heredity to insanity, but the conditions were not such as to enable me to do that, owing to the fact that in the London County Asylums, under the jurisdiction of the London County Council, they do not take the imbecile class, except in a few instances at one asylum. Therefore I was unable to give more than a very short and unsatisfactory data, but latterly I have been struck with the great frequency of certain forms of insanity in connection with heredity. Considering that in London we have 20,000 lunatics in the asylums, I thought an opportunity presented itself of finding out how many relations there were in asylums. I instituted the card system, and when I commenced this investigation I was surprised to find how few there were known in the various asylums, but after continuing the investigation for some time, I found that there was an enormous number, in fact it has now got up to 2,000 people, who have been in the London County Asylums, either within the last two years or been discharged or died, related to one another, and actually at the present day there are 717 cases of relations so nearly related as parents and offspring, or brothers or sisters, or sisters and sisters, or brothers and brothers. I saw that it was a question which required a statistician to deal with and one who was unbiassed and unprejudiced. I do not care which way it comes out, I want the facts. Therefore I put the cards into the hands of Mr. Edgar Schuster, who has dealt with the subject, and he found that certain forms of insanity are likely to be transmitted in the same form to the offspring. One of them is the recurring insanity, that is, the periodic insanity. It has been known for a long time that what is likely to be transmitted is, not the same form of insanity, but a predisposition to insanity. A child is not born insane, but this predisposition is transmitted to it. A slight incidental condition may develop insanity, whereas with some persons who come from a healthy stock, nothing would make them insane. Drink or disease would not cause insanity. That is the point; that there is a hereditary tendency in certain individuals, and if one takes a large number of pedigrees, you will find that is so. In the hospital with which I am connected, the Charing Cross Hospital, I have taken 40. Of course it takes some time to make the pedigrees if you do them satisfactorily, going back three generations, and finding out what each person suffered from and died with. I then discovered from a comparison of the pedigrees of cases taken at the hospital with those at the asylums (Dr. Elkins, of Leavesden Asylum, which is under the jurisdiction of the Metropolitan Board, was good enough to take 30 pedigrees of chronic imbeciles), the fact that a large number of the pedigrees showed insanity or nervous disease or tuberculosis and syphilis. Therefore I thought it was a matter of importance in connection with eugenics, and also in connection with the question of how to deal with the increase of insanity in this country. The London County Council—I am employed by the London County Council to find out what are the causes of insanity, with a view to stopping the development of it—have had to build a large number of asylums recently—the last 15 years. They have built three large asylums and an epileptic colony, and that does not suffice, and another large asylum is being built shortly, so that it is a question of great importance to the ratepayers. The committee find a great difficulty because these cases of recurrent insanity are discharged and when they are discharged they breed. They are not insane when discharged, but they come back again and again. I have known a case discharged 23 times and readmitted. This woman has a family. You might say, "Are any of the children insane?" We cannot tell yet, because it is not till they have passed puberty that insanity will manifest itself, but I have shown a number of pedigrees illustrating different conditions, and you will observe how it passes through three or four generations. Therefore this question of recurrent insanity is one of great importance. The committee when they discharge patients recognise it and advise the husband to take precautions not to have more children, because they know this is likely to lead to insanity in the offspring. I must say I find these people do take notice of what is said in many instances. I have heard the evidence given this morning and the remarks made with regard to the possibility, if you stop these people having children, or legislating, you may get illegitimate children. That is one of the difficulties that must be met and must be acknowledged. Then with regard to inebriety.

35,705. Before you pass to that, may I get the matter into a little more clear shape. Would your view be that the State should at any rate take more steps than at present to insure that fit people marry?—Yes, in this way. May I just read a little summary I have here: a much more solemn inquiry should be made, not only of the contracting parties but of the relations and witnesses of the marriage, whether they know of any just cause or impediment why these two should not be joined together in holy matrimony. If the system in force in Germany were adopted of annulling marriages if one contracting party had concealed from the other material facts relating to mental or bodily disease, which might lead to infection by the other contracting party (i.e., syphilis) or be transmitted to the offspring (i.e., congenital, syphilis, insanity, and feeble-mindedness), great good would arise, and the seriousness of the marriage vows would be impressed upon the public to the gain of the community.

35,706. Your suggestion is that in those cases, where it is desirable it should take place, the spouse, whether healthy or not, should have a right as against the other party to obtain a declaration of nullity if the facts were concealed at the time of the marriage?—Yes, that it was breach of contract.

35,707. Have you any further suggestion to make as to an improvement in the law with regard to the formation of marriage directed to the question, which has been mentioned, of unfitness?—In what way?

35,708. It has been suggested that no marriage should take place without medical inspection and a certificate of results?—I do not know. I think, possibly, that might lead to illegitimacy and defeat its own ends.

35,709. Your only practical remedy is that the one spouse should have against the other the right to seek for a nullity of the marriage, if the facts were withheld?—Yes.

35,710. And that children who happened to be born in the meantime should be declared legitimate, notwithstanding the annulment?—Yes, I think so.

35,711. That exhausts the matters that occur at the time of marriage?—Yes.

35,712. What is your view as to the rights of divorce in case of the spouses becoming insane, either because their seclusion was to be permanent, or because it was a case of recurrent insanity which was likely to keep on recurring, and in that sense incurable?—May I read this?

35,713. Yes?—Again, if divorce were possible in cases of chronic incurable insanity, where there was no possibility of future mental companionship, and in certain cases of recurrent insanity—I refer to cases where there are several attempts at suicide or homicidal tendencies—where the patient might at any time be dangerous to himself and others, not only would such a dissolution in some instances afford some amelioration of the hard fate which attends a husband or a wife with a partner practically mentally dead and in confinement, but it would also be to the advantage of the community in the education of the public to the importance of heredity in relation to insanity and feeble-mindedness.

35,714. That comes to this, that the ground of divorce should be incurable insanity?—Yes.

35,715. Whether incurable by reason of being continuous, or because its recurrence was so reasonably certain that it might be treated for all practical purposes as continuous?—A recurrency necessitating confinement. If a patient has frequently attempted suicide, and has the suicidal tendency, it is not likely such a patient would be discharged; nor if he has a homicidal tendency.

35,716. How would you deal with the cases where patients are discharged as recovered and yet are found many times back again?—It is very difficult if they are once let out of an asylum. I think often they should not be let out again, but if they are let out of the asylum there is the difficulty, if you divorce them, that they might go on the streets, if women, or have illegitimate children, and so on.

35,717. Can you state whether any of the recurrent cases are such that they are incurable, in the sense that they will continue to recur?—Yes, I think you could, probably; for example, the above case of 23 times.

35,718. Looked at from a lawyer's point of view, it might be possible to declare insanity which was incurable as a ground of divorce, whether it was continuous, or so recurrent that might be treated as hopeless, although not absolutely from day to day?—Yes, that is why I put "certain cases." It would have to be decided on the merits of each case, after a proper inquiry by the physicians.

35,719. Does that substantially exhaust what you have to say upon insanity?—Yes.

35,720. It has been suggested if this ground of divorce were permitted that it would have a bad effect on certain patients in the asylum. Do you anticipate any fears of that kind?—No, I do not. I have been referring to demented patients who are unconscious of their surroundings.

35,721. Do you suggest any modification of the principle if it were shown that it might have a detrimental effect upon patients in asylums, or do you say that that might be disregarded in incurable cases?—I was in Berlin where the Act has been in force for some years, and I inquired of several distinguished alienists, and they found it worked well, especially nullity for the breach of contract.

35,722. Is that part of the German law?—Yes.

35,723. That Act has been in force 10 years?—Yes.

35,724. No hardship has been found towards the insane?—So I understood. In the Catholic districts it is little used, but in Berlin and the Prussian districts it is extensively used.

35,725. Can you tell me to what extent divorce on that ground has been granted?—One of the superintendents of the asylums said that it had been used extensively in Berlin, but in some districts very little. It depends upon the religion of the population and the character of it.

35,726. You are satisfied from the use of it that it has not been detrimental to the lunatic in so far as it has been used?—I do not think so.

35,727. Will you express your views with regard to inebriety?—I did not intend to say much about it, because I have only studied the question with relation to the pathological effects of alcohol. I have considered the effects of alcohol on the people admitted to a hospital, the Charing Cross Hospital, which is in the midst of the liquor traffic, and we have a large number of cases of people accustomed to drink large quantities of alcohol for long periods of time—Covent Garden porters, for example. I have compared the result of drink on those people, with the result on the people admitted to the asylum, and there is a striking difference. The people who come to the hospital may be admitted with cirrhosis of the liver and dropsy, in consequence of prolonged inebriety, but they were not insane, or else they would not have been admitted to a general hospital. I took the records of 2,000 post-mortem examinations, and found 110 cases of people who had suffered with cirrhosis of the liver and ascites in the hospital. I examined 2,000 cases at the Claybury Asylum that had died, and I only found one case of cirrhosis of the liver with ascites, and that was the notorious police character Jane Cakebread, who was convicted nearly 400 times before she was found incapable of taking care of herself. I may say that her brain appeared to me perfectly normal after she died. Therefore I think that drink has a most malicious influence on people who are mentally unstable, and it is the cause of many people being brought into the asylum. The epileptic, the feeble-minded, the mentally unstable, particularly these cases of recurrent insanity, are unable to drink a quantity of liquor which many normal people take every day. A very small quantity is enough to make them anti-social, then certified as insane. The post-mortem records show this difference in the effects of liquor on the mentally stable and the unstable. Secondly, I also asked these people who were admitted to the hospital under my care to bring their children, and if they had any, their grandchildren, and I was surprised to find that the children were generally healthy; in fact, I cannot think that the effect of alcohol is wholly the cause of feeble-mindedness (if it is) in one generation. Very often I have noticed that if the father is a drunkard, owing to the good influence of the mother, the children become total abstainers; if, however, drunkenness exists through three or four generations, one finds disease manifesting itself; but the reason why I consider that drunkenness in the parent will not necessarily produce degeneracy (even chronic inebriety will not produce degeneracy in the children) is that a man who can drink for a great number of years daily large quantities of alcohol and keep out of a hospital, asylum, or a prison, started with a stable mental and physical organisation and he transmits that and not the effect of the alcohol. Of course, there is no proof to show that if he had not been a drunkard the children would not have been stronger. It shows the innate nature of the individual is stronger than environment.

35,728. If the drinking habit is acquired by the unstable, then you have an accentuation of their trouble?—I think so. I have found in going through cases in the asylum, which are alluded to in temperance journals as entirely due to the effect of drink, if I made inquiry, that there was insanity in the family; and further inquiry with regard to relatives in past records of the asylum would show hereditary taint.

35,729. How does this bear on the two questions of prevention or annulment of the marriage and divorce?—The questions of drink and insanity.

35,730. Do you mean that for the purpose of insanity you might prove a person was at the time a habitual drunkard, or so affected as likely to be one?—A small quantity of drink would make a man anti-social if he inherited mental instability.

35,731. To what cases of inebriety would you apply annulment?—I should apply it to cases where it led to cruelty to the wife.

35,732. I can understand your saying that you would apply it to cases of specific disease which you have dealt with under insanity, but how do you apply a case of proof to annulment in the case of inebriety?—I did not say I would give evidence of inebriety for divorce, but I wish to point out especially the impossibility of a person living with a man who was a chronic alcoholic, although he did not at the same time possess the potential instability which would make him dangerous.

35,733. You have said you would follow the German principle of allowing annulment in the case of certain diseases?—Yes.

35,734. Which are of a character which may be generally characterised as indicating insanity?—Yes, or active syphilis.

35,735. Would you extend it in the case of inebriety only to those cases, or would you extend it to where a man was a simple drunkard but healthy otherwise?—If a man is a chronic drunkard, I do not know how he could conceal the fact from the person he is going to marry. He might conceal the fact he had been in the asylum before, and that a little drink would make him anti-social.

35,736. It would go back to physical unfitness apart from drink?—I think so.

35,737. That is before marriage?—Yes.

35,738. How do you formulate any views as to divorce on the ground of these evils?—I have not considered that question and I would rather not express any view.

35,739. (Mr. Brierley.) With regard to recurrent insanity, which entails permanent confinement in an asylum, you would recommend divorce?—Yes.

35,740. What was your opinion with regard to the cases where the patient goes out and may return to his or her family?—I said public policy would be to allow divorce, but that it would be impracticable. It would lead to the women being left without means and they would find another husband, or go on the streets.

35,741. It comes to this, you would make permanent confinement a necessary essential of divorce?—Yes.

35,742. And incurable insanity?—Yes.

35,743. Whether the insanity were permanent or recurrent?—Yes.

35,744. (Chairman.) I did not understand that. I understood you to say that if the insanity was incurable, in the sense that it meant continued incarceration, that was clearly a case for divorce?—Yes.

35,745. If it was incurable in the sense that it would be lasting but recurrent, so that there were lucid times and insane times, would that also be a ground?—Yes, provided the patient when out might become anti-social so as to be dangerous to himself or others. It is the danger to himself or others, such as the case of two or three attempts at suicide which would necessarily mean continuous confinement.

35,746. (Mr. Brierley.) In that case the patient would be continuously confined, but the Chairman was putting a case where the patient is not continuously confined, but, on the other hand, goes out and may, if not divorced, return to his or her family?—There are so many possibilities of doing more harm than good by divorce in such a case.

35,747. Would you be in favour of divorce in that case?—I think not.

35,748. (Chairman.) I still think he means if they were dangerous?—Yes.

35,749. (Mr. Brierley.) You say that if the form of recurring insanity is such that the patient is likely to be dangerous to himself or to others, he ought not to be let out?—He ought not; but he is.

35,750. For that form of insanity you would grant divorce?—Yes.

35,751. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) If a certificate was required in every marriage, that there was no hereditary taint on either side, do you think that there would be many people who could get married?—No, I should think not; I would not require that. After all, love must be the natural mode of bringing two people together. The question is whether it might be advisable to tell people, "Do you know there is insanity in the family, or marked insanity and epilepsy, are you aware of it?"

35,752. Give them the option, you mean?—Yes. I do not think you could interfere beyond that.

35,753. (Sir Frederick Treves.) You have extensive opportunities of studying mental and brain disease?—Yes.

35,754. For a great many years your work has been almost entirely devoted to pathology of these diseases?—Yes.

35,755. You have published works on the subject?—Yes.

35,756. Dealing first of all with all these 717 related people in the London county asylums?—There are 2,000 related; and 717 closely related.

35,757. Now?—Yes.

35,758. What type of insanity is presented by the bulk of these people?—Mostly recurrent insanity, adolescent insanity, delusional insanity, melancholic mania, and epilepsy: that is psychoses rather than organic brain disease.

35,759. You put epilepsy last?—We have put epilepsy with imbecility. They are admitted not because of the fits, but because they are also insane.

35,760. Should we be right in concluding that the insane classes are the classes that are likely to transmit the disease?—Yes.

35,761. That is important?—Yes.

35,762. The kind of insane person that is likely to transmit a nervous trouble, you would put first?—Yes, I should put the recurrent insanity first. In this paper I point out that my statistics agree with those of Sir William Gowers with regard to the hereditary nature of epilepsy, and this form of insanity and its greater incidence of transmission by the female sex.

35,763. The second would be delusional?—That is very strong. A large number of the offspring of insane parents suffer with adolescent insanity.

35,764. The third, melancholia?—The new classification of melancholia makes it rather a disease of past middle life, and most cases now are included under periodic insanity.

35,765. You put that next?—That is the recurrent or periodic; it is the same thing.

35,766. Then the delusional, and thirdly the epileptic?—Yes, those are the pyschoses that are transmitted.

35,767. Is it possible to say what form of insanity or brain trouble it will assume in the offspring?—Usually in the greater number of cases it will not take the same form. It is a tendency to a form of insanity. In recurrent and delusional insanity it shows a similarity much more that in any other form of insanity, and that is because it is hereditary. The Germans have called it "Vererbungskreis," because of its circular condition.

35,768. You consider insanity should be a ground for divorce if it be chronic and incurable?—Yes.

35,769. Can you define the word "chronic" in years?—In Germany it is three years, and I am told it works very well, but if that is thought too short a time, it might be three to five years. I think there are some cases, for example, cases of general paralysis, which are arrested. You can be as certain as any man can of anything that such a man is mentally dead and not able to be discharged, and we have a test by which we can be sure of the disease. Therefore why not grant a divorce in certain cases where there is general paralysis? I will take a case I know very well. A lady marries a man: she is a graduate of a university and was able to earn her living as a high class school teacher. Five years after marriage the man developed general paralysis very acutely, and I thought he would have died within six months, but taken so early it has been arrested. He is practically dead to the world and does not know his wife and friends. For five years she has been tied to this individual and she is unable to get an appointment because they say, "You are a married woman." I think that such is a hard case, because we are certain that man can never recover.

35,770. If you extended the period to five years it would cut out nearly every case of General paralysis?—I think so.

35,771. It may be interesting to the Commission if I ask this question. You regard general paralysis of the insane as due to syphilis?—Absolutely.

35,772. You have shown by your pathological work that the cells of the brain in such a case are destroyed and never can be restored?—They are absolutely destroyed; the nerve cells are perpetual cells, that is to say, they are unlike other cells, they cannot be redeveloped. Therefore when destroyed there is no possibility of regeneration; the thing has gone. The same with a syphilitic brain disease. When the arteries are corroded and softening has taken place it is impossible for that brain substance to be put back again.

35,773. There is another subject the Commission would like to have your authority upon. We have been much troubled about these cases of recurrent insanity, especially in a phase of eugenics which interests you. Take the case of a woman who has recurrent attacks, who is in an asylum, who goes home, cohabits with her husband, has another child and goes into the asylum again. Mr. Brierley has put the matter to you, but you would only allow recurrent insanity to be a ground of divorce if it be of such a character that it involves continuous confinement?—Yes.

35,774. Or should involve continuous confinement?—Yes, but I think that the patient would not be discharged from the asylum, and probably ought not to be because she is a danger to herself or to others, as proved by the fact that she has attempted suicide before, or attempted homicide.

35,775. From another point of view, would you be disposed to include forms of recurrent insanity and notify the number of attacks; say that they have had ten attacks, or would you rather not do that?—The question is very difficult. One recognises there is the question, what is to become of this woman if she is discharged? If it were sure she would not be discharged and the authorities would look after her it would be different, and I do not think she ought to be discharged till past the child-bearing period. Many people hold that view because this form of insanity is liable to be transmitted, especially with the pauper population, then it comes on the ratepayers to keep the children afterwards.

35,776. The tendency of science and the practical aspect of scientific work is in this direction, that these people will probably be retained in the asylums?—It ought to be so.

35,777. You think it is tending in that direction from an economic point of view?—I am sorry to say it is not, because in my paper there were twelve-point-something per cent. of discharges and re-admissions in a year, and it is these cases that are discharged and re-admitted. I think it is an unwise policy for the future.

35,778. If you were asked to draw up a clause in an Act defining the cases of insanity that should be a ground of divorce, speaking of recurrent insanity, you would say "only those that are so bad as to require constant confinement"?—Yes.

(Chairman.) Who ought to have it if they have not?

35,779. (Sir Frederick Treves.) Should be confined, he said. With regard to drunkenness, you are not speaking of alcoholic dementia?—No; cases are not very numerous. I was surprised when I began my work at the asylum. I was convinced that alcohol was a very important cause of insanity, not a coefficient, but it proves to a be marked coefficient, but not of itself so important a cause. There is one form of insanity in which it is the main cause, that is poly-neuritic psychosis, that is to say, patients have an affliction of the nerves with mental symptoms, but those cases are not common. They will recover completely. It is a toxic effect, it is not destructive. After two years they will recover. There are a number which end in permanent dementia. One cannot find in the brain the same changes that you can in general paralysis: It is a toxic effect rather than a destructive effect.

35,780. There is possibility of recovery?—Yes.

35,781. In alcoholic dementia you can test incurability after a number of years?—Yes. In those cases there would be destructive effects of the higher functions of the mind, and the cells too.

35,782. You have not attempted any definition of the words "habitual drunkard"?—No; it varies.

35,783. You see the difficulty?—I see great difficulty.

35,784. (Sir George White.) You say that you would allow nullity of the marriage if the facts were withheld at the time of the marriage?—Yes.

35,785. You do not go further, but it is of as much consequence to the race that the marriage should be nullified if the effects come out afterwards as if withheld at the time?—I do not go so far as that. I know this works very well in Germany. It is a question of contract and breach of contract.

35,786. (Chairman.) Are any of these recurrent cases incurable?—If we include under "recurrent cases" cases which have two or three attacks in a lifetime, one cannot say they are incurable. It is a question of degree.

35,787. Are some incurable?—I should say some are.

35,788. Would not the proposition, that insanity existing for three or five years, although not necessarily during the whole of the period, at the end of five years might be declared incurable, be capable of being brought into the general category of divorce?—For public policy it would be right, but for the individual I am not so sure, because the friends would say, "I want an independent opinion and be justified in so doing."

35,789. I am speaking of where it is ascertained, as far as it can be, that it is incurable, although it is not there absolutely every day?—Yes, five years I put that at.

35,790. Suppose a person whose condition was such that for five years he had been incarcerated and the medical world said that must go on for ever, there is a clear case for divorce?—I think so.

35,791. Suppose, on the other hand, there had been intervals during those first five years in which the person was better and allowed out and went in again and was allowed out, but at the end of five years the medical world said that state of things will go on, it is incurable, would not that equally well come under the category for divorce?—Yes.

35,792. Assuming those facts?—For public policy, certainly.

35,793. The difficulty is not one of definition, but of proof?—Yes.

35,794. Where at the end of five years that case is incurable. It comes to proof?—Yes.

35,795. In Germany are the cases of divorce confined to those continually incarcerated?—It does not necessarily mean that they have been for all those three years mentally dead, that is to say, incapable of mental companionship, but at the end of three years they are.

(Chairman.) That embraces the case I was last putting to you. I have to thank you very much for your evidence, which has been most valuable.

MR. JAMES ERNEST LANE called and examined.

35,796. (Chairman.) You are a Fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons?—Yes.

35,797. You are also a member of the Eugenics Education Society?—Yes. I am Senior Surgeon to St. Mary's Hospital, and to the London Lock Hospital, the only hospital in London for the treatment of the class of disease about which I am here to give evidence. I am a member of the Eugenics Education Society, and have read papers before them and also before the Birkenhead Congress on Public Health on this subject, and it was for this reason that I was appointed by the Eugenics Society to give evidence.

35,798. They sent your name as Senior Surgeon of the Lock Hospital and St. Mary's Hospital to give evidence on the subject of venereal disease. Is your evidence confined to that branch?—Yes, entirely.

35,799. In your memorandum you have dealt with other matters, and if you wish I will ask about them. May we take the venereal disease point first?—Yes.

35,800. In your memorandum you have referred to (a) Active Syphilis, a transmissible disease which is one of the most powerful factors in the production of racial degeneracy; (b) Gonorrhœa, which is responsible for a large number of cases of blindness in children, and is a fruitful source of sterility in women, and consequently indirectly responsible for race degeneration. Those are your views from your experience?—Yes.

35,801. Will you explain how those points bear upon the question of divorce?—The existence of venereal disease contracted after marriage or before marriage should be a ground for the dissolution of such a marriage.

35,802. Do you mean if contracted before marriage and existing at the time of the marriage you would make that a ground of nullity?—It appears to me to be a ground of nullity.

35,803. If concealed?—If concealed, or even after the marriage takes place, in ignorance that the disease is transmissible.

35,804. Suppose it takes place afterwards?—If infection takes place?

35,805. If it takes place afterwards. There is no difficulty about the infection, because that is a ground for divorce at present. It is proof of adultery. I do not know that it bears on that point further, but I understood it bore upon the question of insanity?—I can say nothing about insanity except that syphilis is a powerful factor in the causation of insanity.

35,806. Would you agree with those witnesses who have said something should be done if possible to check the production of the unfit?—Certainly, to check the production of unfit children, who would undoubtedly bear some of the stigmata of the disease about them.

35,807. Would you advocate some precaution at the time of the marriage, like medical certificates?—I do not think that sufficient inquiries take place at marriage by the parents as to the fitness of the subjects for marriage. For instance, the previous existence of syphilis could be easily ascertained by means of a test which has recently been discovered, and a parent should, in my opinion, make very close inquiries on this subject to ascertain if his future son-in-law was in possession of perfect health and in a condition to marry.

35,808. Would you put any duty on the State in regard to that, of legislating to provide for certificates of fitness, as I understand has been done in America and some places?—I should think it would be a very difficult position to work. I have never contemplated that.

35,809. That really comes not to encouraging legislation so much as the public opinion which directs people's attention to it, in order to make sure for their children's sake?—Yes, the education of the public.

35,810. Is there any other point you think it worth while to bring to our attention?—The evil consequences of venereal disease I assume the Commission are perfectly well acquainted with and have been acquainted with, I mean having regard to the possibilities of transmission to children, and to the possibility of transmitting the disease to the third generation. There are, of course, other venereal diseases besides syphilis which I have alluded to in the paragraph headed "Gonorrhœa."

35,811. I have read that?—I assume that the evil effects of gonorrhœa that may follow marriage have been also explained.

35,812. They have?—The evil effect to the unaffected wife and possibly to the children in the form of ophthalmia.

35,813. Those points about disease were put forward by some medical people as grounds upon which there is not sufficient justification for differentiating between the case of men and women obtaining divorce on the ground of one act of adultery. That is what I understood?—I am not cognizant of the other evidence.

35,814. It is said that with these diseases a man who commits an act of adultery of what has been termed an accidental character, which means an occasional act, is very likely to acquire one of these diseases. That is so?—Yes.

35,815. It is said that means that his wife ought to have the option of saying, "I do not intend to live with you any longer," because the gravity of the offence is such that it might subject her to infection of the complaint. Have you formed any view about that?—I think the wife certainly ought to have that option.

35,816. That means to say, it would put her practically in the same position as a man with regard to one act against the woman?—Yes.

35,817. You agree with that line of evidence?—I think so.

35,818. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) Are you of opinion that the marriage should be annulled or the divorce given although the party suffering from the complaint has not been the offender? A man may inherit syphilis, I understand, and having inherited syphilis, he might marry and impart it to the woman?—I do not think he would impart syphilis to the woman.

35,819. Not in hereditary syphilis?—In all probability by the time he was of a marriageable age he would have been cured of power of transmission. I do not say it does not exist, that it does not show itself in the third generation of children, but it does not show itself in the case of the wife.

35,820. In the first generation a man who had contracted the disease and inherited it from the father, you think, could not impart it to the woman?—He could not impart it to the woman, although it is possible the children born of such marriage might show remote effects of disease.

35,821. You think that should be a reason for saying it should annul a marriage, where the disease was hereditary?—I do not think I should go as far as that.

35,822. I suppose people can contract venereal disease by inoculation?—Yes. A large number of cases occur of what is known as syphilis of the innocent.

35,823. In those cases the person who contracts by inoculation would be perfectly innocent?—Yes.

35,824. In those cases would you annul the marriage?—I think that would be a very great hardship, and I can hardly imagine any wife would urge such a step.

35,825. The mischief to the wife is the same?—Yes, not from the default of the husband, but from misfortune.

35,826. (Sir George White.) In view of the interests of the children that are to come, should you dissolve the marriage if the man or the woman is innocent?—That is a question that has not occurred to me. It seems to me it would be a hardship to an innocent person to render them liable to divorce for something that is not their own fault.

35,827. (Lady Frances Balfour.) One of the witnesses to-day said that with one act of accidental infidelity, as it has been called, the infection would not likely have been got from syphilis. Is that so?—I cannot follow that. If a man in this so-called accidental infidelity comes across an infected person, he is almost certain himself to be infected.

35,828. (Chairman.) Which is the more prevalent of the diseases you specifically mentioned?—Gonorrhœa.

35,829. Is that largely prevalent at the present day?—Very largely.

35,830. Is it? I am only asking because I have had so much about it before—I want it on the notes. Is that a matter there is a great risk of in consequence of the prostitution which exists in England?—Yes, enormous risks.

35,831. Therefore, if you get what have been termed these accidental cases, any woman might say, "I do not know where I am about this: if you have done that I am liable to infection." That is a serious risk?—I do not follow the question.

35,832. If it is prevalent and easily infectious, it means that any woman who is married, if her husband has committed an accidental act, might be justified in saying, "This is a serious matter, and I cannot associate with you any longer"?—I think she would be justified if she had the knowledge her husband was infected with this disease.

35,833. The prevalence is such you might anticipate it would be there in any case of that character—it might be?—It might be there. I do not see that a wife could refuse her husband access, because she would not know he had some venereal disease.

35,834. Is that equally true of syphilis?—Yes.

35,835. It is very prevalent?—Yes. The prevalence of syphilis is not so great as it was, and the gravity of the disease is not so bad.

35,836. It is more amenable to treatment?—It is more amenable to treatment, and the treatment has made enormous advances of recent years. It is not so serious a matter as it was, but still it is a serious matter.

35,837. Has your experience extended among the working classes?—Greatly.

35,838. Working factory towns, and so on?—I was House Surgeon at the Female Lock Hospital when the Contagious Diseases Acts were in force, and there the infected women from Woolwich and Greenwich and one or two other stations were sent up for detention under the Act, so that I saw a large amount of disease amongst the poorer classes in years gone by, and from the year 1878 onwards I have been associated with that hospital.

35,839. Is it found that the risk and prevalence are greater in the lower classes than above?—I should say so, certainly. I meet with a very large number of cases there of married women infected by their husbands, a very large proportion.

35,840. Of cases that come into the hospital?—Yes.

35,841. Have you any idea what proportion?—I can give you the proportion in three years, my experience in three years from the commencement of 1906. Of 1,270 admitted into the Female Lock Hospital, 225 were married women suffering from some form of venereal disease, mostly syphilis—225 out of 1,270.

35,842. Were those respectable women?—Many of them quite respectable, and the husbands had contracted the disease as a rule during the latter months of their wives' pregnancy. When the child was born they resumed cohabitation, and their wives were infected.

35,843. Would you draw the inference from that that separations are a bad thing between husband and wife?—These are these compulsory separations.

35,844. If they lead to trouble, the more permanent separations would be worse?—Yes, I think so.

35,845. Do you wish to deal with any other points mentioned in the Eugenics Society's memorandum, recurrent and incurable insanity?—I have nothing to do with insanity.

35,846. Habitual criminality or inebriety?—No.

35,847. Is there any other point you think you ought to draw attention to?—I think not.

(Chairman.) We thank you very much indeed for your evidence.

DR. JAMES CHAMBERS called and examined.

35,848. (Chairman.) You are an M.D. and Medical Superintendent of the Priory, Roehampton?—Yes.

35,849. You are the joint editor of the "Journal of Mental Science," and you were formerly Assistant Medical Superintendent of the Royal Asylum, Montrose, and Senior Assistant Medical Officer of the Cumberland and Westmoreland Counties Asylum?—Yes.

35,850. Was your name sent forward by the Eugenics Education Society?—No.

35,851. Do you remember how you came to give evidence?—The Secretary invited me.

(Chairman.) I think your name was suggested by Sir Frederick Treves.

35,852. (Sir Frederick Treves.) Yes, as the superintendent of an asylum for the rich as distinguished from those we have had who are superintendents of asylums for the poor. That is so, is it not?—Yes.

35,853. (Chairman.) The Secretary communicated with you, and you are now present?—Yes.

35,854. You have written a short paper, which I have before me. Does that contain all you wish to say? Perhaps you will add anything that occurs to you. The first paragraph of your proof deals with the term insanity?—The term insanity is applied to a group of diseases which exhibit wide variations in their gravity and duration. There is no agreement as to what constitutes insanity, the result being that this question has from time to time to be referred to a jury.

35,855. Do you anticipate any practical difference in determining the question, when the proper evidence is given?—I think that the suggestion to appoint three medical experts to decide the question of incurability is a good one. It is one of the best suggestions that could be made. I did not think that was possible when I wrote this paragraph.

35,856. We have to deal with the question of insanity in will cases constantly?—Yes.

35,857. The evidence of the expert is given and the judge is guided by it?—Yes. I gather it is proposed that the three medical experts should act as a court of arbitration and settle it by themselves.

35,858. I do not know that it has been put in that form. At any rate evidence can be given which ought to produce fairly definite results. Is that so?—Of course, it will be a very difficult question to answer as to what cases should come under insanity as being a plea for divorce.

35,859. That is another matter. Assuming the cases are stated, it becomes a question of evidence in order to determine whether the particular case falls within the rule?—Yes.

35,860. You say that the question of incurability is in many cases exceedingly difficult to answer—a very prolonged attack may be followed by recovery?—Yes.

35,861. Do you find that there are cases in which you can say—I think the expression I am going to use comes from Sir James Crichton-Browne—that it can be safely predicted it is incurable?—Yes.

35,862. And that in other cases it is doubtful?—Yes.

35,863. And that in other cases it is reasonably certain?—Yes.

35,864. "The causation of insanity is often obscure, as well as being complex—if insanity were made a ground of divorce the causation should be enquired into." Will you kindly explain that paragraph a little more fully?—Yes, I regard that as extremely important. The causation of insanity is very complex. I assume if it was supposed that the petitioner had anything to do with the causation of the attack, this would prejudice his chances of gaining the suit. My point is that the petitioner may have had a great deal to do with the causation of the insanity and yet this factor may be incapable of legal proof.

35,865. You suggest if it was shown it was partly due to the petitioner's fault that there would be grounds for saying there should not be a divorce?—Assuming one took it as a plea at all. That is a point that ought to be carefully considered. Great injustice might be done because medical men know how complex causation is, and how sensitive minds may be upset by inattention, carelessness, and by the partner staying at the club too much.

35,866. I appreciate the difficulty fully. What is your view as to the effect of the knowledge that insanity was a ground for divorce?—It would have a deleterious effect on some members of the sane community. I know how unconvincing it is to press illustrations, but there is one that occurs to me. Take the case of a couple getting married—I am speaking rather of educated people with nervous organisations—and pregnancy occurs. If the young wife, at what is a physiological crisis for her, feels that she has all the attention and care she should have she will pass through it quite safely; but if the husband, perhaps thoughtlessly, is inattentive, she not being judicial in her attitude towards things may wake up one morning and think, "he wants to get rid of me; if I break down in my confinement I may be divorced." This is a grave matter. Then if you come to the other end of life, when a wife is not so attractive and may not be getting the same attention she had when she was younger, at the climacteric—I am not speaking of people with insane heredity, but people who are neurotic—again, if the husband is not careful—he may have too many interests outside his home, some may be wrong and some may not be wrong—she may think that he does not care for her, and it would be a great strain if she knew that insanity was a ground for divorce.

35,867. Those are illustrations which you have been giving?—Yes.

35,868. Further on you say:—"Some of those who support the plea of insanity as a ground of divorce state that divorce would aid in preventing the birth of children with hereditary taint, would lessen the burden on the rates, and would safeguard morality"?—Before I pass on, I would like to state that I think it would add very gravely to the distress of mind of people who are already under care. I have considered patients under my care, and I have talked over with my colleagues the effect it would have upon them. Take the case of a melancholiac, a patient who, whilst he is ill, believes he is incurable. He is probably one of the most delightful natures in the world when he is well, and the world would be poorer without him. It is an essential factor in his treatment to prove to him that he is curable. Sometimes visits from friends are prejudicial, and it is the physician's duty to forbid the wife to see the husband, as the interview would be an opportunity for pouring out his woes and indicating that he is incurable. We often keep the wife from seeing her partner on medical grounds, but we are not always able to assure the patient that it is on medical grounds; our difficulties would be gravely increased if insanity were made a ground of divorce.

35,869. Would you class those under the heading of incurable?—Those who will be prejudiced if insanity is a plea for divorce.

35,870. The proposal is that it may be made a ground of divorce in the incurable cases?—I understand that, and I think that certain incurable cases would not be prejudiced. There are patients who are demented, live in a world of their own, and who would not trouble about it in the least, but I think if it were known publicly that insanity was a ground of divorce it would be detrimental to the other patients in the institution.

35,871. You think it might affect the possibility of their cure?—I believe it would.

35,872. Then you wind up that paragraph with this:—"In my opinion the remedy lies, not in divorce, but in preventing the marriage of the unfit." Have you any practical suggestion to make with regard to that?—Yes, one should begin as the Royal Commission on the Feeble-Minded recommended, by having schools inspected so as to observe the children when young, have the defective children registered, watch them through their career, and try and educate a body of public opinion to have legislation to segregate the defectives. I think that is striking at the root of a bad marriage. It is more logical to prevent the unfit becoming married.

35,873. Would you in no cases permit of divorce for incurable insanity? Would you permit it in the case mentioned by Dr. Clouston of secondary dementia?—I feel so strongly as to the prejudicial influence this procedure would have on the people in the sane community, and also on those in the insane community, that I would not make insanity a ground of divorce.

35,874. Have you studied the German practice which was referred to by the last witness?—I have heard of it.

35,875. That is the law in Germany and it has been for 10 years?—Yes.

35,876. He tells us on the whole that it has worked well?—I am not a German, nor are the people of England, and to my mind that is a complete answer. I do not think you would like the German policeman in the streets of London, and the suggested procedure would be more applicable to our social system.

35,877. Do you know one way or the other how it has worked?—Only from hearsay.

35,878. Is your hearsay to the same effect?—It is, only indirectly. If I had known in time that you were going to ask me about this I would have investigated the matter. I much regret I did not.

35,879. You are adverse to instituting that as a ground?—Yes, for the reasons I have given.

35,880. Have you considered the case of the person left outside?—Yes.

35,881. And the possible tendency to immorality?—Yes.

35,882. You still think so, notwithstanding that?—Yes, I do.

35,883. Have you any views against divorce altogether?—No.

35,884. Your last paragraph is a statement of some admissions. Will you read that?—I have substituted for that a communication which I handed to the Secretary this morning.

35,885. Will you state the effect of it?—Yes. Speaking of the education of public opinion as a preventive of insanity and of the marriage of the unfit, I say that this has operated already in the educated classes. Since 1879 the increase in the pauper insane has been extremely marked. It has gone up from 20 per 10,000 to 32·87. The private insane are fewer in proportion to-day than they were in 1879, and I think that they would be fewer still, only since 1889 it has been possible for patients, who are so-called pauper patients, to be transferred from the pauper to the private class, if their friends can help them by paying the full rate of maintenance. I had a communication from the medical superintendent of a London asylum stating that there are at present in London alone between 400 and 500 patients who have been so transferred. Originally these were classed as paupers, and notwithstanding their addition the ratio of private patients to population is lower than it was in 1879.

35,886. I will read the passage which you refer to in your memorandum:—"The proportion of private patients to the population reached its highest point in 1879, i.e., 2·97 per 10,000. It fell steadily for 20 years to 2·73 per 10,000. It rose again since 1899 and is now 2·93 per 10,000. The rise is accounted for, I think, by the transference of pauper patients to the private class when they have sufficient means to pay the ordinary rates. I think one is justified in stating there has been no true rise. The pauper rate has risen enormously in this period from 20 per 10,000 to 32·87 per 10,000. If the private class had risen in the same proportion it would be 4·85 per 10,000." That is the passage you have been referring to?—Yes, my point is that that is due to the education of public opinion amongst the educated class. I think that is the line on which we ought to advance in connection with the lower classes. I made an analysis of the last 500 consecutive discharges and deaths of persons in the institution under my care, more to have it to refer to if any questions arose, but I will not trouble you with the figures.

35,887. The conclusions are what we want?—There were 96 married female patients who were discharged or who died during that period, and of these 11 suffered from puerperal insanity. They were admitted on account of that. This may seem a small proportion. The point is this, so far as I know not one of these 11 patients has had any children since they were discharged. I am certain of that in eight cases; in the other three I am not quite certain, but I believe I am accurate. Of the men discharged during that time so far as I know there have been no children born to them. My point is this, that the advice I gave was taken, that it was undesirable for there to be any more children.

35,888. Are those paupers?—The upper and the upper middle classes.

35,889. People who can pay a proper amount for being treated?—Yes. There was a very small number of the patients who died under care on the female side. That shows that the friends are very glad to have their old people at home if they can, so as to nurse them, and in many cases, although they may be incurable, their symptoms become very mild, those of mild dementia, and the children like to show an affection and filial duty to their parents, and have them at home when possible. There were only 18 deaths out of 274 female patients that were under care during that time. Only 18 died in the institution. I think it is a plea for keeping up the family life, and it also shows that friends take a great interest in the patients. If these ladies had been divorced, and stepmothers had assumed the care of their children, the result would have been very different. That would appeal to me.

35,890. Is there anything more you would like to add?—I think not.

35,891. That has exhausted all you have to say at present?—Yes.

35,892. (Sir George White.) The increase in the pauper patients, which you have given us, is very marked. Is it to be accounted for by more complete registration?—Yes. More complete registration told markedly at one stage, but it has not told so markedly in recent years.

35,893. This is a percentage of the admission per annum?—No, of the total insane.

35,894. Are there any reasons to account for the total number in asylums now being larger than 20 years ago, for instance, that they are better attended to and treated. On the one hand you may say they are not more likely to be cured, but in the incurable cases possibly their life is prolonged by the more humane treatment, and that would account for a permanent population larger than years ago?—That holds good in both classes of society.

35,895. That is quite true, but I am trying to get at whether the difference between 20 and 32 per cent. is an indication of the increase?—I quite understand. I am speaking of relative increase, of the two classes of the community. The point about the more complete registration accounts for a considerable rise. The condition of the poor is more favourable than it used to be. There are more hygienic measures up to a point. My explanation is that the upper classes take charge of their feeble-minded and guard them in a way that is not done by the lower classes, and that this neglect by the lower classes is one of the great factors in the continued production of insanity.

35,896. I am not taking the relative proportions of the rise or fall, but the actual rise in the pauper lunatics, from 20 to 32 per cent. Are we to understand that there are no other causes to account for the increased number of inhabitants in these asylums than the fact of the increased number of cases that come to them. Do you follow me?—I feel that the more complete registration is one factor, and that the prolongation of their lives and consequent accumulation is another. An additional fruitful cause is our neglect of the defectives, who should be segregated.

35,897. (Sir Frederick Treves.) The asylum of which you are the medical superintendent, is a large asylum and a very famous asylum devoted to the well-to-do?—Yes.

35,898. One might say the rich?—Yes.

35,899. Your experience, although not limited to the rich, is largely based upon your experience of that particular class?—Yes.

35,900. You say that the question of incurability in many is exceedingly difficult. I know that you were present when Dr. Clouston gave his figures, and you will remember if you put a limit of five years it brings down the number of persons who recover to something like 2 or 3 per cent., even if you do not allow for the fact that out of those who are sent out as recovered some relapse?—Yes.

35,901. So that the number is exceedingly small?—Yes.

35,902. Should I be going too far if I said that the term "exceedingly difficult" is putting it strongly?—I did not know when I wrote that paragraph what limit they were going to give as a definition of incurability.

35,903. If you take the German limit of three years, which has been attended with success, would you still use the term "exceedingly difficult"?—Yes, in many cases.

35,904. Remembering that when you reach the period of five years the number of those who recover has dwindled down to a very small sum?—Yes.

35,905. You have in mind one or two specific cases where the difficulty would be great?—Yes, but not so great at five years as at three years.

35,906. At five years you must have very little difficulty, because we are told that the numbers who recover at that period are very few?—Yes, it is more the isolated individual cases that are difficult.

35,907. You spoke about insanity being due to the fault of the sane person?—Yes.

35,908. Apart from general paralysis is there any form of insanity you could deliberately put down to the conduct of the sane person?—I think one may have an attack of melancholia resulting from the conduct of the sane person.

35,909. Would you put the worry produced by the sane person in a different category to the ordinary worry of life?—Yes.

35,910. Do you think it is possible in a person of normal brain to produce melancholia by any surroundings?—Not when that person is in his or her normal state, but I particularly pointed out the condition that you have in a young wife who is pregnant and passing through a physiological crisis, who otherwise would be normal. She is not normal then; it is a physiological condition, not a pathological one.

35,911. You would not say it is possible for a person to induce puerperal insanity by worry and ill-treatment?—I think it would.

35,912. I take it there are forms of puerperal insanity that may probably be said to be septic?—Quite.

35,913. You must exclude those?—Except so far as this, we know that the individual is better able to resist the sepsis if in a favourable condition.

35,914. That is pushing it to a degree?—It depends on the amount of toxin and the degree of lowered resistance.

35,915. Do you think, given a woman who has a sound mind, a normal woman, that it would be possible to produce in her melancholia of such a degree that she would have to be sent to an asylum, by any degree of worry?—When she is in an abnormal condition as to health.

35,916. You must assume that?—It must be an abnormal condition as to health. That is not done in a day or a week, it is the prolonged stress. I think a woman starting on the 1st January, 1910, in an absolutely normal condition might by the middle of 1911 be in a melancholic state as the result of her husband's conduct, but I do not think this would be capable of legal proof, and a grave injustice might result.

35,917. Supposing you find in the family history of such a lady insanity, or other nervous troubles, you would have to modify the assertion that the husband was the cause of the melancholia?—From the legal point of view it would have to be modified.

35,918. Do you think it possible in a Court of Law to prove that any form of insanity, other than general paralysis, is directly due to the action of a person?—It would be a difficult thing, although I would have a strong conviction that the condition was so caused. That is my point of view.

35,919. You would have to start with the assumption that the person affected was not normal?—Not necessarily. Stress is one of the greatest factors in the production of insanity—I mean prolonged stress. A woman loses, perhaps, two, three or four nights of sleep in each week, and a strong constitution may break down under that.

35,920. The main reason for your objecting to insanity becoming a ground for divorce, is the effect it would have upon insane patients generally?—No, it is not the main reason. There are further reasons given in one of my paragraphs: "the prejudicial effect on the mental health of certain members of the community, and the tending to prevent the expression of those high feelings of self-sacrifice which ought to be a definite factor in the relations between husband and wife."

35,921. From the way you put it I rather gathered that would be one of the strongest reasons?—It is a very strong reason.

35,922. Dr. Clouston gives us to understand the persons in his mind were people who were practically mindless and dead, and uninfluenced by any divorce law?—Yes.

35,923. Also that the persons who would be badly affected would be those who were the subject of delusional insanity?—He was speaking of the incurably insane at the time.

35,924. He said those subject to delusional insanity would be those most distinctly affected?—You are speaking of the incurable class now.

35,925. I do not know that he used the term incurable?—Deemed incurable.

35,926. Those persons who would be upset distinctly and really made worse by the knowledge that insanity was a ground of divorce, but I do not think in that connection he spoke of them as being incurable. It is the last paragraph but one on the third page of his proof. He is speaking of certain forms of insanity, characterised by fixed delusions and so on. "Those are persons who would most deeply resent divorce proceedings, and their disease might be aggravated by the fact that divorce proceedings were taken in their cases"?—My point is this. I am not thinking of the persons on whom a citation would be served. I agree with Dr. Clouston as to the people on whom you might serve a citation. A person suffering from delusional insanity would be the one most affected. It would be cruelty to proceed against him, but I am speaking of the general population of the institution, and the people who are worth saving, if you like to put it in that way.

35,927. You are thinking of those who would not be affected by any alteration in the law of divorce?—Yes, but who would fear that it would become applicable to them.

35,928. That is an important point, because you mentioned as an illustration of those who would be damaged by the knowledge that divorce was possible, puerperal insanity and climacteric insanity. If you take the definition which has been suggested so many times of incurable insanity of three years' duration it would not include cases of puerperal mania?—No.

35,929. And not many cases of climacteric insanity—It might include more. A considerable proportion become chronic.

35,930. If they had been chronic. If she had been insane five years do you think she would become curable?—It is not likely.

35,931. She would become an incurable case?—Yes.

35,932. Putting aside these incurable cases, the two cases mentioned are cases that are not likely to come into this category?—Unfortunately the person most interested who has to judge is not judicially minded. That is my point. A woman who becomes puerperally insane is not able to judge. She is capable of misjudging her husband's conduct because this is a plea.

35,933. It supports the fact that the insane person in whose interest you are speaking, is not the person who would be immediately affected by this alteration in the law of divorce?—Yes.

35,934. You say in the case of 24 patients out of a total of 263 married people that the question of divorce might have been considered?—I amended that, because there was a confusion between admissions and cases. That is very much on the same lines as the paragraph I have substituted.

(Sir Frederick Treves.) Might we have that read?

(Chairman.) Those who would regard insanity as a ground of divorce might have considered the question in the following cases: in 12 males and four females out 226 cases, and possibly in seven male and three female cases.

35,935. (Sir Frederick Treves.) The number is reduced?—Yes, there are fewer cases being dealt with. The first proof was 263.

35,936. Of those, 263 are married?—No, only 226 are dealt with now.

35,937. Taking the cases, not from the asylum point of view, have you met with any cases where there has been great hardship on the sane person?—Yes.

35,938. Let us imagine a case of this sort, a young man occupying a position of importance marries a lady, and she becomes insane within a short time of her marriage, and remains incurably insane. It must take a great deal to out-weigh the disaster in that case?—Yes.

35,939. He is unable to marry, and there are questions of property, and it may be of a title and so on. You must acknowledge that that would be distressing?—A very great hardship.

35,940. Do not you think that hardship, if repeated in a number of cases, is such as rather to balance the possibility of upsetting a certain number of insane persons in an asylum?—No.

35,941. Your professional instinct would properly make you cling to the side of the patient?—I have tried to be judicial, but I do not know that I am constituted to be.

35,942. It is pleasant to see you adhere to the professional tenet that the first person to be considered is the patient. All that being allowed for, from your experience amongst wealthy people you have met with cases?—Yes, of very great hardship.

35,943. (Mr. Burt.) With regard to the increase in the number of insane since 1897—— ?—It was 1879.

35,944. Have you any opinion as to the cause or causes of the increase?—I think it is very largely due to the marriage of the unfit. They increase, unfortunately.

35,945. Following that up, would you agree with a previous witness in trying to check the marriage of the unfit?—The only scheme in my mind at the moment is to follow on the lines that the Royal Commission on the Feeble-Minded pointed out, namely, to start with the children in the schools and register them, to keep in touch with them by medical officers, and particularly a Visitor to visit them (it is one of the recommendations stipulated that they should give advice as to marriage), and to create public opinion. It will take time, but such reforms take time, and these are all the better when they come as contrasted with those attempted in a patchy and spasmodic way.

35,946. You would not suggest legislative measures at the present time in that direction?—I would suggest that some of the recommendations of the Royal Commission should be hurried on. They seem to have been hung up and nothing is being done.

35,947. As to patients in private homes or asylums, is there a complete record of the numbers in those asylums?—All who are under certificates—there is a complete record in all the institutions.

35,948. So that you have all the figures?—Yes.

35,949. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) You were asked with regard to the difficulty of settling the question of incurability. As the result of your examination do you retain the opinion that at the end of three years it is difficult to decide whether a case is curable or not?—A proportion of cases would be difficult then.

35,950. That has very much decreased at the end of five years?—Very much.

35,951. With regard to the evil results to the patients themselves, you put a case. I do not think you finished it. You put a case of a man suffering from melancholia, which is a curable disease, but that he is under the impression it is incurable?—Yes.

35,952. Your view is that if he knew a person suffering from incurable insanity could be divorced, it would have a prejudicial effect on him, not because he is incurable, but because he thinks he is?—Yes, his outlook would be depressed, and he would probably lose his sleep and impair his nutrition.

35,953. He would think he would come within the law?—Yes.

35,954. The effect would prejudice his recovery?—Yes.

35,955. Do you think it might prevent it?—Yes, in some cases.

35,956. So that he might develop into an incurable lunatic?—He might.

35,957. You have given some remarkable statistics as to the proportion of better class insane and the pauper insane?—Yes.

35,958. One is increasing very much and the other is fairly stable?—The proportion of the better class insane was diminishing until 1899, when provision was made for patients of the pauper class to be transferred to the better class, when they have sufficient means to pay the ordinary rates. This was a desirable provision, because it helped the self-esteem of the artisan and helped to reduce the burden on the rates, and was some comfort to certain patients. A great many more paid than previously. Of course, that increased the numbers.

35,959. Allowing for that it remains the fact that the better class percentage as against population is not increasing?—Yes.

35,960. But the percentage with regard to the pauper class is increasing?—Yes.

35,961. Do you put that down to better habits, more self-control and better public opinion?—Yes.

35,962. Among the educated?—Yes.

35,963. Your view is that the remedy as far as the race is concerned has not altered conditions of divorce but altered conditions of marriage?—Yes; may I say further, the prevention of illegitimacy by segregating the mentally defective, because it does not simply refer to marriage.

35,964. Improvement would come from wiser and healthier public opinion?—I feel it would come from a healthier public opinion.

35,965. Do you look to that healthier public opinion rather than to legislation in these matters?—I think restrictive legislation would follow on a growth of a healthier public opinion, but I think we must have the healthier public opinion first.

35,966. You think that any legislation in the way of restricting the ages of marriage, or certain classes from marrying, must follow on a healthier public opinion?—My feeling is that it should be tried. I might be converted to stringent measures if it were not a success.

35,967. How do you mean?—I would try and get a a healthier public opinion first. I would not have spasmodic attempts to deal with it, but if the healthier public opinion did not arrive, one might be converted to stronger measures with regard to marriage.

35,968. You think it should be attacked there rather than have a dissolution of the marriage?—I feel that very strongly.

35,969. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) Does your experience of the poorer classes enable you to say that the same injurious influence, from the knowledge that insanity formed a ground of divorce, would apply to the poorer classes, in the same way as the class you deal with?—I think it would apply. When I was senior assistant medical officer in a county asylum I was very much struck by the longing the patients had for their homes and the affection those outside had for the inmates. It would not apply so strongly as it would to the individual with a highly-organised brain.

35,970. (Chairman.) Having regard to your views about unfit marriages, would you suggest that it should be a ground for annulling a marriage if unfitness of an insane character were kept back from the other party?—Not just yet.

35,971. What do you mean?—I think one should have further education in the matter.

35,972. Do you mean that in theory you think it right, but that in practice opinion is not sufficiently formed?—I think so.

(Chairman.) Thank you very much for your interesting evidence. It is very valuable to us.

Sir GEORGE HENRY SAVAGE called and examined.

35,973. (Chairman.) Will you kindly state your qualifications? We all know you, but everybody who reads the evidence afterwards may not?—I am a Doctor of Medicine and a Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians. I have been for over 40 years connected with the treatment of the insane: 17 years Superintending Medical Officer of Bethlem Royal Hospital, 30 years lecturer on mental diseases, Consulting Physician to Guy's Hospital on mental diseases, Physician to Earlswood Asylum, Consulting Physician to the Priory, Roehamption, Chiswick House, Brislington, Bristol.

35,974. You have had an enormous experience on the question of the insane?—I have.

35,975. You have been good enough to address a form of questions to Medical Officers of Asylums, and have had 82 replies?—I have.

35,976. This is the letter you wrote: "Dear Sir, As it is probable that evidence will be taken by the Commission on Divorce, and as I have been approached on the matter, I should like to go prepared with the expressed feelings of the members of our speciality, therefore I take the liberty of asking if you would be so good as to reply to the accompanying questions and return the answers at an early date.

1. Is insanity a justifiable ground of divorce?
2. If so, what forms of insanity?
3. If incurable insanity, what is your test of incurability? Duration of the malady or its form, or both?
4. Do you base your opinion upon the immediate justice to the individual, the ultimate benefit to society, or both?
5. Should a person divorced on the ground of insanity be allowed to re-marry?

I am, &c.,
GEO. H. SAVAGE."

A. That is so.

35,977. You have had 82 replies to those inquiries?—I have.

35,978. Do you know how many medical officers of asylums you sent to?—I am afraid I cannot give you the number. It was nearly 100. I believe it was 96.

35,979. Does the 82 include the great majority of the asylums in the country?—Yes.

35,980. Of the 82, your paper says 51 are in favour of divorce under certain conditions, 29 are against it, and two are indifferent?—Yes.

35,981. Of the objections, some are on religious grounds, from Roman Catholics and strict Churchmen, and some dissenters?—That is so.

35,982. Can you give us a little more fully the effect of the answers to the five questions you put, because you summarise it in favour or against, but we have not any details of the answers?—I can give those who object to divorce. First of all, those who were in favour always made conditions: one universal condition was that the insanity should be considered incurable. The next question was the test of incurability. A great proportion took time as one of the elements, but the time differed very materially. Taking an average, about five years was looked upon as the term that should be the minimum limit of insanity, and it was always to be understood that that insanity was to have been certified insanity, that the individual should have been certified as insane for at least five years. Two or three considered that the mere fact that a person was certified as insane should be enough. There are only one or two like that. Four or five perhaps considered that the limit should be 10 years. They all agreed as to the forms of insanity that should be generally considered as incurable; universally epileptic insanity was so considered. If incurability from the form of incurable insanity was to be considered as a grounnd of divorce at all, epileptic insanity should be considered first. Next, the so-called dementia, whether secondary dementia, of age or youth, should be considered as a sufficient ground. There is more difference about the so-called recurring insanity, because they recognise that sometimes there are such long periods of convalescence between the attacks. The general idea was that delusional insanity, the so-called paranoia, should be considered as one of the incurable forms, and for two or three reasons given by many of the men that in nearly all cases it was due to bad heredity, and therefore you had the form of insanity which was in itself incurable and which indicated always insane stock. One-third of those who were in favour of it under conditions, thought dipsomania might be considered. Conditions of immoral insanity were referred to by several, more particularly sexual offences, epilepsy, recurring insanity, delusional insanity, dementia, whether so-called adolescent dementia præcox, or secondary dementia, dipsomania, and immoral insanity. Of those who were against it, the two chief grounds were first the religious ground, or those from Roman Catholic asylums, and Ireland, who at once said their answer must be, On no condition could divorce be decreed or allowed. The other ground was the uncertainty of incurability, giving instances. A patient had recovered after 10, 12, 15 or 20 years. The third objection was that anything interfering with the marriage contract was in their opinion injurious to society. Most of them, in relation to the question as to their opinion upon the immediate justice to the individual, the ultimate benefit of society, or both, looked upon it that it was the individual hardship that they considered, and hardly any considered that there was sufficient ground except upon the individual hardship, and those cases were not sufficiently large to make it imperative. Many referred to cases of extreme individual hardship. It is scarcely necessary for me to bring those individually before you. There were many other questions considered by them and referred to. There was a very strong feeling that if such a question as that of divorce in consequence of insanity was to be considered, it must not be a purely medical question, that it must be subject to something like the ordinary inquiry. That was brought out very strongly in many replies. They did not think medical men should be expected to give anything like an authoritative view.

35,983. It would result in a trial with evidence?—Yes.

35,984. Will you summarise your own views yourself?—I think there is no ground for immediate action or anything of that sort. I think there are a very large number of cases in which there is individual hardship, but I do not think they are sufficient to justify any very material alteration in the law. That is practically what my experience comes to.

35,985. Assuming it were fixed upon as a ground of divorce, would all the cases you have mentioned be properly covered by declaring the ground to be incurable insanity after five years of its existence?—It is such a very exceptional thing for one of these cases to recover after five years that if it were granted, I should again say the individual hardship was so small that it was almost negligible. Take it the other way. If it were decided that there should be a limit of five years with definite medical inquiry as to incurability, I think so few cases would arise.

35,986. Perhaps you do not know how many letters we have had about that?—No.

35,987. Assuming that we tried to frame a clause, it would not be necessary to specify the forms of the insanity: it would be sufficient to say generally "incurable after five years"?—That would be the legal form of inquiry. That would be the legal summing-up after the inquiry, or whatever is held, had had medical and other opinion. There are so many ordinary points where it is hardly necessary. There is one that in no case should the divorce be granted when the insanity of the individual had been caused by the fault of the other. For instance, in syphilis, alcohol, or anything of that sort, for the one producing disease in the other that ended in insanity, that should not be considered a ground for divorce. There is one other point I have personally felt very strongly, and which has been brought out in many of the replies. It certainly should be granted when certain concealments had taken place. I have had to give evidence in several cases in which there has been nullity of marriage declared when it has been shown there was insanity before the marriage

35,988. And had been concealed?—Yes, it seems to me if insanity has occurred in either party before marriage and that has been concealed from the other party, and then insanity develops, that should be a plea, certainly a ground.

35,989. A ground for annulment?—Yes

35,990. Fifty-one of your correspondents are in favour of divorce. Do they say on what ground?—Nearly all, the hardship of the individual, and a certain number say it tends to immoral relations, especially referring to the lower orders. Say a man has a wife and three or four children, and the wife becomes insane and is sent to an asylum. He is a working man, and if she does not recover, has to have someone to look after the children. According to several or a good many of these people, that tends, as one would think possible, to immorality, the man living with the woman looking after the children. That is one ground. The next is for the welfare of the children. If the mother is in the asylum, it is important that there should be a woman in the house to look after them. Those are nearly all social and incidental grounds. They refer to the hardship of the working man who may have two or three boys and no girls and no one to look after his house. The plea is nearly always of that kind.

35,991. That has been the class of point, not in connection with insanity, but other grounds put forward as largely affecting the working class, because of the necessity of the man to have someone to look after his house?—Yes.

35,992. That seems to be the ground?—That is the chief ground.

35,993. With regard to one other point which has been mentioned, the detrimental effect on patients in the asylum of the knowledge that there was a ground of divorce in insanity, what is your view?—I am rather doubtful. Besides the doctor who has just been giving evidence, I have independently three or four replies, one from the head of Virginia Water, saying he considered that it would be a distinct hindrance to recovery if a patient suffering from mental depression felt, if he or she did not recover, he or she could be disposed of, as it were. Personally, I think it is a possibility, but I should not have thought that it was a very serious one.

35,994. I think that is all I find in your proof?—Yes.

35,995. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) You think that there would be cases of hardship even if the limit of five years were adopted for incurable insanity?—There would be some cases, but they would be so few.

35,996. A small percentage?—A very small percentage.

35,997. But one which admits of statistical statement?—I do not think one in a thousand.

35,998. You would not be in favour of divorce in cases of insanity where the insanity has been caused by the fault of the other party?—No.

35,999. You heard Dr. Chambers' evidence?—No, I am afraid my deafness prevented me.

36,000. I want to put this case to you: a man without striking his wife or doing anything which could be taken hold of, makes her life a torture. I have no doubt you have come across such cases. We have heard a case where a man, in a good position in society, came home every night and sat at the table and never spoke to his wife for many weeks. Would that sort of relation have a prejudicial effect on the wife, so that it might produce an attack of melancholia or some form of mental disease?—Personally I have introduced that, not as my opinion so much but as the opinion of several. Personally I would say I did not consider that it would be a workable thing except in a very few cases.

36,001. What would not be workable?—If it were a disease like syphilis that was propagated from one to the other, it seems to me that there ought to be a possibility of having a separation when you get that, but I do not see where you draw the line. A parallel is where a man's life is rendered absolutely unworkable and intolerable by the jealousy of his wife.

36,002. That is the same point. You would not make that a bar to divorce?—I would make a bar.

36,003. How is it to be proved?—A bar to divorce.

36,004. I thought you said you would not make it a bar?—No.

36,005. Which do you mean?—It should bar divorce.

36,006. How do you prove it? It seems to me such a difficult thing to prove. It is a kind of intangible worry and persecution?—It would be a bar.

36,007. I am sorry, but we are at cross purposes?—No, divorce should be granted on such a ground.

36,008. We are not on the same point. Assume the effect of the worry has been to make one of the partners, say the wife, insane, ought the man to be able to get a divorce on the ground of the incurable insanity of his wife, although it has been caused by his own worrying ways?—I think not.

36,009. Then the difficulty recurs, how are you going to prove insanity is caused by this sort of impalpable persecution?—I do not think you could.

36,010. Then he would get his divorce?—No.

36,011. The ground of divorce is not the persecution but the insanity of the wife?—Yes.

36,012. Then the defence would be that this insanity has been caused by the action of the husband?—Yes.

36,013. Your view is that the defence ought to succeed?—Ought not to succeed.

36,014. Then you would allow the man to have his divorce although he has caused the insanity of his wife?—I do not say that.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) Which is wrong, my Lord?

(Chairman.) You had better leave it alone, I think we appreciate the point.

36,015. (Sir Frederick Treves.) I gather if you had to put a definite clause in an Act, from the opinions you have had from those you have consulted, it would come to this, insanity of five years' continuous duration?—Yes.

36,016. You would add that word to the sentence the Chairman suggested. It must be continuous?—Yes.

36,017. Supposing that were to be certified by three expert medical witnesses, including amongst the three, the medical man in charge of the patient, would you think that is likely to involve any error, or that it is likely to miscarry in any way?—No, I think it would probably be very powerful, but I think we doctors should prefer that the judgment should not be on them entirely.

36,018. If these precautions were adopted, you do not think there would be likely to be many cases of error?—No.

36,019. Considering the number of patients who recover after five years of insanity?—It would be very small, I think, it would be almost negligible.

36,020. I take it you would not schedule all forms of insanity?—No, certainly not.

36,021. You think incurable insanity of continuous duration for five years, properly certified, would cover all your cases?—Yes.

36,022. I take it your case of general paralysis of the insane would vanish under those circumstances?—Yes, and the senile cases, to which some of them refer.

36,023. Would you allow senile dementia to be included?—No, that is a question referred to by one or two.

36,024. You would exclude from that clause senile dementia?—Yes.

36,025. That is to say, dementia due to decay of the body, and therefore standing somewhat by itself?—Yes.

36,026. To once more answer the question Sir Lewis Dibdin started with, insanity caused by the petitioner, outside general paralysis of the insane, it is scarcely possible to prove?—That is my feeling.

36,027. There it would end?—Yes.

36,028. There may be such cases, but you think it would be practically impossible to prove them?—Yes.

36,029. Would you allow that a person of sound mind can be so worried by another person as to be made insane enough to be sent to an asylum, or would you assume that there must be some unsoundness of mind in the person so affected?—I think it would be difficult to establish worry as a sole cause of insanity. It would act seriously only in persons already predisposed by heredity or other organic causes.

36,030. To bring the case home, I will put this to you. To satisfy a court of law would it be practically impossible?—Yes.

36,031. There are two other forms of insanity which Dr. Clouston separated from the rest, delusional insanity and dipsomania, as distinct from alcoholic dementia, and he said he would give 10 years for those cases. Would you especially enumerate them or not?—I do not think I would make any difference. I should be doubtful about granting it to dypsomania.

36,032. You think that doubtful?—Yes.

36,033. You would make no exception of those cases?—No.

36,034. There has been a great deal said about recurring insanity?—Yes.

36,035. Say a wife is subject to these recurring attacks, and that she recovers and goes home and a child is born, and she finds her way back to the asylum again. Those persons would not come under your clause of five years' continuous insanity?—No.

36,036. Could you put that into a clause that would be practicable?—That is the difficulty I think I refer to. Undoubtedly there are some cases of recurrent insanity, that those of us who have had much experience recognise, who never get out of asylums. I have known patients for 40 years in a place like Bethlem, having an average of about three attacks of acute mania every year. That is an extreme case, but one comes across a fair number of cases in which there is recurrent insanity, during which time they are never moved or certificated.

36,037. That is Dr. Mott's point. He said the only cases of recurrent insanity he would recognise, were those that were or should be under constant certificates?—That is always under the certificate—quite so, continuous.

36,038. Another point is this. We have been told very properly that the interests of the insane must be watched?—Yes.

36,039. The Commissioners of Lunacy have impressed that point very strongly. We know that in the majority of persons we are speaking of, there are no interests. They are morally and mentally dead, but it is possible to conceive that an action may be taken in connection with a lunatic who still has some interests. Do you think it would be wise to allow the Commissioners of Lunacy to have power to intervene in any case in which such an action was being brought, something like the King's Proctor?—In the question of divorce?

36,040. In the interests of the insane, as a safeguard to the insane?—In cases of this kind?

36,041. Yes?—I should say so distinctly.

36,042. Because the insane person is alone or may be. Probably 99 out of a 100 have no interests, but assuming a case is possible where the insane person has interests, do you think it would be wise that a Commissioner in Lunacy should have power to intervene?—I feel very strongly that it should be legal as well as medical opinion, and therefore anything in the shape of intervention by a legal authority like a Commissioner would satisfy me.

36,043. The Commissioner would appear as the friend of the lunatic to look after his interests?—Yes.

36,044. That, you think, would be a good thing?—Yes.

36,045. There are a few small points upon which I think you might express an opinion. You would not make any distinction as to lunacy appearing years after marriage. It has been said that insanity as a ground of divorce should not apply, if it appears 15 years after marriage?—I do not see that should interfere.

36,046. You would not introduce a clause for criminal lunatics detained at Broadmoor?—That is a question one has considered. My feeling is that I should like it done, but I have not made up my mind.

36,047. A large portion of these criminal lunatics would come under the clause of incurable insanity of five years' duration?—Yes, most of them would.

36,048. You would not widen it and say a criminal lunatic ipso facto?—One has looked at the American law and in some cases that is allowed I believe.

36,049. In a case of this sort where insanity is going to be a ground of divorce, if the petitioning party had already committed adultery, would you allow the case to proceed? Possibly it is out of your line?—I am afraid that is out of my line.

36,050. (Chairman.) May I try in my own way to clear up the difficulty between you and Sir Lewis Dibdin. Supposing a woman is married, and under your clause of incurable insanity for five years, it is found, as a fact, that the husband's conduct had been instrumental in bringing about that condition, what would you do?—I should not allow him to get a divorce.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) The point is, it will not be capable of proof, and yet the man ought not to have got it.

36,051. (Chairman.) Sir Lewis' point is this, that it would be extremely difficult, having regard to the privacy of life, to establish that the man's conduct had brought this about, and his question was, how would you prove that?—I admit the extreme difficulty, but if they establish it, then I should bar the divorce, but you have to establish it. That is the difficulty.

36,052. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) Supposing it exists but you cannot prove it, ought the man to have his divorce?—No.

36,053. Although you have not proved it?—Proved her insanity?

(Chairman.) No, if you can prove her insanity but cannot prove anything against the husband.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) And yet it is his fault, but you cannot prove it. Ought he to have his divorce or not?

36,054. (Chairman.) I am afraid we get to the question of proof. Will you summarise it thus. We have grasped what you think might be a clause assuming it were introduced?—Yes.

36,055. Fifty-one of your correspondents are in favour of divorce and 29 against?—Yes.

36,056. Are you prepared to support that clause yourself?—I would not support the 51. I should be more inclined to say that my own personal feeling is, that it has not been established that insanity is sufficiently often a cause to require divorce.

36,057. We have heard that there are 50,000 married people in the asylums. We cannot tell without asking everyone what their views might be as to a desire for release. You do know, I take it, of a number of cases in which it is a great hardship?—There is no doubt of the individual hardship, and that I have felt. I entered upon it with a feeling I must say rather in favour of the divorce, but the more I have considered the individual reports from these people, and the more I have considered my own 40 years' experience, I cannot help thinking that there is not ground enough to justify the alteration.

36,058. (Chairman.) I ought to thank you very much indeed for your evidence, and I am sorry that we have had to take up so much of your time?—I am only too glad to have been of service.

Adjourned.

Winchester House, St. James's Square, London, S.W.

FORTIETH DAY.

Tuesday, 8th November 1910.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HON. LORD GORELL (Chairman).

The LADY FRANCES BALFOUR.
The Right Hon. THOMAS BURT, M.P.
Sir FREDERICK TREVES, Bart., G.C.V.O., C.B., LL.D., F.R.C.S.
Sir LEWIS DIBDIN, D.C.L.
Sir GEORGE WHITE, M.P.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.
EDGAR BRIERLEY, Esq.
J. A. SPENDER, Esq.

The Hon. HENRY GORELL BARNES (Secretary).
J. E. G. DE MONTMORENCY, Esq. (Assistant Secretary).

Dr. DAVID WALSH called and examined.

36,059. (Chairman.) You are an M.D. Where is your sphere of work?—In London, at 27, Welbeck Street.

36,060. You are a consulting physician?—Yes; I am a specialist in skin diseases, and also a physician.

36,061. Have you had these matters that are under our consideration brought to your attention?—Yes. I am editor of a medical journal, and in that capacity these matters have been under my consideration for a great many years.

36,062. You communicated with the Secretary with a view to giving evidence?—Yes.

36,063. I will take you through your proof carefully. Will it suit your convenience to read your paper until I think it is necessary to ask you questions upon it? Some parts of it I can cut shorter?—Yes. "It appears to me that no legislation of the kind concerned is likely to be permanently successful unless it makes some provision not only against the marriage but also against the continuance in wedlock of persons likely to damage to any serious extent the health of the family, especially by producing defective offspring. Hitherto, society has allowed its matrimonial affairs to drift for the most part into the hands of priests and lawyers, with results that have not been altogether satisfactory. In view of that failure its social reformers will do well to call in the aid of medical science. They will find that modern scientific medicine has in matrimonial law, properly handled, a powerful weapon for the prevention of bodily and mental disease in the family, together with the less direct evils of pauperism, prostitution, alcoholism, crime and other disastrous heritages of the union of unfit persons. So far neither priests, lawyers nor social reformers have made any serious attempt either to discourage or to dissolve marriages of the unfit. It may be well, therefore, for the community to find out what medical men have to say upon the subject. The leaders of the English Church, as expressed in Canon Law and recently declared by the majority of Convocation, hold the canonical view of marriage as a sacramental and indissoluble union. From a medical standpoint this doctrine involves serious consequences as regards offspring. Should a spouse become insane, for instance, under Canon Law the marriage cannot be dissolved, and the parents are permitted, if not enjoined, to go on producing children destined in a large proportion to people our lunatic asylums. It is difficult to reconcile such a position with any reasonable conception of a just and all-wise Providence, especially when we reflect that the burden of supporting these hapless victims falls upon the sane and healthy members of the community. Take another case, that of a man who deserts his wife, or who is sent to penal servitude; the Church says the wife may not obtain a divorce upon either ground, although by her non-productiveness during the child-bearing period the State is deprived of the chance of so many additional children. A church advancing doctrines of that far-reaching kind should be prepared with overwhelming arguments in their support. What do we find?"

36,064. We have had so much evidence as to the position of the matter connected with the interpretation of Scripture, that I do not think I need trouble with that part of the paper. I will pass to the bottom of page 4. You will understand I have read it all and fully appreciate what you say. No doubt we all have?—Perhaps I may be permitted to explain my position. The Church attitude is so wrapped up with the whole question, and with the medical aspects of the question, that is impossible to consider or discuss the religious position apart from the medical, and that is why I have put that in my paper.

36,065. I follow that, but you dissent from the Church's position, and refer to the interpretations of Scripture, and so forth. I think the Commissioners would feel we have had a lot of evidence and so much coming on that special point, that we want to keep you to the medical side of it. At the bottom of page 4 you take it up completely, I think?—Yes.

36,066. Of course, if there is any point you specifically want to draw attention to, I do not want to shut it out. It is only that we have a great deal of work to do and we have many learned men on these points with regard to the Scriptural position?—"As a medical man I should not attach undue weight to the doctrines of Canon Law where they clash with the plain teachings of science. Much the same applies to Civil Law. Where legal provisions run counter to established medical principles I should regard the law as defective, at any rate so far as the rational development of Society is concerned. The law declares marriage to be a civil thing, but permits divorce solely on the ground of adultery on the part of the woman and of adultery and cruelty on the part of the man."

36,067. There are one or two additional matters, but for your purpose, cruelty is sufficient?—"Thus the law, while it admits the principle of divorce, yet prevents its extension beyond the slenderest limits, while it takes no account whatever of the medical aspects of the case. It denies dissolution of marriage to a spouse who has been deserted, or whose other spouse has become insane, or has been sent to penal servitude, or has become incapacitated from the duties of married life by reason of drunkenness, disease, impotency or other cause that lessens or destroys the possibility of producing healthy offspring. I submit that the law requires modifying to meet such cases. It presumably agrees with the declaration of the Church that one of the objects of marriage is for the procreation of children, and were the phrase qualified so as to read 'healthy children,' one could then accept it readily enough. From a medical point of view marriage is commendable only when it provides for the procreation of healthy children, while both marriage and divorce might be rendered powerful safeguards against the production of unhealthy offspring. The economic loss to the community arising from marriages of the unfit is enormous. The history of the Jukes family in America, as related by Dugdale, may be quoted. The family sprang from a backwoodsman and its historian was able to find 834 records of its descendants amongst whom crime, pauperism, insanity and prostitution were rampant. Dugdale estimated that during the century and a half with which he dealt the family cost the State no less a sum than $1,308,000, or roughly 260,000*l.* That, I may say, is a small proportion of the amount that it must have cost the community directly and indirectly."

36,068. Can you tell me the date of that family history at the beginning? Between what periods does that run?—He traced them for a century and a half, and he wrote about 1880.

36,069. The foundation of the tracing was a century and a half before?—Yes. "Society, then, which has thus to bear the heavy burden of unfit marriages, need hardly hesitate in self-protection to exercise a collective control over both the wedding and the wedlock of unfit persons. The principles of medicine that apply to marriage and divorce are few and simple. As a medical man I am dominated in this respect by two main objects, first, the eradication of disease, both by its cure or, better still, by its prevention, and secondly, the production of a healthy race. The application of these two principles to marriage and divorce enable one to arrive at certain conclusions of the utmost importance with regard to the prevalence of insanity, weak-mindedness, pauperism, crime and other social evils of which so much has been heard in recent years."

36,070. You have the two propositions involved in what you have said, namely, prevention by something before marriage, and divorce afterwards, if I follow you. Those are the objects, but they may be separated into two propositions; one, steps taken to ensure the marriage of the fit, and the other the dissolution of the marriage in cases where it might reasonably be dissolved?—What I had in my mind was this: to apply both cure and prevention of disease to marriage, and cure and prevention to divorce.

36,071. Will you apply your mind to the first of those? Have you any practical suggestions you desire to put forward?—Yes, the cure and prevention of disease as regards marriage.

36,072. Before marriage, cure and prevention?—Yes. The cure of certain disease as a necessary preceding condition.

36,073. Perhaps I am anticipating too much. Then you proceed with the medical aspects of marriage?—"It is useless to bewail the prevalence of race degeneracy and its associated evils if we take no steps to hinder the marriages of persons who can reproduce nothing but degenerates. To take an extreme case. Suppose a man and woman, each with a bad family history and a criminal personal record, to be released from their respective lunatic asylums. As things go, they may marry with the blessing of the Church and the sanction of the State, but it is nevertheless a foregone conclusion that sooner or later the community will have to maintain a large proportion of their descendants in gaols, workhouses and asylums." I may say, since this was written, I have heard of the case of a man and woman who actually met in a lunatic asylum; they were both inmates of a private lunatic asylum; they went out and they married. The end of it was the man shot himself. That is an extreme instance. What I took as an extreme instance in imagination actually occurred. In more than one American state, the legislature has arrived at the logical conclusion that it is right to prevent, by means of a simple surgical operation, certain lunatics, criminals and weak-minded persons from reproducing their kind. Control of that sort is being exercised at the present moment in Indiana and its principle has been approved in some other of the United States. Take another case, that of syphilis, which is not only a communicable, but also an inherited disease. Why should syphilis not be dealt with on the same lines that we deal with other serious infectious maladies, such as scarlet fever, small-pox and cholera? Syphilis is often far more damaging to the individual than any of the ordinary notifiable infectious diseases, while in many cases it entails in addition the most serious injury to the offspring. Yet we exercise stringent control over persons suffering from ordinary fevers, while we permit persons to marry with the syphilitic infection full upon them. Syphilis is commonly regarded as a shameful thing not to be spoken of in polite society, but we as medical men are not concerned with the way in which a disease has been contracted. The chastity or otherwise of an individual sufferer is not a matter for the physician, to say nothing of the fact that syphilis may be and not infrequently is contracted in an innocent fashion, as, for instance, in the cases of nurses and medical men attending syphilitic patients. But the physician's bounden duty is to cure and prevent disease. It follows that he must forbid the marriage of persons suffering from syphilis, and if the malady prove incurable in married persons, he must resort to divorce or its equivalent as a means of preventing the further spread of the disease. The State under its existing laws would forbid a man marrying as long as he were shown to be suffering from so comparatively mild a disease as erysipelas."

36,074. What is that law?—Perhaps as I have put it, it is not quite right. I meant if he were suffering from erysipelas he would be, under another law, fined for exposing himself in that condition.

36,075. There is no prohibition against contracting marriage?—No; I misstated it.

36,076. It is not quite accurate: you mean it is in the category of infectious diseases?—I may say this proof of evidence was written under pressure some weeks ago. I have not had an opportunity of revising it, but that obviously does not quite express my meaning. I mean to say, under another law he could be imprisoned, taken up for exposing himself when he is suffering from a notifiable infectious disease and fined 40*l.*, I believe, at any rate heavily fined—I have not the exact figure. If he is suffering from syphilis, there is nothing to prevent him spreading it, but if suffering from a mild disorder like erysipelas he can be stopped. "Why should not a candidate for marriage be required to produce a medical certificate stating that he is free from any communicable malady? That would be a safeguard to many innocent persons, while it would not unduly interfere with the liberty of the subject."

36,077. You suggest in a case in which there has been concealment of the fact that one party to a marriage was suffering from a communicable malady of a serious character, that the other party should have ground for annulment on discovery?—I have not gone so far as that, but I am prepared to do so.

36,078. We have had that suggested?—I should quite endorse that. I was getting at it in a different way.

36,079. Would that apply to all notifiable diseases? Those you have mentioned, it would involve their being notified?—I could not say that. Some are trivial.

36,080. Would it not apply to those diseases which render a person unfit to marry?—That is it exactly, "In the existing state of society, however, it is unlikely that any very stringent legislative control of the marriage contract would be tolerated. Measures founded on medical principles, therefore, would have to depend rather on moral suasion than on compulsion. For the well-to-do classes of society I would suggest to parents and guardians the prudence of requiring a medical certificate of the fitness of a candidate for marriage from the point of view of spouse on the one hand, and of prospective children on the other. A somewhat similar warranty of fitness, if the term may be used, could be obtained by insisting as a necessary preliminary that the candidate should be accepted as a first-rate life in a British insurance office of good standing. As regards the poorer classes, I would suggest the organisation of advisory marriage bureaus, where all persons bent on matrimony could obtain gratis a full investigation of the family and personal history, and all other pertinent facts on both sides, and secure advice as to the desirability or otherwise of the proposed marriage. These bureaus might be associated with the existing labour bureaus, and placed in charge of medical experts, who would find little difficulty in framing satisfactory rules for their own administrative guidance. As regards marriage of cousins, for instance, it is now generally recognised that there is little risk to offspring provided the stock is free from taint of nervous or other serious hereditary defects. As to epilepsy and insanity, it may be assumed that medical sanction would in many cases be withheld. Without going into further details of their application, I will lay down the general proposition that medical advice and sanction should be sought and obtained as an essential preliminary to marriage in all ranks of society."

36,081. I gather from what you have said you would not be prepared to advocate any legislation in the nature of compulsion? Those last paragraphs are rather indicative of a view that the minds of people should be brought to bear upon, and that they should exercise more control in the matter, or have the opportunity of doing so?—I think I should be in favour of legislation as regards certain diseases.

36,082. Legislation of what character?—A medical certificate as to freedom—there are only one or two diseases I can call hereditary—from insanity and from syphilis.

36,083. From venereal disease?—Yes. That would be an unspeakable safeguard to the community. We as medical men are impressed in a way no other class of the community can be by the enormous prevalence and serious consequences of syphilis and insanity. That is my main object in coming before the Commission, to impress that on you.

36,084. Do you include gonorrhœa in that?—Genorrhœa is as dangerous or more dangerous than syphilis to life; especially in the case of the woman.

36,085. You would be prepared to support legislation requiring in those two cases of insanity, and such diseases as you mention, a medical certificate before marriage?—Yes.

36,086. Supposing that was not obtained, and the marriage took place,—I am thinking of the practical effect of the suggestion?—I suppose, like any other law, that the parties who transgressed that particular law would be held responsible.

36,087. Would you go so far as to say if it were made the law they should be subject to a suit for nullity of marriage?—The question would arise probably only in instances of insanity or syphilis. In that case it should be made a ground for nullity.

36,088. Then you have another point on the next page of your proof?—"As a medical man I advocate the raising of the age at which marriage is legal from 12 years in the girl and 14 in the boy to at least 16 in the girl and 20 in the male—and then only with the consent of parents or guardians, or in their absence, of a magistrate or judge. It seems somewhat absurd that the law should deny the right of making an ordinary contract to a minor, who is nevertheless permitted to enter unrestrainedly into the most important of all personal contracts, as regards the individual, the family, and the State, at the tender ages of 12 and 14 years."

36,089. At present minors require consent, but it is easily evaded by swearing they are 21 years of age. How do you propose to treat the cases in which they had evaded the provisions you suggest? Would you give the right, as is given in France, of the parents seeking a declaration of nullity?—I am afraid I am not prepared with an answer.

36,090. It is not much use laying down a provision which is evaded with the utmost ease, unless you follow it out in some way which makes it of practical effect. I think I am correct in saying in France, because I have had to give judgment in cases of that kind, that the parents can step in where consent is not given and themselves apply for a suit for declaration of nullity. I want to see how far your suggestion goes?—I am afraid in this instance I am only able to draw attention to my views. I cannot express any definite opinion.

36,091. The way to work it out is a matter perhaps, you would say, for a lawyer, but the point is raising the age so that there should be a prohibition under that?—Yes.

36,092. It has been suggested if you carry it as high as 21, the age mentioned—you put 20—but even at 20, it has been suggested that might lead to a great deal more immorality than if you leave it where it is. What is your view about that?—I do not think it would affect the question of morality or immorality much.

36,093. The next part is, what medical aspects of divorce you would like to have taken in private, but looking at it again I think we may proceed?—"The logical application of the principles of the eradication of disease to divorce leads to various more or less obvious conclusions which will be simply stated without formal discussion. Some few points, however, need a brief passing examination. Turning first to the problem of communicable disease, let us take syphilis. The fact of incurable syphilis should, to my mind, constitute a ground for divorce. Any case that resisted treatment, say for two years, might be regarded for practical purposes as incurable." Some cases do seem to be incurable. "At the same time it should be borne in mind that assuming the disease to be established as a legal ground for dissolution of marriage, it is simply permissive and it by no means follows that a spouse would take advantage of it. As a medical man I justify the inclusion of venereal diseases as statutory grounds for the dissolution of marriage on the score of the spread of a serious disease to spouse and children. It is no matter to me whether the diseases in question were acquired innocently or otherwise. It is my professional duty to detect and stamp out and prevent syphilis and all other diseases to the utmost of my power. But there is no reason why I should place syphilis in a class apart from other communicable diseases, taking my stand, as I do, upon purely medical grounds. Take consumption of the lungs, which is sometimes communicated from one spouse to the other, and which is apt to produce deterioration in offspring. If incurable syphilis is to be admitted as a ground for divorce, why not incurable consumption of the lungs? In short I am led to the conclusion logically that the existence of any serious and incurable disease in either spouse likely to injure the other spouse or offspring or to prevent the procreation of healthy children during the child-bearing period of the life of the female spouse should constitute a legal ground for divorce. In this case it should be clearly understood that the ground for divorce would be permissive, and it is tolerably certain that the law would provide against the abuse of such a ground by imposing substantial conditions as to division of property. Thus, one spouse seeking to divorce the other on the score of incapacitating and incurable illness, bodily or mental, might be required to hand over to the other one-half of the claimant's fortune. The re-marriage of parties divorced for such a cause should be prohibited, in my opinion. Without attempting further detailed discussion, I venture to advance the following conclusions and suggestions, based upon social and medical considerations.

"A.—General.

"1. Canon Law was in force for many centuries in England, where it proved a failure, inasmuch as divorce, although nominally refused, was in mediæval times readily obtainable by the rich on the flimsiest pretext.

"2. Marriage is a civil thing; and is a matter purely for State control.

"3. Marriage and divorce, which closely concern the health of the individual, the family and the nation, are matters for medical as well as for moral and legal control.

"4. The marriage laws should be simplified, revised and consolidated into one common law for the United Kingdom, and so far as possible for the whole British Empire.

"B.—As regards Marriage.

"5. The cost of civil marriage should be small, say, a maximum fee of five shillings including certificate.

"6. The civil ceremony at Registrar's office should be compulsory. Religious celebration to be optional and fees privately arranged.

"7. The conditions of the ecclesiastical and religious marriage to be reduced to one simple form on the lines of the present special licence.

"8. The legal age of marriage should be raised to, say, 17 in the female and 20 in the male—with consent of guardians below age of 21 or, failing that, of a magistrate or judge.

"9. The parents or guardians of well-to-do classes may be advised to test the fitness of every candidate for matrimony by demanding a medical certificate of suitability, or by requiring acceptance as a sound life by a first-rate life insurance company. In the poorer ranks of society the provision of advisory marriage bureaus is advocated, each with a medical expert ready to investigate free of cost the circumstances of persons contemplating marriage and to advise thereon.

"9. The payment of Registrars of Marriage to be in all cases by salary and not by a fee on marriage.

"C.—As regards Divorce.

"10. Sex equality should be established.

"11. Cheap or free divorce to be afforded to poor litigants by bringing the law to the door of all citizens.

"12. Until the ideal of free law to all members of the community be attained it is suggested that the legal maximum cost of divorce proceedings be reduced to, say, five guineas for persons whose income does not exceed 200*l.* a year; below that amount the cost not to exceed three guineas.

"13. The magistrate's separation order might be converted by legislation into the equivalent of a decree nisi to be rendered automatically absolute at the end of six months. This would provide poor man's divorce with one stroke of the legislative pen and bring to an end a well-meant but not altogether successful experiment.

"14. I would adopt and extend the existing grounds for divorce so as to include—

"(a) adultery;
"(b) persistent cruelty or violence;
"(c) desertion for more than a year;
"(d) imprisonment for felony or serious misdemeanour or habitual minor crime;
"(e) physical incompatibility;
"(f) communication to spouse of venereal or other serious and incurable disease;
"(g) development of any serious and incurable disease likely to prevent the procreation of healthy offspring;
"(h) insanity or epilepsy;
"(i) alcoholism of a year's duration;
"(j) drug habits of a year's duration;
"(k) non-consummation owing to unreasonable refusal;
"(l) acquired impotency during the child-bearing period of wife's lifetime."

36,094. I do not understand the last.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) By the husband, he means.

36,095. (Chairman.) Possibly. Will you tell us what it does mean?—It does mean that, by the husband.

36,096. Through misconduct?—Not necessarily: it might be a nervous disease: it might be a case entirely beyond his control. The ground is that it robs the State of potential children. I do not insist on that at all, but it seems to me that should be a ground.

36,097. You have attempted to cover all those things which are perhaps embraced in two categories—(1) misconduct of the spouse, and (2) the happening of matters which prevent the proper production of healthy children?—Yes.

36,098. That seems to be the general feature of your point?—Anything that injures the next generation or prevents us having a sufficient number. "(15) Medical evidence as to matters of opinion in all matrimonial causes should be obtained by the Court in the form of a report made by a special board of medical experts, but medical witnesses to continue to give evidence on matter of fact as at present. In this way the Court is likely to gain more trusthworthy and judicial information than that now obtained from ex parte medical witnesses."

36,099. In one of the very cases, the cases of nullity, the Court has its established reporters, not ex parte at all. That is already done?—I should propose an extension of that principle, an extension of an existing principle in cases of nullity. "My case may be summed up briefly somewhat as follows. The Church and the law having failed to prevent the marriage of unfit persons and the perpetuation of defective children, it is high time that society turn to some agency whereby the orderly advance of race evolution may be more effectually secured. The most promising agency for that purpose I take to be preventive medicine, which, in my opinion, would hardly fail ultimately to regard marriage and divorce as instruments for the reasoned control of that reproduction of species which constitutes a supreme essential of human life and progress."

36,100. (Sir Frederick Treves.) You come here in your private capacity?—Yes. I come both as a medical man and as a layman.

36,101. What medical journal do you edit?—"The Medical Press and Circular."

36,102. I gather from your proof that your main object, possibly I may say your only object, is to prevent disease, to cure disease, to produce a healthy race?—Yes.

36,103. That is so?—That is so.

36,104. You would make use of the divorce laws to effect that end?—As instruments to that end.

36,105. So that you are not, so far as your proof goes, concerned with the moral, the social, or the economic side of the questions?—These questions are so mixed up. My main object is medical.

36,106. You would use the divorce laws to bring about the objects that you have mentioned, the prevention of disease, the cure of disease, and the production of a healthy race?—Yes, just as I should the notification of infectious disease or any other instrument the law places at the aid of preventive medicine.

36,107. You have not touched upon any moral, social or economic question in your proof in connection with divorce?—Only incidentally.

36,108. On page 6 of your proof, we take it you are in favour of a surgical operation for the sterilization of certain human beings?—I say here that it is the logical conclusion. I have not expressed any opinion. So long as people are allowed to leave lunatic asylums and reproduce children who are almost necessarily by the facts of the circumstances predestined to become lunatics, or at any rate of weak mind, and be a charge upon the community, I consider that the community is entitled to go even so far as controlling their sexual capabilities.

36,109. You think that operation should be a feature of the legislature of this country?—I will not go so far as that, but it should demand the very serious consideration of this Commission.

36,110. It hardly affects the question of divorce, does it? Still, that is a small point. In your proof you deal at great length with syphilis. Would you make that a notifiable disease?—Yes.

36,111. You realise the difficulties that the case presents?—I do. I recognise that there would be very extreme difficulties, but if the principle of notification be sound in minor diseases, I cannot see that it would be unsound in diseases of such great gravity as syphilis and gonorrhœa.

36,112. I suppose there is this peculiarity: the patient is supposed to confide in the medical man, but the fact of syphilis becoming known to a medical man, he must immediately go into the highways and byeways and proclaim the fact. There is that difficulty?—There is very great difficulty. You might say that with regard to scarlet fever he is in the same position of confidence.

36,113. I do not think that involves the same social question. A married woman or man confessing to a doctor that they have syphilis cannot be in the same position as a case of scarlet fever in a child. At any rate, you say there would be extreme difficulties?—Yes.

36,114. Are you quite sure that you would include syphilis acquired innocently?—I should, on the ground that, however acquired, the children would be equally affected.

36,115. You look at the whole question from absolutely the narrow medical point of view?—The narrow medical point of view, if you put it in that way.

(Chairman.) You could not call it narrow.

36,116. (Sir Frederick Treves.) From the limited medical point of view. You must have known many surgeons who have acquired syphilis during operations?—Unfortunately I have, and more frequently in midwifery cases.

36,117. We can say a great number?—Yes.

36,118. I should imagine it would be a terrible hardship if a surgeon acquiring syphilis in that way has furnished his wife with grounds for divorce?—I have my saving clause—it is permissive. If the wife loves the man she will not avail herself of it, but if she does not and has contracted syphilis, I consider it right that syphilis in itself, no matter how acquired, should be a ground of divorce.

36,119. Her dislike being the main factor. She takes advantage of the accident of having acquired syphilis to divorce him. Her dislike is the essential feature, and she takes advantage of what is a great misfortune?—One might imagine, for the sake of unborn children, even liking the man, she might consider it her duty to renounce him if the subject of incurable syphilis.

36,120. Speaking of disease generally, with some modification, you compared erysipelas with other maladies. A man obviously cannot marry during the progress of erysipelas, but it is a very ephemeral trouble and may last 10 days. You cannot compare that with phthisis, which lasts a lifetime. That would appear very misleading, do you not think?—Yes, I admit that, but I might, perhaps, compare it with gonorrhœa in the male, which is also extremely fleeting as a rule, and then the analogy would be more exact.

36,121. Supposing all these rules were introduced, that people cannot marry under certain conditions, how do you control irregular unions of such people?—I do not profess to control them. I am treating now of marriage. I do not assume there would be more irregular unions or less than at present under existing conditions.

36,122. If you enlarge the category of people who cannot marry, surely you must increase the number of irregular unions?—I do not know that it necessarily follows, because if we keep people under certain existing conditions under the marriage tie, they are sure to contract irregular unions as it is.

36,123. It is obvious if you increase the number of those who are not allowed by law to marry, you must increase the number of irregular unions?—It increases the possibility of them.

36,124. Well, the possibility of them. You speak of medical certificates of fitness. Who is to pay for those?—Medical certificates for what?

36,125. Of fitness, a warranty of fitness, as you say?—In the case of rich people they pay for their own.

36,126. And in the case of the poor?—That would be done by the State. I consider marriage is so much a matter for the State that the State should bear the whole cost of its regulation in every way, the cost of marriage, divorce, and everything relating to marriage, whether in the preceding stage before wedlock, marriage itself, or the wedlock afterwards, or the conditions of matrimony generally. It is a State matter.

36,127. Take the bureau you suggest. Your experience as a medical man would justify you in thinking these people would take this advice?—I am afraid not, at first, not till they became educated.

36,128. It is advice which would probably not be taken?—I have found a great many poor people in my experience who are willing to take advice, and more so since the time I began as a student. The people to whom this would apply are more inclined to take rational advice. They are getting more educated as to the value of health matters.

36,129. To go to the medical aspects of the question, you would make syphilis a ground for divorce?—Yes.

36,130. Would you be prepared as a medical man to certify any person as suffering from incurable syphilis?—There are some cases of syphilis which appear to resist all treatment. That is all I can say.

36,131. Would you be prepared to put a clause in a Bill defining a man who is suffering from incurable syphilis?—Apparently incurable by medical methods. Some cases resist treatment.

36,132. That would be a little lax?—Say for two years. If a case cannot be cured within two years, I should say a cure would be doubtful.

36,133. Would you be prepared to sign a certificate that in any instance a person is incurable at the end of two years?—I should not.

36,134. Yet you call it here "incurable syphilis"?—I must define that rigidly. Most of us would agree that cases occur in which the disease appears to be incurable by all medical methods.

36,135. Suppose, as a matter of fact, Ehrlich's method was used; that may possibly do away with it?—That will alter my position entirely. If we have a cure that is an accepted and established cure for syphilis, as possibly it may be with Professor Ehrlich's new remedy, that would alter the position, but I am dealing with the conditions as known to us.

36,136. Supposing a clause were drafted in the Bill, would you put in a clause with regard to incurable syphilis and be able to satisfy the judge the individual was incurable?—I can only say I have had cases—I presume we all have—that resist ordinary treatment for an indefinite number of years.

36,137. The question is, can they be stated positively by medical men to be incurable?—I should not think so. Syphilis is one of the most curable diseases, as a rule, it is absolutely under medical control, but this exception provides for the few cases we cannot control.

36,138. I see in your proof you would include communicable and hereditary diseases: that is to say, if a person develops a disease that can be communicated or transmitted to children, that becomes a ground of divorce?—A serious communicable disease likely to injure offspring.

36,139. You mention phthisis?—Yes.

36,140. Take a family where the mother has died of phthisis, and a daughter has developed phthisis, and there are two sons who are healthy; you would forbid all those three to marry?—No, I do not say that, because I do not regard consumption as a hereditary disease.

36,141. As a communicable disease?—Yes.

36,142. Would you prevent the daughter from marrying?—No.

36,143. Supposing she has phthisis?—This applies to spouses only.

36,144. You must wait till they are married before the disease develops?—I should not, from the fact of a child having consumptive parents, forbid marriage on that ground.

36,145. That may be communicated. Supposing a spouse did develop consumption, remembering that marriage is for better or worse, you still would make that a ground for divorce?—I should if I could not cure the disease. I think I have made provision that the phthisis must have been of more than two years' duration.

36,146. Before a divorce could be applied for?—Yes. I should make it perfectly clear that there was no reasonable prospect of curing the disease.

36,147. You know of instances of children being born after phthisis has existed in a parent for two years?—Yes.

36,148. You do not see any hardship in this?—There is hardship, undoubtedly. I am speaking as a medical man, from a purely abstract, philosophical point of view. No great principle was ever enforced by legislation that did not entail hardship on individuals.

36,149. You do not think it affects the regard for the marriage tie that it can be broken under circumstances of that sort?—I think not.

36,150. Broken by misfortune?—I think it would do far less damage than seeing people as I have seen them, poor people in advanced stages of consumption, living in hovels and spreading the disease inevitably to their children. A marriage law that maintains a union under those circumstances requires revision, and the sanctity of the marriage tie is not maintained by a State that insists on wedlock of that kind.

36,151. But take other diseases as you put them in a mass. Take hæmophilia?—There are few hereditary diseases. I regard that as one.

36,152. It would come in your list?—Yes.

36,153. That is a disease known as the "bleeders' disease" which is handed down by the female and comes out in the male?—Yes.

36,154. If a girl belonging to a "bleeder" family had married, would you enable her husband to divorce her?—I should, if I carry out my principle logically. I should try and prevent the marriage.

36,155. She would be perfectly healthy?—My ground is that the next generation would be damaged; there would be defective children produced.

36,156. Supposing her children are females?—If we could ensure that they would be females, it would be another matter.

36,157. To be really practical, the point is this. Here is a perfectly healthy woman in robust health, who will remain healthy until she finally dies of some accidental disease. She may hand down hæmophilia to her children if those children are male. She is happily married, and you introduce a ground of divorce, and she can be divorced on account of these more or less accidental circumstances?—I should not regard her as a perfectly healthy woman if she has hæmophiliac tendencies.

36,158. She has not it, but is the transmitter of it?—Therefore she is not, so far as my medical view of marriage is concerned, a healthy woman, and is one of the cases who should be prevented from bearing children.

36,159. You would exclude that?—Yes.

36,160. You would schedule that as a ground for divorce?—Yes. I consider it a serious enough condition.

36,161. I suppose all these limitations would again lead to irregular unions?—It is difficult to say, in our complex state of society, the cause of irregular unions. I suspect there are a great many contributory causes.

36,162. You are making a very large series of people in this country who are for ever debarred from marrying?—That is so. We may say that the State by shutting men and women up in prison is doing much the same thing. It is impossible, the question is so big to answer adequately here.

36,163. You suggest the cost of divorce should not exceed three guineas for people whose income is below 200*l.* a year?—Yes.

36,164. From your proof it appears there is an immense amount of medical evidence necessary in these cases. Is all that to be paid by three guineas? Who is to pay for that?—I wish the State to pay.

36,165. On the last page of your proof you run through some medical items. What do you mean by "physical incompatibility"?—I mean where for physical reasons the marriage relations are impossible.

36,166. You say "incompatibility"?—That is not the right word. It was the first that occurred to me, but I mean where from physical conditions the ordinary marriage relations cannot be maintained.

36,167. That would be a ground for nullity?—Yes.

36,168. (Chairman.) Not if it comes on afterwards for any reason; that is if it exists at the time of the marriage?—Shall I put it "acquired physical incompatibility."

36,169. (Sir Frederick Treeves.) You mention under "(g)" "development of any serious and incurable disease likely to prevent the procreation of healthy offspring" and put it in the same category with "l," the last one. Supposing a man has a stricture of the urethra from accident, that would be a ground for divorce?—Yes.

36,170. You see no injustice in that?—Injustice?

36,171. It is a pure accident that cannot be helped. The man is thrown from a horse, a local injury occurs, and he comes under category "g" or "l", whichever you like, and that is a ground for divorce?—The wife is deprived of so many years of her child-bearing life. She is deprived of that; surely you might say that. Is she to suffer because of the accident? Why not limit the results of the accident to the person concerned?

36,172. They are married for better or worse; it is misfortune. You make misfortune a ground for divorce?—I do not see how I can logically except it.

36,173. You would include then a stricture following a rupture of the urethra as a ground of divorce?—Yes.

36,174. With regard to insanity, do you give any details? Is it incurable insanity, or any kind?—Upon this point I do not pretend to speak as an expert. My experience is very limited. I spent a year in one of the largest asylums in England, but that was only a passing experience. It seems to me that insanity of any kind, curable or incurable, should be made a ground of divorce on account of the children. It means that the insanity may be curable; it is called curable, but the heredity in all these cases is passed on.

36,175. You include any kind of insanity?—Yes.

36,176. In other words, any certified person?—I would make a few exceptions where the mental disturbance is purely from accidental causes and temporary and there is no reasonable prospect of heredity, but in almost all cases of insanity there is the question of heredity, and that is one that dominates this position.

36,177. You would exclude the accident in insanity, but not in any other disease?—I exclude that particular peculiar accidental case because it is not like the case brought forward by you, which presumably is permanent, the stricture. If the stricture could be cured by surgical means and the man restored to health, by all means let it be a continuing marriage.

36,178. Your alteration of the law would affect 135,000 people in Great Britain; if that is the number of certified insane?—There would be a very much larger number, according to my view, in the next generation of descendants, who would also be in asylums.

36,179. Of these insane people, some get out of asylums, and I suppose they are likely to contract irregular unions?—The danger to me is the people who are let out of asylums, not the irregular unions; it is the regular unions. They go home and procreate children. Time after time in my limited experience I have had to take notes of cases where they have come back and had children in the meantime. One case was brought to my notice a few days ago, a clergyman who had sunstroke and developed insanity. There was no family history of insanity. He went to an asylum, and after a time he was let out and sent home. He had one child, and he ended by shooting himself. That child will shortly be in an asylum. The child born before the sunstroke is healthy. That man, in my view, should never have been let out of the asylum.

36,180. Take this case. Here are a married couple, one becomes insane and there is a divorce, you say, because they may possibly hand down the taint of insanity or some nerve trouble to their children. To be logical, you must take means to see that those people after divorce do not have any other children. How are you going to do that?—The only means I can suggest is that which is enforced by the legislature of Indiana.

36,181. In any one of these cases, not only is the man or woman divorced, but they have to submit to a surgical operation. To make your contention logical that follows?—As a condition of being released from the asylum.

36,182. You cannot keep a person in an asylum if he is not insane. What do you mean by "alcoholism"?—That would be subject to very careful definition.

36,183. Can you attempt to define it?—I would rather not at the moment. I have not come prepared.

36,184. There would be difficulties in that?—It is extremely difficult.

36,185. Can you define the term "drug habit"?—I should also leave that to the wisdom of the legislature.

36,186. (Lady Frances Balfour.) I understand you make great distinction between a disease such as venereal disease and a disease such as consumption?—Yes.

36,187. Why you draw the distinction is that one is more apt to be communicated and more likely to affect the children than the other?—Yes.

36,188. Even where it is accidentally contracted, as we have heard it described, it may inflict a very great hardship on the spouse to be obliged to cohabit?—Yes.

36,189. The whole argument is permissive; it is not obligatory?—Yes.

36,190. You would not argue that the State should interfere under those conditions?—No, not compulsorily in any circumstances; it is purely permissive.

36,191. The fact that such a disease has been contracted may make a great antipathy on the part of one spouse to the other?—Yes.

36,192. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I do not quite understand the distinction which you now tell Lady Frances Balfour you would draw between syphilis and other kinds of communicable disease. I thought your principle was the same throughout, for all communicable disease, whether syphilis or tuberculosis, for instance. Is it not?—There are two distinct sides of the question: one is affecting spouses and the other is affecting children.

36,193. The dominating factor in your evidence on this subject is with regard to the children, the procreating of healthy children?—Yes.

36,194. Would this be a fair way of stating your principle? The principle is that anything which prevents a marriage being fruitful of healthy children should be a ground of divorce?—Broadly, that states my position.

36,195. I thought it did?—It does, broadly.

36,196. That applies as much to tuberculosis as to syphilis?—No. Tuberculosis is not directly hereditary: syphilis is. Tuberculosis might produce weakened children: it does, but it does not produce directly diseased children.

36,197. Is it or is it not your view that where a person is tuberculous, and that is known to the other partner of the marriage, that ought to be a ground of divorce?—I think so, if it is serious and incurable. I put "incurable," but I would allow a certain term of years to see whether the consumption could be cured.

36,198. Although they differ, no doubt, in degree, they are alike in this, that where either is established that ought to be a ground of divorce?—Yes, if incurable.

36,199. Let us take syphilis for a moment. As I gather your view, that is a proper ground of divorce, but only a permissive ground?—Yes.

36,200. That is to say, the wife, supposing it is the husband who is infected, may or may not take advantage of the existence of the syphilis?—That is so.

36,201. Supposing she does not take advantage of it, and they go on producing children, those children I suppose you would regard as children which ought not to have been produced?—Yes.

36,202. Does not that suggest to you that you are not really applying your principle fairly. The principle being the procreation of healthy children, or the prevention of the procreation of unhealthy children; ought it to be left to the wish or the prejudice, if you like, of the wife whether that result is produced or not?—Theoretically no, but I doubt whether it could be enforced in practice. Theoretically it ought not to be so.

36,203. It ought not to be left to the wish of the wife?—Yes.

36,204. Theoretically your view is that where one or other of the spouses has syphilis, the marriage ought to be compulsorily put an end to?—Yes, syphilis that existed beyond a certain period and resisted medical treatment.

36,205. There the spouses ought to be compulsorily separated?—They ought, in theory.

36,206. Let us go to tuberculosis. I suppose there are cases of persons who are suffering from tuberculosis in the sense that their children may be unfit, who yet are in sufficiently good physical health to enjoy life and at any rate to have children, whether male or female—I mean, to be parents?—Yes.

36,207. That is a condition of things which you think ought to be prevented by making it a ground of divorce?—I should think the children would be deteriorated.

36,208. That is why you think it ought to be a ground of divorce, the effect on the children?—Yes, assuming the consumption resists treatment, that it has gone on beyond a certain time.

36,209. I think you told Sir Frederick Treves that you would not allow it to be a ground of divorce unless the tuberculosis had lasted two years?—Yes.

36,210. How are you going to prevent the procreation of children during those two years?—That would be a matter for the framers of any legislation.

36,211. You are helping us to suggest legislation. What is your proposal?—I should have an immediate separation under these circumstances, and there would be a period of probation. Incurability should be established on clearly defined medical grounds to be got collectively from the best medical authorities.

36,212. Your proposal is that where one of the married parties be suffering from consumption, first of all, they should be compulsorily separated?—I think so; at any rate, means should be taken to stop procreation.

36,213. That could be only by separation?—Yes.

36,214. If the disease goes on for two years without being cured, then divorce?—It would be a ground of divorce, but they need not avail themselves of it.

36,215. The same applies to that as to syphilis; you leave it to the wish of the healthy partner, whether she or he will take advantage of it or not?—Yes.

36,216. Supposing a case where that has all happened and the man has been divorced; he is undoubtedly tubercular but able to enjoy life; how will you prevent that man forming another establishment and bringing children into the world?—There is nothing to prevent him any more than under any circumstances.

36,217. You would prohibit his marrying?—If he has moral strength of mind he would regulate his conduct.

36,218. Supposing he has not?—His action would be guided by his moral standards and strength of will.

36,219. If he has not those desirable things?—It would be outside the question of marriage.

36,220. By Act of Parliament you prevent his marrying; that is so, is it not?—If he is incurable.

36,221. So incurable that he has been divorced, I gather you would prevent his remarriage?—Yes.

36,222. It would be impossible to form a regular union, as well as undesirable?—Yes.

26,223. You have no suggestion to prevent his forming an irregular union?—No.

36,224. Except the one which you say has been adopted in some of the States?—Yes.

36,225. Do you recommend that?—I suggest it for the serious consideration of the Commission.

36,226. The Commission would like to be helped by your advice. Do you recommend it?—If I took a purely philosophical attitude, I consider that it is a logical outcome of the rigid application of these principles of preventive medicine I have laid down.

36,227. May we take it that you do recommend it?—I recommend it as a matter of reason. Whether it can be applied practically by society I cannot say. I must leave that to the Legislature. I am forced into that position myself.

36,228. Upon quite another matter of very much less importance, I am very interested in the recommendations you make with regard to the cost both of marriage and divorce. You suggest that the marriage fee should be 5*s*. You are aware they are now very little more than that, 7*s*. or 8*s*., I think it is?—My knowledge was gathered from a perusal of several books, and I came away with a confused idea that there were about 20 avenues, and an unlimited number of different scales of fees.

36,229. Will you take it from me even for an ordinary marriage it may vary, but you may take it at about 7*s.* or 8*s*?—The cheapest is about 7*s.* 6*d.*

36,230. You may take it from me, with some right to speak, that is about the cost. It varies very much. Do you draw any great distinction between 5*s.* and 7*s.*, or 8*s.*?—Undoubtedly in the case of the poor where a man counts his pence.

36,231. Have you any reason for saying a man who is marrying and setting up a house cannot be expected to find 8*s.* but can be expected to find 5*s.*?—I can give an instance of something bearing on this.

36,232. Is there any real distinction which makes you say 5*s.* rather than 8*s.*?—I should think it would make all the difference to a working man.

36,233. Who is incurring the necessary expense of setting up a house and marrying. You say the cost of divorce ought to be 5*l.* or 3*l.*, according to whether the people have or have not 200*l.* a year, and you told Sir Frederick Treves you did not regard that as including the necessary medical certificates, but that the State should pay for them. May I take it the State should also pay for whatever legal assistance may be necessary?—I should certainly say the State should pay all costs. Marriage is a State matter, and the cost of matrimonial law should be defrayed by the State.

36,234. You regard the whole of the marriage and divorce problem as simply a breeding problem?—That is what it amounts to.

36,235. Just as a farmer with his herd, or the horse breeder. It is a method of getting healthy people into the world?—Yes. I take it at the same time as involving some of the very highest moral considerations. The purity of the family, and very many of these moral considerations are entirely wrapped up in this problem, in my method of treatment you may call it. My ground is not a pure one of breeding. The whole of our moral and religious life is intimately connected with this question. If we approach it without full knowledge of the facts, and recognition of the bare facts of the case, such as they are represented by medical knowledge, we are likely to impose upon the nation a great deal of unnecessary suffering and loss, economic loss, and untold misery upon posterity.

36,236. Your view is that the cost of the marrying and divorce, and so on, ought to be borne by the State because the production or non-production of healthy children is a State matter?—Yes.

36,237. If that is so, why should not the State pay for the support of the family after they are married—at any rate while they are getting these children?—If capable persons cannot support themselves, there must be some defective state of society. That is provided for by the Poor Law.

36,238. You think a medical certificate ought to be necessary to marriage? The Chairman asked you the question, but I did not follow whether your view was that in the absence of that certificate, the marriage is to be invalid, or that it was to be a legal offence if the certificate has not been obtained, for which the parties should be punishable. Which is it?—I should make it a necessary preliminary of marriage, and therefore if it were made so by legislation, it would be an offence not to get it.

36,239. Would you make the marriage invalid?—I do not pretend to know much about legal matters, but the question would arise only if syphilis or one of these diseases existed.

36,240. No. Two parties are married to-day without a medical certificate. Are they married but have committed an offence for which they may be fined 40*s.*, or is it an invalid marriage because they have not fulfilled the necessary conditions?—I should treat it as any other offence against the marriage law.

36,241. There are offences which do not invalidate the marriage, but which are still offences. There are other things which, if not fulfilled, invalidate the marriage. Into which category do you put this?—I think that is a question to be left to the Court.

36,242. You have no view about that? With regard to the consent of parents, the same question arises. Do you make that simply an offence as it is now, or do you make it as it used to be, a condition of the validity of the marriage, so that if the people are married without the consent of their parents, it is no marriage at all? Which do you recommend?—I cannot say. The circumstances of the case would have to be left to the Court to determine, possibly.

36,243. I do not think you have much view about that?—I have no legal training. I have not considered that point.

36,244. With regard to the increase of the age of marriage, for which there is a great deal to be said, and I am not at all combating your view, the difficulty is this, which was put to you by the Chairman. If you increase the legal age of marriage and there is a relation formed between a lad and a girl under that age, will you not be very largely increasing the number of illegitimate children in the world?—I think not.

36,245. I daresay you are familiar with the country, and you know most sadly that the commonest case of all in the country is that a marriage does not take place till a baby is coming. It is a very sad but a very common case?—Yes.

36,246. In a very large number of those cases where now marriage takes places, and although it is regrettable, the family may go on respectably, that child that is coming would be branded as illegitimate necessarily because the parties would not be capable of marriage, according to your view. Have you considered that?—It is a question to me whether they are better off, either the children or the parents, by the mere fact of marriage. They are young persons of immature judgment and unable to provide for a family.

36,247. I presume you regard the increase of illegitimate children as a bad thing. It is better that children should be legitimate rather than illegitimate, if it can be managed?—Yes, distinctly.

36,248. Do you not think if the law were altered in the way you suggest, one result apparently must be to greatly increase the number of illegitimate children in the world?—It may do, but I should consider that the question of marriage is not the paramount consideration. In some of these Police Court marriages, marriages are made between people which are clearly undesirable marriages from the medical point of view. Marriage is in that case made the paramount consideration. The thing that should dominate it from my point of view is the production of healthy children.

36,249. The case I am putting is unfortunately a very common one. You are not preventing children being born into the world, but you are preventing their being born in a state of legitimacy?—Possibly so.

36,250. (Chairman.) Regarding your general position as one in which the two parties to a marriage are not alone concerned, the State is concerned in the interests of the children and in the interests of the general morality of the country. I take that to be your standpoint?—That is so.

36,251. You think the State ought to take more steps than it does to ensure healthy progeny and a higher state of morality. That is what it comes to?—Yes.

36,252. You have referred to a practice in America. I have been informed by one of the American lawyers or by one of the books that it is a law, but can you tell us whether it is actually put into practice?—I have not the facts with me, but I have a communication from a correspondent in America, and it gives statistics of the number of people on whom this operation has been carried out at present.

36,253. Have you got that?—I can produce it. I have not it with me.

36,254. Could you send a copy to us?—Yes.*

* The Sterilization of Degenerate Criminals.

By TOM A. WILLIAMS, M.B., C.M., Edin., Washington, D.C.

Civilisation has interfered with natural selection to an extent which has brought an acute realisation of the danger of conditions under which the propagation of the unfit far exceeds that of those who are physically, intellectually, and morally of most advantage to the community. The parasites 36,255. It is one thing to have a law and another thing to see that law is put into operation, because it would be discretionary with a doctor apparently. I should like to know how far that has been in actual operation.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) Will you ask whether the cases he is thinking of are cases where it is voluntarily done or done in pursuance of an Order of the Court?

36,256. (Chairman.) You are taking your information entirely from a communication?—Yes.

36,257. Are you willing to send us the communication?—Yes.

36,258. That will tell us all you know yourself. With regard to the statement in your proof that there should be a ground in the case of incurable syphilis or any other incurable disease, I gather you propose that in cases where the disease has resisted treatment for two years and its duration is indefinite?—That is so.

36,259. Although it has resisted treatment for two years, if you saw a prospect of complete cure in another six months, you would hardly make that proposition then?—No. That would be provided for.

56,260. The point is, disease which has lasted for some time and has proved not amenable to treatment and with a reasonable probability that it will not be. That is the position?—That is it exactly.

36,261. We all thank you very much for your evidence?—I must thank you for the very careful hearing you have given me. I am afraid I have gone somewhat beyond my proof.

Dr. Louis Parkes called and examined.

36,262. (Chairman.) You are an M.D.?—Yes.

36,263. What does D.P.H. mean?—Diploma in Public Health.

36,264. And medical officer of health for the metropolitan borough of Chelsea?—Yes.

36,265. You have been asked to give your evidence on points with which you are familiar?—Yes.

36,266. How long have you been a metropolitan medical officer?—Nearly 20 years.

36,267. What does the borough of Chelsea include?—It is one of the smaller boroughs between Fulham and Kensington, with a population of about 75,000.

36,268. I will ask you to read some of your proof. You say in considering the subject of the amendment of the laws of divorce it is desirable that the whole field of the marital relations of the community at large should come under review?—Yes.

36,270. Living apparently in wedlock, but not actually so?—Yes. "The number of illegitimate births annually is not, I believe, stated with any approach to accuracy in the returns of the Registrar-General. So far as my own local returns are concerned, I am only able to class as 'illegitimate' those children who are born in the workhouse and in lying-in institutions, whose mothers are unable or unwilling to designate the name of the father. These children are probably, in the great majority of instances, the results of chance acts of intercourse—often occurring on bank holidays; but I have no information as to the numbers of children born out of wedlock, whose fathers and mothers are living together as man and wife and bringing up families of children with homes of their own." One frequently sees a number of births returned within about nine months after the bank holidays. That has struck me for some years. "The death-rate amongst the known illegitimate children—that is to say, amongst those born in the workhouses as the results of chance acts of sexual intercourse—is very much higher than amongst the children who are commonly regarded as the fruits of lawful union. Probably the average death-rate of those 'illegitimates' in infancy, i.e., under the age of one year, is from two to three times that of the rest of the infant community; and this is what is commonly spoken of as the 'illegitimate rate of infantile mortality.' But it is evident that, as above stated, there are two kinds of illegitimate union, namely, (1) the living together of couples, who are to all intents and purposes performing a social act in living together and bringing up families in home surroundings, and (2) those anti-social acts of isolated or chance intercourse which cause so much social misery, and which bring into the world children who are destined to die in infancy at from two to three times a greater rate than the children whose parents have a home." With regard to the number of births, it is probably very much the same all over London. In Chelsea there are about 75 to 100 births of illegimate children where the names of the fathers are not stated. With regard to the children born in irregular unions, one has no knowledge, and I do not see how you could obtain it.

who prey upon society are a tremendous drain upon economic resources which are becoming less and less sufficient to the needs of modern life. Utopians have long advocated the artificial elimination of the proved unfit; but they have always been met not only by the sentiment of humanitarianism, but with the shortcomings of present criteria for determining elimination. The blame for this rests largely upon the school of Lombroso, whose error that genius was a form of degeneracy has powerfully influenced sociological thought. More accurate inductions have, however, exploded a good many of Lombroso's hasty generalisations, of which this is not the least conspicuous. Even practical politicians have become aware of this; and in the less conservative societies psychiatrists have succeeded in inducing legislation for preventing at least the propagation of the hereditary criminal.

In the State of Indiana 500 vasectomies of criminals have been performed since the compulsory law of 1907, and the success of the measure rests not only upon its social prophylactic value, but it has had an extraordinary effect upon the criminals themselves. It has been the rule that a morose, sullen, suspicious, erotic degenerate becomes after operation a sunny, bright, natural human being. Not only so, but Dr. Sharp of the Indiana penitentiary declares "that many "boys have come to me and urged me to fix them as I had "fixed some friend or associate of theirs. Masturbators "have asked for castration, which I refuse, but substitute "vaseotomy, which cures many cases." Now similar laws have been passed in Utah, California, and Connecticut, and are being considered in New Jersey, Texas, and Minnesota.

At the meeting of the Tri-State Medical Association at Richmond in February 1910 a unanimous resolution was sent to the Virginia legislature then in Session to endorse a Bill then before it, making it compulsory for each institution which cares for criminals, idiots, and imbeciles to add to their staff a skilled surgeon, an alienist, and the secretary of the State Board of Charity and Direction, who shall examine, with a view to sterilization, those inmates recommended by the physicians and managers of such an institution.

Dr. Carrington, who is largely responsible for the measure, believes that eventually the procedure will be legally extended to perverts, the feeble-minded, and other defectives, even although not criminals; for his observations show that when the patients observe the absence of ill-effects, and indeed an improvement of health, they are content to forego procreation.

Although of negative aspect, as regards eugenics, these prophylaxes cannot but accustom people's minds to the necessary positive point of view that for the improvement of the human race selection is required as well as elimination, and that the economic and social artificialites which interfere with this must be abolished wherever a nation desires to survive in what has now become an intense struggle for existence. The New England family of Edwards is a striking illustration. Descended from strong, religious ancestors, 1,334 were traced through five generations. Of these, 295 were college graduates, 13 college presidents, 65 professors, 60 doctors, 100 missionaries and clergymen, 75 officers of navy, 60 prominent authors, over 100 noted lawyers, 31 judges, 80 held public offices, 3 United States senators, 15 railway presidents, several state governors, members of congress, mayors of cities, ambassadors, vice-president, and not one single convict. What a contrast with the well-known Jukes family.

36,271. You know, from what you have said, that there are a considerable number?—One hears about them, or one hears from the inspectors, and what one meets. One comes across them in a chance way, and one knows that there must be a considerable number. "So far as the visits and practical experience of lady health visitors—whether municipal or of voluntary health societies—enable us to judge, there seems to be but little evidence that the children born out of wedlock in regular homes of the parents' making are subject to a higher rate of mortality than the children of similar classes of the community whose parents have been lawfully married. Nor is there, I think, any evidence that the home life of the children of such irregular unions is worse than that of the children of lawfully married couples of the same class in the social scale. So far as I have been able to judge the principal causes of the neglect of the home, of the defective rearing of children, and of all the after effects which arise from parental sloth, neglect, and irresponsibility, may be summarised as due to one or other or a combination of the following conditions:—1. Early or improvident marriages. 2. Casual labour and unemployment, due to want of training, character, or skill, or to incapacitating illness (often tuberculosis). 3. Large families and inadequate earnings. 4. Alcoholic excesses on the part of one or of both parents. No one can say which is the most important of these causes. They very often act in combination, one condition leading to the other, until the parents become hopelessly degenerate, and quite unfit to have the responsibilities of home life and the rearing of children. I do not know of any evidence that the solemnisation of marriage according to law has any effect amongst the poorer classes of the community in keeping the married couples more self-respecting, more inclined to bring up a young family in decency and comfort, and rendering them less open to unfaithfulness and desertion than the simple consent to live together as man and wife without legal contract, provided the couples contrasted are of the same social standing, have had equally good training in youth, and are equally free from anti-social habits. But on such matters as these the clergy of all denominations and district visitors are more competent to form an opinion than I am. No doubt the fact that a man and woman are prepared to take upon themselves the responsibilities of a legal marriage contract is evidence of a higher view of personal conduct than where the couple live together with no legal sanction; but on the other hand the question of marriage and a legal tie is probably largely one of custom and sentiment amongst the working classes, and it is doubtful how far the view of the proper fulfilment of the duties of citizenship enters into the question at all amongst the lower social strata."

36,272. Can you tell me why these irregular unions of which you speak as practically giving a fairly respectable home, should be formed in that way without the legal tie?—I think there are various reasons. In some cases they are formed between men and women who have been already married and have left each other. That accounts for the large majority, I think. They are not usually formed at the outset. The young people generally get married and find they do not get on together, and for some reason or another they part, the woman takes up with some other man and the man with some other woman.

36,273. Has that come across your experience extensively?—No, only now and then. I should imagine that would be the cause of it. "If, then, there is little objection from the public health point of view of the larger aspects of citizenship and national life, to those irregular unions amongst the working classes where the families are brought up in the social surroundings proper to the circumstances of the parents, it follows that there can be no objection on similar grounds to those modifications of the laws of divorce, which will enable the poorest to secure a severance of unions that are sources of misery in home life and that are failures or calamities, so far as the rearing and education of future citizens is concerned. The State is enormously interested in the home life of the children, which is a more valuable training ground for the future useful citizen than any school. The State, then, should interpose no obstacles in the way of remedying the social evils of a home which is one only in name, and which is degrading the characters and habits of the children who are being reared there. In many instances the only remedy for a really vicious home is to render it possible for the least erring party to the union to obtain a dissolution of the marriage. In these cases more consideration should be given to the future prospects of the children of the marriage than to the personal interests of the parents. In my opinion the same sins of omission or commission which justify divorce for the one sex should also apply to the other, so that the two parties to the marriage contract are placed on the same level of equality. There is also, I think, no question that divorce should be obtainable for incurable insanity of either party, when such insanity necessitates detention for life in an asylum." With regard to insanity, I think you have had evidence on that point from medical witnesses, and I do not wish to go into it. I am not an alienist or an expert on questions of insanity. "I do not think that amongst the wage-earning classes greater facilities for divorce will necessarily have any effect in weakening home ties or lowering the moral standard of these classes. The greater facilities that could be afforded for escaping from unions that are social failures would, I think, tend to strengthen the sentiment amongst working people that a legally binding marriage is the proper course of action, and a duty to the nation they belong to. So long as the practical inability to escape from lives of frightful misery is so constantly kept in view of the poorer classes of the community, so long will there be a feeling that the risks of the binding legal contract are greater than they should be called upon to encounter as law-abiding citizens."

36,274. Can you give us the grounds which have led you to form those last expressed opinions about the facilities of divorce?—They are formed from my visits to the homes of the poor, and seeing the life they lead, and the wretched conditions of the homes in many instances, and knowing what these people feel about the subject of marriage themselves. I cannot give you any particular instances, because in the course of 20 years one forgets so many things. In some ways my opinion has been formed from asking the inspectors and health visitors.

36,275. It has produced in your mind definite views from long experience?—Yes.

36,276. Your definite view is that facilities for divorce would not necessarily have any effect in weakening home ties?—I do not think it would have any effect—I believe rather the other way, that it would tend to make people form regular rather than irregular unions.

36,277. If the necessity of the case demands it, the feeling they might have freedom?—Yes.

36,278. Do you think that has any tendency to increase irregular unions?—Yes. Poor people never get divorce; they have not the means; and yet the men and women leave each other and want to form other unions. It is quite natural that they should.

36,279. (Mr. Brierley.) Have you in your intercourse with the people who are living in irregular unions found that the explanation given to you for living in that condition was that they have not been able to get a divorce?—No. It is a general opinion only.

36,280. You do not recollect cases where the parties have given that explanation?—No, I cannot recollect any now. It is more a general opinion.

36,281. You express your general experience?—Yes.

36,282. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I gather you approach the question of divorce through the question of marriage really. You look at marriage first and then at what is the importance of marriage, and against that what is the importance of the dissolution of marriage?—Yes.

36,283. Your experience has been that marriage itself, from the public health point of view, is not of such great importance as the formation of a union between two parties living together respectably?—Yes, and the point of view of a proper home suitable to the surroundings and the social circumstances of the couple.

36,284. Where that is the case you have found the children growing up quite as well as if there had been a marriage?—I think so, and I do not think in that class they are under any disability in future life. They are not known to be illegitimate and it is not brought up against them. They have no property to succeed to. It does not affect that class.

36,285. You do not think the existence of any unauthorised union of that kind has any bad effect on the feelings of self-respect of either the parents or the children?—I think the married people generally have more self-respect, but these are unfortunately people who are forced into these irregular unions, and they have no way out of them. I do not think they lose their self-respect for that reason. They are often steady hardworking people.

36,286. In fact I think you say from the larger aspects of citizenship and national life there is nothing much to be said in favour of marriage that cannot also be said in favour of these irregular unions?—Yes, amongst the lower classes, I think.

36,287. That being so, it follows, I suppose, as a matter of course, that the dissolution of marriage or divorce is largely a question of expediency?—Expediency, having regard to the interests of the children, especially the young people.

36,288. You do not directly deal with the case of incompatibility; you speak of social failures in marriage, but I suppose you would be of opinion that where two parties were living, shall we say, a cat and dog life, irrevocably and incurably, it would be a good thing that they should be divorced?—Especially if it was having a bad effect on the children.

36,289. It could not but have that?—It must be so.

36,290. Irrespective of any matrimonial offence committed by either party?—I think living a cat and dog life is as much an offence to marital relations as anything you can think of.

36,291. It shows an entire lack of love, which is one of the binding terms of the contract?—Yes.

36,292. In these irregular households you have found so many of, where the parties are not married because they have separated from their lawful spouses, would those be often cases of this sort where the former union was a social failure?—I could not say that. I expect it is so, but people do not separate for no reason at all. They separate because they do not get on.

36,293. But not necessarily because there had been some offence?—It might be the woman had been led astray.

36,294. Or it might not?—One could not say.

36,295. (Mrs. Tennant.) The fact that those two persons had married in the first instance shows they would probably consider the legitimacy of their children?—Amongst the class I am speaking of I do not know that they look very far ahead. They look at marriage as something to be taken up and they do not consider the consequences very often—amongst the very poorest class of people. I think it is largely a question of sentiment and custom with them. If it had been the custom not to get married they would continue. As it has been the custom they go on with it.

36,296. There is some diversity of custom: some in the first instance do marry, and some in the first instance have an irregular union?—I do not think there are many among the poorer classes. The irregular unions take place when they are older.

36,297. I wish to know whether you have had experience of any feeling among those who have been married as to the illegitimacy of the children of their irregular unions?—I do not think that troubles them very much. It does not affect them. The children have all the advantages of everybody else. The children of irregular unions go to school and are put out into the world, and they are under no disadvantage or disability I am aware of.

36,298. No feeling between themselves and their parents. Do you not think the children have some feeling?—I do not think the children know anything about it.

36,299. They sometimes learn?—They might possibly learn, but in the majority of cases they do not know anything about it, I should say.

36,300. Nothing of that kind has been within your experience?—No.

36,301. (Sir Frederick Treves.) From the point of view of a medical officer of health, you greatly deplore the very high death-rate amongst those illegitimate children, the progeny of casual intercourse?—There is no doubt it is enormous. One does not know how high it is, for the reason that so many of the children come into a district, and before a few months old they go somewhere else. They are moved from one place to another; either the mothers take them or they are boarded out. They cannot be traced. They do not stop in one place long.

36,302. Do you think this deplorable death-rate could be influenced by facilities for divorce, for example?—I should think it is rather doubtful.

36,303. You almost look upon it as beyond a remedy?—These particular kinds of union are not affected by the marriage or divorce laws. They are simply to do with human nature, and nothing else.

36,304. From your experience you see no means of relieving it?—No, I do not think so.

36,305. With regard to insanity, you think that it should be a ground of divorce, and you simply use the word "incurable"; you do not go into details?—No; I am not competent to discuss the subject. I think you have had evidence very fully given before you.

36,306. There is one matter upon which you can be of great assistance, and that is this. You have had years of experience of notifiable diseases. Would you make syphilis a notifiable disease?—I am very doubtful about it. I have not considered the subject in all its bearings. I think it is a very questionable procedure altogether.

36,307. Would you make syphilis a ground for divorce?——

(Chairman.) Acquired after marriage.

36,308. (Sir Frederick Treves.) Of course?—I suppose it is now, as a matter of fact. Is it not legal cruelty if a man becomes diseased and imparts disease to his wife? It is a ground for divorce.

36,309. (Chairman.) Not technically, but practically?—Practically if a man infects his wife is it not legal cruelty for which a divorce can be obtained?

(Chaiman.) That is another point.

36,310. (Sir Frederick Treves.) Taking syphilis per se, disregarding the source of it or any point about it, thinking only of the children, as many have, would you make syphilis a ground for divorce?—I think it is very doubtful. What we are getting to know about syphilis and its treatment would render it still more doubtful. If syphilis is curable, as it appears to be, and easily curable, there would be no ground for making it a ground for divorce.

36,311. The probability is that it may now rank as a curable disease?—It will soon rank as a curable disease, and the question will hardly arise.

36,312. From your experience you cannot indicate any means of lessening the number of these irregular unions. Do you think facilities for divorce would help it?—Yes. If there were greater facilities for divorce amongst the poor, they would avail themselves of them and there would not be these irregular unions; but I do not see any great harm in them under present conditions. It is better that people living together as man and wife should have a proper legal contract sanctioned by the State.

36,313. From a public health point of view?—From a public health point of view, with people of this class I do not think it makes much difference.

36,314. (Sir George White.) You speak of 75 to 100 births of illegitimate children in Chelsea whose parents are not known. That is the total number of births of such children per year?—Yes.

36,315. Could you tell the Commission how that would effect the percentage of deaths under one year of age? You say the percentage of deaths amongst the children is very excessive?—It does not affect it very largely. Supposing there are 100 of these births which take place mostly in the workhouse with unmarried women, and 25 per cent. of those die in the course of the year, the total number of births for the whole borough is 1,400, so that it does not affect the death rate largely.

36,316. It does not seriously affect infant mortality?—Of course, I am speaking of known ones, and they form only 5 or 6 per cent. of the total births, and it is the same for London generally.

36,317. You told the Chairman you had no means of judging of the number of these irregular unions?—I do not think anyone knows how many there are.

36,318. Have you come across cases where in a given court or short street it was known the irregular unions were larger than the regular unions?—I could not say that.

36,319. Not as excessive as that?—I am sure they are very common, and much commoner than people think.

36,320. Have you found generally any consciousness of wrongdoing in so living amongst these people?—They do not like to talk about it, and they do not like their neighbours to know. To that extent they are conscious of ill-doing, but I do not think otherwise: they do not regard it as a very serious offence.

36,321. In the larger number of cases it is not known by their neighbours?—I should think so. It is only now and again, really.

36,322. The children themselves are generally unaware of it. They are treated as married people by everybody around them, and the children as legitimate offspring?—I do not think it makes any difference. It is not like people of our class. When they go to school a thing of that sort getting known would be fatal to a child's career. It does not affect people of that class; they do not regard it as anything extraordinary.

36,323. Can you say to what extent this is limited by the social position of the people?—Is it or is it not confined mainly to what we know as casual labourers, the very lowest social scale?—It is limited more or less to the lower class of wage-earners, people earning under 30*s.* a week. That would be most common, but I daresay there is a certain amount of it among the artizan class too.

36,324. Is not the marriage tie regarded as of importance amongst what you may call the general run of artizans?—Yes, I think it is. The higher you get in the scale the more the marriage tie is regarded as being necessary.

36,325. Your attention as medical officer would be largely devoted to the conditions of quite the lowest class?—Yes, the very poor. Those are the people we come into contact with.

36,326. You would not have knowledge of the better class of artizans?—No, mostly with the very poor.

36,327. (Mr. Spender.) We have had a considerable conflict of opinion as to the effect on children of illegitimacy. A good many witnesses, especially from the North of England, have repeated to us that a child being born out of wedlock is a real stigma even in the class you speak of. You do not agree with that?—It may be different in a northern town. London is so huge and people are moving about so much that little is known about people living in the same street, and they do not trouble about it. It may be different in a northern town where they work in factories, and so on. It does not apply in London.

36,328. It is true in London the term "bastard" would be a term of reproach to a child?—Yes, it is, but I do not think it ever would be applied in that way.

36,329. The point I am trying to get at is this: is it not rather that in London the thing is not known than that it is not a disadvantage?—No, I do not think people trouble themselves so much. The working classes are so shifting and migratory in London. The average stay in one place is very often less than a year, so that they are hardly known by their neighbours when they are off somewhere else.

36,330. That is the point I was making: in London the thing is so unknown that it passes muster. I was trying to take the point in regard to what you said to Sir Lewis Dibdin. You would not say it was not an advantage to be able to get married?—I think it is a great advantage that they should be married and should enter into marriage with a proper legal tie. It is an advantage to the children.

36,331. You are of opinion that it should be brought reasonably within their reach?—That is the whole point of my evidence, that it should be made easier for them.

36,332. With regard to the illegitimates, you say "those born in the workhouse." Would you explain a little more? Is that the excessive death-rate? Do you mean to confine that to the illegitimates born in the workhouse?—Practically all the illegitimate children known are born in workhouses or institutions. They are hardly ever born in the houses where the girls live. When they find themselves near the confinement they apply for admission to the workhouse and are confined. They remain a fortnight and leave with their babies.

36,333. This is not a death-rate founded on the workhouse population?—No, the deaths do not occur in the workhouse: they occur in the 11 months subsequent to leaving the workhouse.

36,334. You have no precise way of tracing them, but that is a figure you give as within the mark?—All those born in the workhouse are traced, and if they reside in the borough of Chelsea they are visited, and the lady health visitor keeps in touch with them; but in many instances they move, and at least half of them are not to be traced at the end of a year. They are lost sight of.

36,335. Would your department—to get at the machinery of this thing—be notified by the workhouse Poor Law authorities of the children born in the infirmary that had gone out of the workhouse?—Yes.

36,336. You would ascertain the addresses?—Yes.

36,337. And get the lady health visitor to visit?—She visits them and follows them up as far as she can, and keeps in touch with them for a year, but about half leave the district and go elsewhere, and she gradually loses touch.

36,338. Have you any machinery for tracing ordinary affiliation cases out of the police court?—No.

36,339. Do you take action, or only the Poor Law cases?—Yes.

36,340. Only those that have been Poor Law cases?—Yes.

Dr. SAMSON GEORGE HAYCOCK MOORE called and examined.

36,341. You are a doctor of medicine?—Yes.

36,342. Your paper, which you have been good enough to prepare, has a list of your offices. May I read it. You are Medical Officer of Health for Huddersfield?—Yes.

36,343. What is the population?—100,000.

36,344. You are Chief School Medical Officer, Medical Superintendent of Hospitals, Inspector of Midwives, for the county borough of Huddersfield?—The foregoing refer to Huddersfield.

36,345. You are also Membre du Conseil, l'union International pour la protection de l'enfance du premier age, President of the Yorkshire Branch of the Society of Medical Officers of Health, Fellow of the Royal Society of Medicine. I think that is quite enough to give you a certificate of competency. You have held your present position for nine years?—Yes.

36,346. Formerly you were Assistant Medical Officer in the port of Liverpool for eight years?—Yes.

36,347. Have you also had experience of lunacy work in a large county asylum Rainhill, Lancashire, of Poor Law Medical Practice in a large Union Infirmary, Leeds, worked in public dispensaries in Liverpool, and held resident appointments in general hospitals, and have had experience of private practice?—Yes.

36,348. This is the point. Have you been brought intimately into contact with the lives of the people from many different medical standpoints, and in particular have you been engaged in special work in a systematic attempt to limit mortality among infants?—Yes.

36,349. In Huddersfield what staff have you under you?—I have in all five duly qualified and registered medical assistants. I have two nurses and half a dozen male inspectors, and a staff of clerks.

36,350. Have you female inspectors too?—No; the work which is done in some localities by female inspectors is discharged in Huddersfield partly by two women doctors and partly by a large voluntary association of ladies.

36,351. From all these various sources in addition to your own contact with these matters, you have gained experience?—Yes.

36,352. Will you kindly take your paper and read it?—Yes. "The considerations which I respectfully desire to lay before His Majesty's Commissioners on Divorce and Matrimonial Causes bear upon the influences upon infants and children of the separation of husbands and wives without divorce and the consequent non-legal sexual unions which arise and which, in the absence of a much greater and more powerful moral sense among the people, must continue to arise. In Huddersfield, I have, on my staff, two lady doctors, who visit every home—with very few exceptions—where a birth occurs, and I have helped to organise, and work in intimate association with, a voluntary body of ladies who visit the homes of the people where infants are born, regularly at longer or shorter intervals for the first year of life and later. It is partly from their reports that I have gained my present insight into this matter. Among the poorer classes the restraints of society are less felt and the common needs of life are more urgent and imperative, so that when, for any reason, the husband or the wife separates the one from the other, leaving children behind, the absence of the former condition and the presence of the latter tend to the formation of unions which are neither recognised by law nor sanctified by the Church. A very long list of examples might be cited with, perhaps, variation as to detail, though the essentials appear to be identical in all the cases. For example:—

"(1) A gas stoker, R. E., having three children by his wife, drunken, unfaithful, and cruel; his wife left him seven years ago; she is now living with G. P.; there are two children of this irregular union; the home is clean, the children are well cared for, but they are bastards (I use this word deliberately in the attempt to convey, with full force, the horrible disability under which they must labour, all their lives)."

"(2) R. C., a tram driver; his wife now living a life of ill repute in Leeds, he has formed a union with G. W., there are three children; they are fine children, well cared for and their father and mother live happily together, yet they, though innocent, are bastards."

"(3) H. S., mill-hand, an alcoholic lunatic, detained in an asylum several times; when he comes out he is a terror (please accept the word in its literal sense); he is a terror to his family, but three of the children are at wage-earning ages; no illicit union has been formed."

"(4) R., a gardener; wife a lunatic, has been in an asylum for a dozen years; this man has relations who have helped and restrained him but he has recently formed an irregular association with a woman, who was, first of all, his housekeeper. The arguments, with which he defends his action, may not be logical or they may, but they are, at least, forceful, and, in effect, satisfy his neighbours.

"(5) M. B., after having one child by her husband which died shortly after birth, was compelled to leave him and commence working again for herself on account of his drunken habits and his cruel and immoral conduct. After a while she formed a union with another man. The first child was still-born, the second is living. These facts indicate, at least are suggestive, that she contracted a loathsome disease from her husband."

"Similar cases could be adduced almost without end. It is an obvious conclusion that many do not become known. But there is another class of case. Some years ago, during the prevalance of small-pox, I was called to examine a woman. She was not young and has a grown-up family. She was suffering from syphilis, and the disease had so far progressed in her husband, from whom she had contracted it, that he had been removed to the Workhouse Hospital. In my judgment this woman was entitled to a divorce. She had suffered the foulest wrong at the hands of her husband and the father of her children which it is possible to conceive a woman suffering from. I am aware that does in practice afford grounds for a divorce."

36,353. Because it is proof of adultery?—On the one hand it is proof of adultery, and on the other hand it is constructive cruelty. The point of this case which I desire to direct your attention to is that the rich have that advantage. A woman having at her disposal sufficient means to-day already can secure some redress, but it is altogether out of the reach of the poor, and I take it that both in the interest of the State, of the people and of the children, and as a mere act of justice, some means ought to be taken to bring the end within the reach of the poor.

36,354. Is that your own individual view, or do you think that represents Huddersfield?—That is merely my opinion.

36,355. Have you had any discussions about it in the city?—I have not. The fact which I desire to bring into prominence is the wrong and hardship which is inflicted upon the innocent offspring of these unions. I am not influenced particularly or especially by the evil, the injury and the injustice which one or other of the parties to the original marriage suffers. It may well be that in the great majority of instances the blame is not all on one side, but I am very strongly of opinion that the case of the children calls for redress. The circumstances are commonly known among the neighbours, and that they are what they are cannot be concealed from the children. Sooner or later, as the result of a quarrel or of jealousy, the most opprobrious epithet in our language is hurled at them, and the result is and here is the point of greatest importance in my judgment—the immediate and complete destruction—the irrevocable destruction—of their self-respect, and it is a character of far greater sternness than is to be expected of such individuals which can survive this handicap in life, which can fight successfully against the overwhelming sense of shame which is theirs.

36,356. Did you hear the evidence of the last witness as to London?—Yes.

36,357. Do you think there is a different view in the North?—Undoubtedly. I have no doubt whatever about that. I know that there is.

36,358. There is a stronger feeling of the sense of the union and of shame in irregular unions?—Undoubtedly. Of course, I know nothing about Chelsea or the manners and customs and habits of the people.

36,359. The North is a very strong country. We know that, you may take it?—I am able to affirm, as the result of a long and intimate working among the people, that they are at least as sensitive to shame as any other class in our social organisation. They may not feel the shame for the same things, but the sense is there as much as with anybody else. It is a simple truth that rather than undergo the shame of accepting "Parish Relief" they will suffer the extremes of cold, the pangs of hunger, and will even endure starvation to the point of death rather than suffer the shame which, in their minds, attaches to contact with the "Parish."

36,360. I would like to ask you upon a point which has suggested itself to me. There has been a great deal of evidence about pauper proceedings?—Yes.

36,361. Would your view as to the shame that might be felt extend to proceedings in forma pauperis? Suppose the only means of getting relief was by in forma pauperis proceedings; if courts were provided locally at which they could get it without pauperising themselves, do you think that would meet more favour than if left to sue in forma pauperis?—Yes, it would, but I desire to submit this: It is the present machinery of the poor law which is held in abhorrence by the poor people. I have charge of a comparatively large isolation hospital, and I find that poor people willingly and readily avail themselves of it without making any payment, and absolutely without any sense of shame.

36,362. What class of hospital is that?—An infectious diseases hospital. I take it by parity of reasoning one may assume that there would be no reluctance on the part of poor people to avail themselves of gratuitous services in this direction, provided it was not associated with the present machinery of the Poor Law. I desire to add that I am not ignorant of and do not leave out of account the bearing which this has on religion. I am a member of the Church of England and I know it to be the case, that not for many many generations, if indeed at all, in the evolution of mankind, may we hope to maintain morality without the aid of religion, without, in simple, the hope of Heaven and the fear of Hell, but I know it to be the case that the attitude of ecclesiastical authorities in these matters, as expressed by the opinions current in what are termed Church circles—I desire to say that in this term "Church circles" I comprise all denominations—with the approval of the ministers of the Church, is detrimental to morality and religion. I desire here to separate morality from religion. It is detrimental alike to the ordinary morality of the people, and it is detrimental to religion in the selfish sense of the word, to the Churches. Because all circumstances connected with these unions are known in the neighbourhood among the people the difficulties of the man abandoned by an unfaithful wife and left with children to bring up on an income of, perhaps, 23*s.* per week are quite clearly understood by his neighbours, and if the minister in the locality remains aloof and blames and finds fault, as he is bound to do as opinions are at present, it is just so much the worse for him and for the religion which he professes in the minds of the peeple.

36,363. I do not understand how you work that out?—The punctuation is not very good. The point I wish to make is this. I am speaking not of London, but of smaller towns. In all localities there are Established Churches. The social life of the people is carried on in more or less direct relationship with these churches. In the Church circles it is imperative at present that these irregular unions should be condemned, but the neighbours of these people, knowing the circumstances, as in the instance which I cite where a woman abandons her husband and her children and leads a profligate life in Leeds, recognise the impossibility of that man paying a housekeeper a reasonable salary such as will secure for him reasonably adequate services, and knowing that he is perhaps not compelled, but circumstances lead him almost inevitably to the formation of an illicit union, they condone it. If the Church does not condone it, and all the people do condone it, not as it should be but as it is, not morally and ethically, but as a matter of fact, that is all the worse for the Church.

36,364. Your view would be that if there could be freedom acquired by opportunities of divorce, the union would be regularised?—Yes, that is the point. At present divorce relief is inaccessible. Take the case of a man who has, as is the case in Huddersfield, 23*s.*, 24*s.*, 25*s.*, or 30*s.* a week, and three children to clothe and feed, 50*l.* or 60*l.* or 70*l.* or 80*l.* a year. He cannot get relief, and his friends and relations are in the same station of life and cannot provide him with it. It seems a funny thing, but if a man dies in these localities, and leaves what is to many people an inconsiderable sum of 40*l.* or 50*l.*, they speak of it as a fortune. My point is in the interests of the children particularly, that there should be divorce so that these unions can be regularised, and it is worth the while of the State to make it accessible to these people.

36,365. You would regard that as having a tendency to increase the standard of morality?—That is what I aim at.

36,366. Which at present is overlooked, because the hardship of the case is too great, and the theory of the Church is not acceded to?—That is the position. The people know the facts and the circumstances and the weight of moral sense of spiritual authority is quite helpless in the face of that knowledge. The Church condemns, but it is the Church which suffers by the condemnation not the objects thereof. It would be far better for the people, and it would be far better for the Church. I hope it is clear I refer to all religious bodies.

36,367. Yes?—If the tenets of religion could be adjusted to the conditions in which the people live. I know that this is very like saying that the laws of God must be adjusted to the needs of man and I, perhaps, have pursued the subject in this aspect even too far, but I could adduce concrete examples where apparently the explicit commandments of God are adjusted, or have been, to the needs of man, and, after all, if the interpretations of divine commands made by human beings result in the alienation of the people from religion and God, as appears to be the case in these matters now under consideration, men and women will drift to perdition and the Church will decay.

36,368. We may take it you would like to see both brought into line?—Yes.

36,369. The needs of the people recognised so as to meet the difficulties you have presented, and not upsetting any principle of religion?—Yes.

36,370. Would you give a concrete example of what you refer to? You say you can adduce other examples?—They are so frequent. We run trains on Sundays and trams on Sundays. Perhaps this is an example which is more telling, not because really it is more telling, but because the other examples are not so familiar to us here. I lived not very far from a Bishop not many years ago, and on Sunday morning his Lordship was proceeding apparently to preach somewhere. His carriage with two horses and two men and a maid servant was waiting for him just as I passed the front of his palace; he came out and entered his carriage, and I stood till he had done so. I was overtaken by a varsity coach, and an avowed atheist, who proceeded to jeer at the regard which his Lordship had for the commandment which prohibits work on Sunday. I am not joining in the condemnation: I only adduce that as an example of where the explicit divine commands are adjusted to the needs of men.

36,371. You are indicating a general view that a broad principle needs some modification to meet the necessities of the case?—That is so.

36,372. (Mr. Spender.) The population of Huddersfield is about 100,000?—Yes.

36,373. That means that the kind of people you are speaking of are pretty well known to each other?—Yes.

36,374. They do not move about as they do in London?—That is so.

36,375. That is what the last witness has explained to us. Your view is that where they know each other and the scandal of these irregular unions becomes known, it is not always condemned, but regarded as a severe handicap. It may or may not be condemned in particular circumstances, but it is recognised by all parties, and the parties to the union, as a handicap and a stigma?—My submission is that the adults do not suffer very much, and in any case may be allowed to look after themselves for the moment, but that the children are inevitably branded as shameful things, and I say that no human being ought, if we can possibly help it, to be subject to such a stigma.

36,376. You would say from your experience of the North of England that for a child to be born out of wedlock is, in the working class as in other classes, a real disability?—I do.

36,377. You have had great experience of infantile mortality. Perhaps you could tell us more of the infantile death rate among illegitimates. Is it your experience that the children are less well cared for among the irregular unions?—The death rate generally among illegitimate children is at least double what it is among legitimate children. It may be the case, and undoubtedly it is the case, that in many irregular unions a proper home is maintained and the infants do not suffer, but there are a large number of other instances where, on the occurrence of a disagreement—a row—the man or the woman leaves the other, and then the children do suffer. I have no exact figures. I cannot give you the rates.

36,378. As a rough impression would you draw the same distinction Dr. Parkes has drawn between the children of chance intercourse born in the workhouse who are difficult to trace afterwards, and the children of these irregular unions where there is a home provided for them?—Yes, undoubtedly. I do not make the distinction absolute. Every child born illegitimate has an immeasurably less chance of surviving, even from the merely physical point of view as an animal, than a child born legitimately.

36,379. Even in the best illegitimate home?—Yes, that is my impression.

36,380. Can you tell us why? Is it because in that home there is less care which goes with the character which is less careful?—No, not necessarily. I would like to put it this way. Medical Officers rather deal with figures in bulk than with individual instances. I recognise the correctness of the views expressed by the Medical Officer of Health for Chelsea, that in many homes although the parents are not married the children are well cared for, but I believe the children born even in such unions out of wedlock have an immeasurably less chance of surviving, and when I say "an immeasurably less chance of surviving" I mean this, that if you were to establish an infant mortality figure for legitimate children, and an infant mortality figure for illegitimate children born in these irregular unions where the parents are living together, you would find that the latter figure was greater than the former.

36,381. In regard to your last paragraphs, would you extend the grounds of divorce as well as cheapen divorce? I infer you are in favour of the cheapening of divorce to meet the needs of the working classes, or bringing jurisdiction nearer. Are you in favour also of enlarging the grounds of divorce?—I certainly think that divorce ought to be made accessible to everyone, irrespective of the question of money, but I view with very great reluctance any proposition to extend the reasons on which divorce ought to be granted. At the same time I do think that where one of the parties to the marriage becomes insane and permanently insane, and it is to be borne in mind that there are certain cases of insanity where it can be clearly and definitely established that the insanity is permanent, I refer to those cases of insanity which follow acute forms, relief should be granted. You have cases suffering from acute melancholia where the melancholia persists till dementia arrives, secondary dementia that disease is termed, and those people are absolutely and hopelessly insane for the rest of their lives, they are in effect dead. It is an injustice to the survivor to be unable to marry. That is an aspect of the case I do not feel myself concerned with. I express that opinion for what it is worth as a member of the community, but speaking as a Medical Officer of Health, such circumstances lead to the formation of illicit unions which have a detrimental effect on the race and a bad influence on the death rate.

36,382. There is one last question arising out of that. Would you be in favour of equalising the grounds of divorce between the sexes? That might have as great effect on the working class as any other enlargement?—I think there is a substantial reason why that ought not to be so. If a man is unfaithful, so far as the man is concerned the consequences in the majority of instances terminate with the act.

36,383. (Chairman.) May I suggest, "so far as he is concerned"?—Yes, so far as he is concerned: but if a woman is unfaithful she may be presenting her husband with a child which is not his, and for that reason—and for that reason only—I think that the present state of the law in this instance ought to be maintained.

36,384. (Mr. Spender.) You would not give a woman who really felt that the marriage contract had been violated in a way she regarded as an indignity to herself, the option of a remedy?—That is not a matter for me. It may be that as a matter of justice, divorce ought to follow because of the moral offence, but it seems to me that there is that distinction to be drawn. I am not prepared to say, it is not in my purview, whether the mere act of infidelity is a sufficient ground for divorce. If so, well and good, but there is that difference in the consequences of the act.

36,385. I simply wish to get at your view with regard to the working classes on that point?

36,386. (Sir George White.) You have been very successful in Huddersfield in reducing the rate of infant mortality by your voluntary agency and other work?—It has fallen 33·8 per cent. since we commenced our work, not altogether in consequence of our work, but there is that reduction.

36,387. That would affect, of course, the mortality of infants in all classes, covering the classes we have been speaking about especially?—That is for the whole borough.

36,388. I should gather from the view you put before us as to the ideas of the Huddersfield people of the relationships of marriage, that the irregular unions would be smaller probably than in a population like London?—I have no means of forming an opinion, but I hope so.

36,389. You would not regard them as very numerous?—No. Marriage in Huddersfield is regarded as an honourable condition, and it is that; the other thing is regarded as a dishonourable condition, and is avoided.

36,390. Have you any information which would lead you to be able to state whether these irregular unions are formed chiefly by persons who have lived in the married state but have fallen out from one cause or another, and each of them has formed an irregular union?—I am afraid I cannot express an opinion as to which are more frequent.

36,391. I intended to ask the previous witness this question, probably you cannot supply the deficiency now, but the question I intended to put was, are there not many cases in which young people come together as young people and never get married, although they live all their life in this irregular union?—Not in Huddersfield. By one means or another where there is a baby coming, marriage is usually secured, unless indeed the man absconds. Then they do not live together.

36,392. Do the married women work in mills?—Yes, about 20 per cent. of them.

36,393. You have expressed an opinion as to the necessity of divorce on certain grounds; do the people themselves look to this as a desirable escape out of some of their difficulties? I am speaking now of the poorer people?—In the cases which I cite they do.

36,394. They would avail themselves of it if it were accessible?—Yes.

36,395. In regard to the administration of charity funds and that kind of thing, you draw a distinction between the action of the Churches and Benevolent Societies, and the opinion which people form of those whom these societies should benefit. Are we to take it that such a body as the Charity Organisation Society and other agencies of that kind would refuse relief even if the case was a necessitous one, on the ground that these people were living in an irregular relationship?—I believe that the Charity Organisation Society does so. I happen to know that, but other charitable organisations do not. I helped to organise a Guild of Help in Huddersfield a little while back, and that was one of the points that emerged in the discussion when considering it, and it was established as a principle that the need was to be our measure apart from either moral or other consideration.

36,396. I thought your evidence implied that the Churches put themselves in the wrong in the estimation of a number of these poor people, because they would not recognise and help people who were living in these irregular relationships?—I am afraid there was a little misapprehension. I did not say that the Churches would not help them. I hope that nothing I said conveyed that really. My point was, if the Church condemned from the moral point of view what the majority of the people condoned from a moral point of view, it was so much the worse for the Church.

36,397. I took it from something you said that this condemnation was followed by probably not acknowledging the claim, from the charitable point of view, of these people, and passing them over while they helped others living in a condition of married relations?—That is not what I desired to convey.

63,398. (Sir Frederick Treves.) Is it your general opinion that facilities for divorce would lessen the number of these irregular unions; that is to say, from the point of view of a medical officer of health do you think that would be exceedingly desirable?—I think so.

36,399. You would admit incurable insanity as a ground for divorce, such as secondary dementia?—Yes.

36,400. Would you admit syphilis?—Syphilis acquired after marriage, yes.

36,401. Would you make syphilis a notifiable disease?—That is an extremely difficult question to answer. There are certain advantages which would result, and if it were possible to secure knowledge of every case of syphilis, and it is possible to secure knowledge of cases of syphilis without publicity, and if that were followed by judicious action, it is desirable from the point of view of the State and the interest of the people that syphilis should be dealt with by the State; but if the liability to notification were to lead to concealment, the consequences would be so disastrous that I am rather afraid the disadvantages would outweigh the advantages.

36,402. In answer to the question whether syphilis should be a notifiable disease under the terms of the Act, and included in the schedule, you are rather disposed to say at present "No"?—I would like to say this. I believe that I could devise a method of notifying, and I believe that I could devise such wise action following notification that it would be practicable, and that it would be good.

36,403. Such action would not damage that very desirable confidence which exists between a doctor and his patient?—I do not think so. One naturally looks at that from two points of view. The medical man likes, naturally and properly, to uphold the privileges and the proper privileges of his profession. He likes to think that he may consider the interests of his patients to the exclusion of every other thing, but the State seeking the greatest good of the greatest number has already required a breach of that professional secrecy in the matter of the notification of infectious diseases, but not in the matter of the notification of births, because it is not a subject for secrecy except in the very cases where secrecy relates to murder. I refer to illegitimate children. When a birth happens in an honourable family in an honourable way it is a matter for congratulation and for publicity. It appears in the matches and despatches columns of the "Times," amongst other places; but where a child is born illegitimately, concealment is desired, and then I should think a medical man thinking the thing out for himself and conceiving the probable consequences of concealment, I mean the death of the child, would feel he was doing right as a medical man and a member of the community in notifying that birth to the authorities. Those considerations apply, with modifications, to syphilis.

36,404. You will agree, I suppose, if syphilis were introduced into the schedule of the Act, it would tend to cause subjects of venereal disease to seek advice from other persons than medical men?—And the consequences would probably be so disastrous that the bad would outweigh the good.

36,405. Do you think you could make syphilis a ground for divorce without notification, to make it act as you wish it?—I think so, because it is so at present, I take it.

36,406. I am speaking of syphilis per se, without any regard to other things?—No. If an individual became syphilitic and then remained away from his wife until he was cured, I should say no; but if he communicated the disease to his wife, I say on every ground, yes, undoubtedly.

36,407. You are then locking the stable door after the horse has been stolen—the trouble is done?—Yes.

36,408. You are naturally anxious that the wife should not be contaminated, and that the children should be healthy, but if you wait till the damage has been done surely your intention is very much hampered?—Yes, from that point of view it is, but then there is another aspect of the case. The individual has inflicted a wrong on his wife for which she is entitled to have redress.

36,409. Separate the eugenic view from the view of justice and the need of punishment?—In so far as circumstances indicate that they ought to be separated, I do.

36,410. There is one case you have mentioned, No. 5. Do we gather you would make chronic drunkenness a ground for divorce?—That was a case of cruel and immoral conduct.

36,411. This was the man who was of drunken habits?—His wife was compelled to leave him and commence working for herself on account of his drunken habits and cruel and immoral conduct.

36,412. Would you make drunkenness a ground for divorce independent of cruelty?—Not alone.

36,413. You see great difficulties in establishing that?—Undoubtedly. After a very careful consideration of certain degrees of drunkenness, of chronic alcoholism, and the consequences, it might be deemed necessary to do so. Generally I do not want to extend divorce.

36,414. (Mrs. Tennant.) You said you did not wish to press your point about the equality of the sexes. I therefore do not wish to press you unduly upon it. If you will forgive my saying so, you have given so much thought to the rest of your evidence, I want to ask you to consider that position a little more fully. You did not mention it in your proof; it has come out incidentally. Would you distinguish, as other witnesses have done, between "accidental" acts of infidelity and aggravated or persistent acts of infidelity on the part of the husband?—Yes. I would say that was an abandonment of the position of husband which ought to be punished in that way.

36,415. I should like to ask you one or two questions about these accidental acts. I gather that these consequences are incomparable, in your opinion. In the first place, is it not the fact that the accidental act committed in certain circumstances with certain classes of women is very apt to convey disease to the wife?—Yes.

36,416. That is one very grave circumstance?—Yes. That falls into a different category.

36,417. The wife may have her remedy, although as you pointed out among the working classes, from want of money, she would not have it?—Yes.

36,418. One would like to avoid the injury. Not to reach the need for redress?—Yes.

36,419. That injury, in itself, is one grave consequence?—Yes.

36,420. Take another class of case in which these accidental acts are committed, not with a woman who has, unhappily, little to lose, but with a girl, who is wholly innocent; in that case is there not the further consideration not merely of the injury which an unfaithful husband inflicts upon his wife, but the injury he inflicts upon the girl to whom he gives a child, to that child itself, and to the State, which very possibly has to support the child. The child is born in circumstances which are cruel to it and to the mother, very often in the workhouse. And all this arises from what is called the accidental act of infidelity on the part of the husband?—I think I rather modified my original statement. I say that it may be so grave an offence that even an accidental act of that nature ought to be followed by divorce as a matter of moral law, as a matter of justice; but there still remains as between the man and the wife the distinction that I pointed out.

36,421. There is that distinction, but do you not feel that those two disabilities are sufficiently grave in themselves without distinction? I do not wish to make the point that, taken together, or apart, they might balance the injury inflicted upon the wife; without making comparisons are they not sufficiently grave to make the act of adultery a ground of divorce?—It may be. I do not suggest that it is not; it may be, but still the distinction remains.

36,422. (Lady Frances Balfour.)—You say you do not desire to extend the grounds of divorce except possibly by adding incurable insanity?—That is so.

36,423. In the third example, on what ground do you suggest the woman should get a divorce? Is not that really on the ground of cruelty?—Yes. The reference to an asylum there is not to be taken as a ground for divorce, but his conduct apart. His residence in an asylum results from his conduct out of the asylum, and it is that conduct which I think, in this case, would constitute a ground of divorce.

36,424. He does not appear to have been guilty of immorality, but of cruelty?—Yes, cruelty and desertion.

36,425. Does it not follow from that you would wish to see both cruelty and desertion made grounds for divorce?—Are they not so already?

36,426. (Chairman.) Not for divorce, but for a judicial separation only?—Perhaps I would withdraw that case.

36,427. (Lady Frances Balfour.) Would you, perhaps, withdraw your objection to any other grounds than at present exist? Would that case not lead you to say that desertion, if persisted in, and extreme cruelty which renders life intolerable, should be grounds for divorce? Otherwise that woman in the case you mention would be without relief?—Yes, I am afraid I am led to that conclusion, that that would form another ground.

36,428. (Chairman.) Might I supplement that? I daresay you know that either of those grounds at present, that is to say, cruelty or desertion lasting for two years, is a ground for judicial separation?—Yes, I am aware of that.

36,429. That does not afford a woman a ground for a divorce?—Yes. I am quite aware of that.

36,430. Do you approve of judicial separation or not?—I think that it is an illogical thing. I think if there is ground for a permanent judicial separation there is ground for divorce.

36,431. You gave a very strong statement about insanity and the possibilities that it led to irregular unions afterwards if there was continued incarceration in an asylum. Have you found that actually occur in practice?—Yes, I cite a case.

36,432. Have you an opinion that that might happen where a wife has been permanently deserted?—Yes.

36,433. Have you formulated what you said you could devise, a scheme of notification without publicity? If you have not thought it out, but would like to send it, we should be obliged?—Certainly, I could do that, or state the outlines at present.

36,434. What is the outline?—The medical practitioner could be required to send under seal addressed personally to the official designated to receive the notification, whoever that might be, the particulars required by any Statute so providing. It could be explicitly laid down that the official designated to receive the notification must regard it as confidential. The record must be kept by him in his own personal care, either under seal or under lock and key. The record should be destructible on a certificate being received that the individual was cured. The only action which I should propose to follow the notification would be that the officer designated to receive the notification should himself personally interview the subject of the notification, and hand to him a document clearly setting forth the condition, the dangers connected with it, and the penalty which I would thereupon attach to a violation of certain rules which I would formulate.

36,435. That is a sufficient outline?—The details would have to be provided.

36,436. The cases you have set out you have given as typical cases of which numbers could be given if desired?—Yes.

36,437. One general question on that. Do you consider in Huddersfield, or any parts with which you are familiar, there is a real need and demand among the poorer classes for an extension of divorce facilities in the courts?—There is, I believe, such a demand, but I do not know how much of it there is. I believe that a number of people are suffering disabilities in a way unconsciously. They have drifted into the undesirable condition, they look upon it as inevitable; they do not hope for amelioration, and, therefore, they do not consciously require anything; they could not articulate their needs.

36,438. Has it been mentioned to you by any of them?—Yes, in one case personally.

36,439. To any of your assistants have you had reports of it?—Yes.

(Chairman.) I would like to thank you on behalf of the Commission for your very carefully thought out and interesting evidence. I am sure we shall find it of great use.

Dr. William Arnold Evans called and examined. (In Camera.)

36,440. (Chairman.) You are an M.D.; and are you the Medical Officer of Health for Bradford?—I am.

36,441. You have held that office for 19 years?—Yes.

36,442. You have a staff working under your direction of six women sanitary inspectors, whose chief duty consists in visiting the homes of the poor, their first visit to the home being on account of the birth of a child?—Yes.

36,443. The Early Notification of Births Act is in force in Bradford?—Yes. We adopted it as soon as it came out.

36,444. You say about 4,000 notifications are received annually from midwives who attend women in childbirth: the inspectors therefore have an extensive knowledge of the home life of the greater part of the population?—Yes.

36,445. Do they report constantly what is going on?—I have a report every week from the Chief Woman Inspector.

36,446. She summarises what the rest have done, I suppose?—Yes. We find frequently that neglected homes are due to the unhappy relations between husband and wife. Divorce is often wished for on account either of brutality and neglect on the part of the husband, or neglect of home and children on the part of the wife.

36,447. Can you tell us to what extent you have found it wished for?—It is difficult to state that in figures, but that kind of case constitutes a large minority, and the persons interested wish for divorce.

36,448. Would you say there is no demand among the poorer classes for extension of divorce facilities?—I know in Bradford there is. The expense involved in an action for divorce, however, stands in the way, and, in consequence, irregular unions are brought about. In some cases there is desertion on the part of the husband, and in a few others I have known the woman leave the house and form an irregular union with another man. Owing to the fact that wages received in Bradford by women engaged in the wool and worsted industry being so very low, any woman with children deserted by her husband knows that she will have great difficulty in bringing up the children, and consequently seeks the support of a man and contracts an irregular union. She cannot easily obtain assistance from the Guardians of the Poor, for they are unwilling to grant much in the way of out-door relief, and generally insist upon the woman breaking up her home and taking up her residence in the workhouse together with her children. I am strongly of opinion that in the interests of the working classes facilities for obtaining divorce should be made easier; that opinion is supported by a consideration of the following cases, which are typical of many others.

36,449. Does the word "facilities" apply only to procedure, or does it include grounds of divorce?—I refer only to procedure. I have no suggestion to make as to the extension of grounds of divorce.

36,450. You do not go into that?—No.

36,451. You mean opportunities in the local courts for bringing cases on?—That is the meaning I intended to convey.

36,452. Do you think that would be beneficial to the people?—Yes.

36,453. Why? Will you please explain?—Some of these people who have contracted irregular unions wish, if they could get rid of the person they have left, husband or wife as the case may be, by a divorce to marry the person with whom they are living.

36,454. That would regularise what is at present an irregular union?—Yes, and some are anxious to do it.

36,455. You have given a number of cases set out in your proof?—Yes, they are as follows:—

"Case 1.—Mrs. L. was deserted by her husband after a few years of married life. He left her to support their little girl, going away himself to America. He was immoral and careless, and rarely showed her any consideration. In her work she met with J. L., and a friendship sprang up between them, which ended with her living with him. She subsequently gave birth to a daughter which was notified in accordance with the Early Notification of Births Act. The woman informed me that she would gladly marry the present lover, but that the expense attaching to a divorce was too great. They lived very happily together, and the man is most considerate and brings his wages home regularly.

"Case 2.—In this case the man was deserted by his wife, who is now a prostitute and was ever unfaithful to him, in fact she made his life a long misery until she left him altogether. He met R. at a public-house where he was in the habit of visiting on his way home from chimney sweeping. R. was the domestic servant there. They became good friends, and finally he persuaded her to go and live with him. She willingly did so, and proved a most faithful and exemplary companion. The home was beautifully kept, and in spite of much poverty, she ever did her best for him. Yet when ill, no charitable society would come to their assistance, because they were not married. I often helped this woman because I admired her character. She was terribly disappointed that she could not be legally united to the man, who also felt very deeply the position of the woman who was so much to him.

"Case 3.—This woman with her three children was deserted some four or five years ago. She is now living with another man by whom she has had two children. Both are quite happy, and the woman has in no way lost caste amongst her neighbours, who call her by the man's name. She is a good mother to her children, and the man seems to behave well towards the family. Both wish to be married, but the expense of a divorce stands in the way.

"Case 4. This woman is separated from her husband, and is living with a widower who has three children. She says she had a very bad husband and got a separation from him. Her present home is tidy and the children look well cared for. The woman says if it were possible the man would marry her."

35,456. Is there anything else you wish to add?—I should like to state I recommend the cheapening of divorce and greater facilities in the interests of the children as well as the parents.

36,457. As a medical man do you agree that it is desirable in the interest of the race that the prevention should take place adequately of unfit children?—Certainly.

36,458. (Mr. Spender.) As regards what we have heard this morning—I think you heard some of the other witnesses—from your experience in Bradford, do you say an irregular union, even although it had all the characteristics of family life, did inflict a disability in the public opinion of the parties?—In some cases it does and in some it does not. It depends on the district in which they live. In some of the lowest districts it does not matter, but among the great majority, particularly the higher artisan families, it does.

36,459. And with regard to the children of those unions, in whatever social strata they were, it would be a stigma upon them that they were not legitimate?—It is so now. In Bradford 40 or 50 years ago very little importance was attached to it, but public opinion has altered.

36,460. There has been an advance. There has been a change in public opinion towards attaching importance to the marriage tie?—There has been both a change and an advance.

36,461. (Chairman.) Do you think these facilities you have spoken of would tend generally in the direction of an improvement of morality?—I think they would.

(Chairman.) We are very much indebted to you for the trouble you have taken in coming here, and I hope you will be satisfied that you have done good work in coming. I am pleased you were able to find you could come.

Dr. Ewing Mould Glynn Whittle called and examined.

36,462. (Chairman.) You are an M.A. and an M.D. of Cambridge, and you have practised for over 30 years in the city of Liverpool?—Yes.

36,463. You are consulting physician to the Ladies' Charity Hospital and you have been otherwise professionally associated with various public institutions in the city of Liverpool?—Yes.

36,464. You tendered your evidence to the secretary to place before the Commission?—Yes.

36,465. I have two memoranda. Will you read the first one and add anything you wish, or correct it in any way you like?—Yes. We do not sufficiently look upon the question of divorce from the point of view of the poor, especially the poorest of the poor. The hopelessness of the life of a victim of this class married to a partner who is cruel, criminal, insane, or a drunkard is very terrible. I have questioned countless poor women, victims of habitual cruelty, as to whether they would avail themselves of divorce, if they could get it. The answers have been most impressive: Protestants say "Yes"; Roman Catholics say "No." I cannot recall a single Protestant exception.

36,466. Can you give us any idea of the extent of your inquiries?—I have largely put them to people associated with those public charities which come under the head of cruelty and those cases, and I should roughly estimate them, over a great number of years, as from 100 to 150 or more. I was interested in this matter many years ago from the teachings of my father, who was a doctor in Liverpool, and he spoke strongly of the difficulties of the poor then. I was interested to see whether they would avail themselves of divorce if it was open to them.

36,467. Do you speak to 100 to 150 cases?—I have spoken to quite that number spread over those years out of the large experience I have had of these institutions.

36,468. Might I say in your new memorandum you interpolate something before you get to the next paragraph?—May I say why I introduce that? From some of the witnesses there seems to be an impression that legislation has been one-sided, one sex against the other. I think it is a matter of inherent difficulties connected with it, and I wanted to show, from the nature of things, that there was always great difficulty from the point of view of the right doer, and that the wrong doer gets off too easily.

36,469. Will you read the two paragraphs?—If a wife wrongfully pawns her husband's goods or pledges his credit, or without adequate provocation leaves her home, or if a husband is habitually cruel, or either the man or the woman drinks, nearly all the legal sympathy and most of the judicial help, which our laws afford, are directed—to the prejudice of kindness, sobriety, and honour—against the innocent victims of drunkenness, desertion, and crime. I believe that few civilised states, if any, can equal England in the crimes of wife murder and brutal assaults on wives. The newspapers tell us little of conjugal cruelties, while police statistics reveal much, but much still remains that stops short of reaching the police; for among the worthier victims of even the poorest class the sense of shame is strong and often anything will be endured rather than publicity and exposure.

36,470 Then you might proceed with your old paper?—May I mention this memorandum which refers to the question of cruelty?

36,471. You had better mention anything else after you have finished the paper?—Divorce, if opposed by one side, I would grant on proof of cruelty, lunacy, habitual drunkenness, desertion or serious crime. That is dealing with the principal cases.

36,472. You have left out adultery. Of course you would include that?—I assume that the present laws would be maintained as well. As long as the main basis of divorce is to remain proof of adultery, I am opposed to the recommendation of making the divorce laws equal. My reason does not arise from sympathy with the guilty; they are generally strong enough to fight their own battles with more success than they deserve. My reason is that it would disturb a state of affairs, which, notwithstanding grave faults, makes far more for morality than the law, if altered as proposed, would do. The records of divorce show that many women, not anxious about their financial future, have been so determined to obtain their freedom that they have become reckless of their reputation, and stooped to vice to induce their husbands to divorce them. If men are to be given the same opportunity, the abuse of such a change in the law would far exceed its advantages. Attention has already been called to the almost insuperable economic difficulty which would arise before such a change in the law could be made effective and equitable in practice. In my judgment it could only be done by making adultery a penal offence, divorce to follow a conviction, while, if the public prosecutor failed, the acquitted husband should receive double costs out of the public purse, though the property of the wife, if a lady of means, should be attached to recoup the public prosecutor. Of course I am not recommending this, but only pointing out what a false step may make inevitable. In the way I have indicated only, so far as I can see, could an innocent husband be protected from having to pay the cost of a fruitless prosecution against himself at the instance of a wife, who has been, perhaps, a much loving but jealous and mistaken partner.

36,473. Now will you go back to your old paper?—Yes, if men are to be given the same opportunity, the abuse of such a change in the law would far exceed its advantages. If a man's marriage has turned out so unhappily, whether from his own or his wife's sins, that he has lost all conjugal love for her, it is bad for his health to be compelled to continue to live with her, and what is thus bad for his health is also bad for his mind and morals. On this point it would be necessary to have in camera the evidence of experts. In pursuance of your suggestion, I had better delete the next paragraph, because it brings in the Church question.

36,474. Will you take it in your own way entirely?—I will read it if you desire.

36,475. I think that it is a long discussion of the theological side of the question?—Yes.

36,476. I do not think we need trouble you with that?—I will omit that and pass on. I believe that justice between the sexes, and the problem of equitable morality, can ultimately only be reached by a step for which public opinion is certainly not ripe, viz., divorce by mutual consent. If it ever comes, I hope a very long limit, and I would make it seven years, will be imposed before such persons are permitted to make a second matrimonial venture. I will omit the next part because that raises the Church question.

36,477. The only part worth looking at is the end, because the rest is really arguments on theology which we have elsewhere. You summarise it thus:—"In all cases of divorce I would impose long limits before further marriage is permitted to a divorced person, whether petitioner, respondent, or divorced by consent"?—I would like to add a brief remark upon a point that has already arisen, and that is the action for breach of promise of marriage. I would not abolish it, but I think a useful amendment to the present system might be arrived at by adding what is known, in legal phraseology, by the word "negligence." Before a verdict could be obtained I would require that a mere breach of the promise of marriage should not be sufficient, but it should be proved that the defendant had been guilty of negligence. That might extend to many things; it could be worked out by the court, such as being too long, or harsh treatment. I think it is a useful law, and its complete repeal would be mischievous, and would make young men reckless as to the way they trifle with women.

36,478. May I summarise what you say? You think from your conversations with women who have been suffering that there is a need for a means of their obtaining divorce in cases where it is required?—Yes.

36,479. They are too poor to get them under the present system?—Yes.

36,480. You do not favour divorce being placed on equal grounds, as regards sexual immorality, for both sexes?—I think that is impossible as things are.

36,481. It is not impossible, the question is whether it is expedient?—I do not think it would work out as expected. I am opposed to it.

36,482. Thirdly, you consider that the grounds you mention are grounds that should be brought within the doors of the Divorce Court—namely, adultery, cruelty, lunacy, habitual drunkenness, desertion or serious crime?—Yes, a sufficient standard in each. I would like to mention this, lunacy has been mentioned a good deal, and I think great care should be taken and the best expert advice followed. There is one branch of that in which I have had personally very great experience, and I would like to pronounce an opinion upon it. From my long connection as an obstetric practitioner I have seen a good deal of puerperal mania, I know I shall be in conflict with some of my medical friends, but I am strongly of opinion that puerperal mania in its ordinary form, even if recurrent, should not be a ground of divorce.

36,483. Because?—It is very curable even if the case is bad and acute. It even gives excellent results, and my experience does not confirm the supposition that the heredity from it is of the grave and widespread character which it is thought to be.

36,484. You class it as curable?—Yes.

36,485. That would not infringe the proposition they lay down, although it might the facts?—It shows the necessity for careful selection. One of the witnesses was asked by Sir Frederick Treves how a standard of chronic drunkenness could be made satisfactorily for the purpose of divorce. I drafted out this idea, and it seems to me workable. The case would have to be proved to the satisfaction of a judge or a stipendiary magistrate, or of two justices of the peace, with the evidence of two physicians, of whom one must be a permanent medical assessor or his acting deputy. I think with such safeguards as that it could be arranged.

36,486. It does not define what permanent drunkenness is. That is only stating who is to prove it. I rather gathered the question was directed as to what was meant by the term?—It would be very much like a certificate of lunacy. You would have to come finally to the opinions of the individuals.

36,487. There is a difference between opinions and the question upon which the opinion is to be given. You have not dealt with that. In dealing with these cases of poor women, has your attention been called to the fact of immoral relations existing in consequence of the impossibility of getting a divorce?—Yes.

36,488. To what extent can you speak about that?—The prisoners that are brought forward at Liverpool give frequent evidence of those kind of troubles.

36,489. The wife left outside, you mean?—The husband having been deserted by the wife, or the wife having left him, or there has been a complete interchange as described by the witnesses. This confirms the account given by Dr. Ethel Bentham, who went into the subject some time ago. She gave a fair summarised way of how that matter worked.

36,490. Is it productive of immoral relations in your experience?—I am afraid it is. May I make one statement with reference to the notification of syphilis which has been mentioned. I have thought over that matter a good deal, and I am opposed to it. I do not think that it would work in practice. It would lead to such concealment and irregularities that it would be impossible to get good results from it.

36,491. (Mr. Brierley.) I did not quite follow why you say that equality of the sexes is impossible?—It would be impossible to obtain the results anticipated.

36,492. What are the results anticipated, I suppose that the wife shall be able to get a divorce if she wishes from her husband on the ground of adultery?—The idea is that you would get these results generally or equitably. I do not think you would.

36,493. I do not follow why you say so?—One can only anticipate how things would work out.

36,494. What are the evil results you anticipate from the abolition of the disability on the part of the wife?—I have referred to what happens already in my examination in chief—with some men especially.

36,495. You mean that they commit the act in order to enable their wives to divorce them?—Yes, it would happen in certain cases.

36,496. Have you experience as to why the way it works out would be a disadvantage?—On that particular point?

36,497. Yes. As far as I know in nearly every Christian country in the world, except Belgium and a few British Colonies, which found their law on the Act of 1857, the sexes are on an equality—in every country where divorce is allowed. The case of England is exceptional?—Is not divorce allowed on many other grounds as well in such places as Indiana and Switzerland?

36,498. I do not know that they obscure that ground; it always remains a prolific cause in divorce cases in every country. Taking that into consideration what reasons are there to anticipate evil results?—I do not know the working of that point in other countries. I have inquired into other countries on one or two points, but not upon this one.

36,499. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) Your view is, that the only ultimate satisfactory basis of a law of divorce is a divorce by mutual consent?—Yes, but it is quite outside.

36,500. I follow that, but I thought I heard you say that was your view of the ultimate basis?—I think it is the only way those difficulties could be overcome.

36,501. That would obviate any application to courts at all?—For the purpose of registration they would have to exist.

36,502. If divorce were allowed by mutual consent the expense and necessity of a lawsuit would be unnecessary?—Yes, that would be so.

36,503. There would be some public registry where the parties would register the fact of their divorce. That would be so, would it not? Would not that very much recall the state of things in ancient times under the Roman Empire?—I do not think it would, because the Roman Empire was never thoroughly christianised, and divorce will never appeal to the vast mass of any civilised Christian country, It is always an unfortunate small minority. The majority of people are not such fools as to wish or desire to break up their homes for this, that, or the other cause. It will be in cases referred to as hopeless incompatibility and things of that sort.

36,504. You think that the great majority of Christian people in the world will never want divorce?—I think that has proved to be so in all countries. I think there are very misleading statements from time to time in the English newspapers. I should like to mention one point——

36,505. I only want an answer to that question, and I want to ask you why. Why do you think Christian people will never divorce?—Because they believe in Christianity, and believe that the ideal put before them is a permanent sacred tie.

36,506. Do you think Christianity is inconsistent with divorce?—No, I do not think Christianity is inconsistent with divorce in cases of permanent misery.

36,507. If it is not inconsistent, why should the fact that the people are Christians prevent them availing themselves of this wide law of divorce by mutual consent?—I said that the majority would never desire it. The overwhelming majority would never desire it.

36,508. (Sir Frederick Treves.) With regard to the point of equality, you do not recognise it between the sexes in the matter of adultery?—I think we will have to go on with the present law.

36,509. You do not base your point on biological grounds?—I rather agree with Sir James Crichton-Browne's views. He spoke largely on biological grounds.

36,510. You do not base your present point on biological grounds in your proof?—I may not have mentioned it, but I rather approve of it.

36,511. The point appears to be this, you do not attempt to differentiate between the two acts in the two sexes, and claim that one is less culpable than the other, but you claim that it gives the man an opportunity of possibly providing a ground of divorce on easy terms. That is how it reads?—I say women have done that under the Divorce Acts.

36,512. It seems putting the matter on rather a low basis when you say you will not accept the equality, because if it were made equal it gives a man an opportunity of obtaining a divorce on what may be called easy terms. That is not a very high ground?—I do not quite follow you on that point.

36,513. You say if men are to be given the same opportunity of being divorced by their wives for a solitary act of adultery, the abuse from the change in the law would exceed the advantage?—I am thinking how it would work out in the very low classes. We have to consider that. I do not think they would have scruples in many cases.

36,514. You are opposed to equality because, if equality were allowed, it would give a man an opportunity of obtaining a divorce upon grounds he might consider easy?—I think so.

36,515. That is not a very high ground to take?—No, but you have to deal with the class of persons in large towns as they are, unfortunately. It is a very sad state of affairs, but I am afraid it is so in the slums of large towns.

36,516. You think if a single act of adultery were made a ground for divorce in a man, men would take advantage of it in that improper way?—That is my fear.

36,517. With regard to insanity, if it is incurable insanity of three years' continuous duration, it would not include your case of puerperal mania?—That would satisfy me.

36,518. That would exclude all cases of puerperal mania?—Yes.

36,519. (Sir George White.) Do you wish the Commission to understand, from the answer you gave to Sir Lewis Dibdin a minute ago, that you are in favour of divorce taking simply the ground of mutual consent of both parties not wishing to live together any longer?—I attach to that in theory a seven years' limit, and my opinion is that an overwhelming proportion of any persons who apply for divorce go together again and abandon divorce before the expiration of that limit. I would rather not consider the matter practically because I do not think public opinion is ripe for it. It is the only way by which certain advocates can be answered if they have demanded equality. I do not think that they can get it any other way.

36,520. Then there is no value in your laying down certain things for which you would give divorce, such as cruelty, lunacy, and habitual drunkenness, if you cover all those by mutual consent?—I do not take the two together. Those are apart from mutual consent cases. In lunacy, cruelty, desertion, drunkenness, and any case of serious crime carrying a long term of penal servitude I would not require mutual consent for that.

36,521. You said Christian people will never divorce each other. That is not what you meant?—I said that an overwhelming majority of them would always aim at the ideal of the Christian life laid down in the Scripture, to look at it as lifelong. Reference was made to the State of Indiana by one of the witnesses in reference to certain practices. That State appears to have been rather an active one in looking into these matters. Some time ago I applied to an American friend of mine for definite information as to the proportion of divorces in States where it was easy, and that State was specially selected because it had gone more thoroughly into statistics than the others. These statistics covered 30 years inquiring into the history of all marriages taking place there, and notwithstanding the ease with which divorce can be obtained, the extraordinary fact was revealed that an overwhelming proportion, almost 98 per cent. of the married couples, remained married and never thought of availing themselves of the law of divorce. That is contrary to what one sees in the newspapers in this country as to the proportion of divorces among persons who marry in the United States.

36,522. You mean that the Christian principle will prevent the bulk of the population running into divorce?—Comparisons with Pagan and semi-Pagan countries need scarcely be introduced. Religion has too great a hold on us. I have a paper here in reference to the cruelty question. That is a sample for six years of cases at the assizes and the sessions at Liverpool, and I am told if the cases dealt with summarily by the magistrates were added, they would be ten times more numerous. The cases of cruelty would come up to 200.

36,523. (Chairman.) This gives the names of persons indicted for murder, manslaughter, wounding or attempting murder, and so forth, and dealt with at the assizes or sessions, and the sentences given?—One case is that of a woman who is accused of wounding her husband. There is one case only showing the disparity of the overwhelming cruelty suffered by the wives as compared with what they had in return.

36,524. There are 17 cases of men wounding their wives or trying to murder them, and one case of a woman wounding her husband?—Yes, and only two discharges, showing how grave is the case.

36,525. What do you say is the inference to be drawn?—The amount of crime in the country. If you take the population of Liverpool at 700,000 there were three cases of death, two of murder, and one of manslaughter, husbands convicted, not counting the cases of acquittal, and all those other cases of grievous wounding and assault, and a large number of cases, I am told, estimated at ten times as many by the magistrates, very serious cases any of which might have resulted in very grave consequences, and if you apply those proportions to the whole country you get a very serious state of affairs revealed. If we allow that a large seaport town like Liverpool is worse than the average we still have a very grave case of cruelty in the country. We are told by one witness if we relaxed the divorce laws we were reverting to savagery. I think that document shows where the savagery really is.

36,526. It comes to this, if you add these in and the magistrates' cases you find 170 to 200 cases per annum?—No, over six years.

36,527. All very serious, wounding and so on?—Yes.

36,528. You apply that to the whole country and come to the conclusion that there is a very large number of cases of gross brutality?—I think so, and I think where judicial separation is now granted, divorce might be allowed.

(Chairman.) We do not want the details of this, we have the effect of it. I ought to thank you very much for your evidence.

Miss Jessie Whyte Allan called and examined.

36,529. (Chairman.) You are of Grey Lodge, Dundee?—Yes.

36,530. Have you been for some years engaged in social work in Dundee?—Yes.

36,531. Have you visited the poor in their own homes under the Early Notification of Births Act?—Yes.

36,532. And you are also superintendent of a restaurant and school for nursing mothers?—Yes.

36,533. Is your district a very poor one?—Yes, the poorest in Dundee.

36,534. The women are nearly all spinners and preparers in jute mills, and their wages vary from 10*s.* to 16*s.* a week?—Yes.

36,535. Have you in the course of your experience had many tales told you of matrimonial complications and hardships?—Yes.

36,536. Do you say as the result of your knowledge of these people that it would be in the interests of morality were divorce made more accessible to them?—Yes, it would be in the interest of morality if divorce were made more accessible.

36,537. You say in the next sentence, "At present it is practically impossible." We have been told that in Scotland you have a very satisfactory poor roll system?—Yes.

36,538. That enables the poor classes to bring their cases, so that I do not see why you say that at present in Scotland it is practically impossible?—I have instanced a case where a divorce was obtained in forma pauperis, but it means that they have to go to Edinburgh, and with the very small wages they receive, it is impossible for them to get to Edinburgh.

36,539. Although they have the facilities?—No, they have not sufficient means to get there.

36,540. Although you have a poor roll system in Scotland that does not meet the exigencies of the very poor. Is that what you mean?—Yes.

36,541. Will you kindly continue reading from your paper?—Yes. "When the economic burden is so pressing, thoughtful and wholly intelligent behaviour in the matter of marriage cannot be expected. As a rule marriage takes place too early in life for both. When it happens that a husband proves unfaithful, the wife, in many cases I have known, leaves him, taking the children with her. She struggles to work for them herself with more or less success. After a period of hardship she is tempted to enter into another union with a man who is willing to share her burden. The case of Mrs. S. serves to illustrate this. She married at 17 a man who proved both cruel and immoral. She lived with him for ten years and six children were born, four of whom survived. S. left her frequently during this period, and during one of his absences, a prolonged one of eight months, Mrs. S. went to live with a man who undertook to keep her and her children. Before the birth of their first child, R. (the man with whom Mrs. S. was cohabiting) urged her to marry him, as S. had not been heard of for some time, and they thought he might be dead. She refused, fearing prosecution for bigamy. There are now two children of this union, and they have ascertained that Mr. S. is alive, and that he married Mrs. S. under an assumed name. Mrs. S. tells me she would have applied for a divorce a long time ago had it been within her means. Another case of the same nature is that of Mrs. H. She lived with an unfaithful husband for seven years, and four children were born. Signs of syphilis appear in most of them, and she herself suffers from a form of it. She was a domestic servant before marriage, and had some money saved. When life with her husband became intolerable, she left him, taking her children with her. She managed to keep a home for them by going out washing. She tells me she thought of applying for a divorce, but as she had only 2*l.* saved, and the money was needed for the necessaries of life, she did not consult a lawyer. At the end of a year she took up house with a man who has kept her and her children ever since. They have now four children. Other somewhat similar cases of cohabiting are personally known to me, but I have cited those of women with a claim to strength of character and intelligence. If the temptation was great in these cases, it is easy to see where many must fall when the sense of right and wrong is not so acute. I have good reason to believe that divorce would have been applied for had it been within the means of these women. The fact that it was possible and had not been taken advantage of, would lead, I think, to promoting a keener sense of shame in the matter of cohabiting and the illegitimacy of children. A case has come under my notice when a divorce in forma pauperis was applied for and obtained by dint of much economy and saving. The applicant was a Mrs. L., a weaver, whose average wage is 17*s.* 6*d.* a week. She married nine years ago; her husband was abusive and immoral. After six years of unhappy married life, she consulted a lawyer, with the result that a decree for aliment was taken out, but she never received any money. At the end of a year she applied for and obtained a divorce. The case was undefended, and 8*s.* weekly aliment was allowed for her two children. This has never been paid. She now lives with her mother, working constantly to pay up the expenses of her case. These amounted to 13*l.* 15*s.*, and the money was raised in the following manner: her mother had a 4*l.* share in the Co-operative Society Stores, this she lifted and gave to her daughter, a brother gave her 1*l.*, and the lawyer trusted her for the rest, which is now all paid up except 2*l.*

36,542. I do not understand this. If Lord Guthrie were here he might be able to help us. That seems a very large sum to have been incurred for expenses, and to have to be borne by her, under the Scottish system of the poor roll. You say this was an in forma pauperis case?—Yes.

36,543. Do you know what the expenses were for?—For witnesses, I believe.

(Mr. Brierley.) We were told the only expenses a litigant would have to incur were the travelling expenses of the witnesses.

36,544. (Chairman.) Do you mean to say that the travelling expenses amounted to 13*l.* 15*s.*?—I must say it seems to me they are rather large. I believe there have been divorce cases carried through for less than that. I know it was an in forma pauperis case.

36,545. (Chairman.) Where did the case come from?—Dundee.

36,546. (Mr. Brierley.) What is the railway fare from Dundee to Edinburgh?

36,547. (Chairman.) It is 2*s.* 6*d.*, I think?—No, I think it is 7*s.* return third class, but I am not perfectly certain.

(Chairman.) That would not account for this money.

36,548. (Mr. Brierley.) It was an undefended case, and there probably would be only a couple of witnesses?—The lawyer I spoke to about this case told me he thought that it was very dear, and he had known them put through cheaper. It was an in forma pauperis poor roll case.

36,549. (Chairman.) Will you proceed with your proof?—"Separation orders do not seem to work out very well, and in Dundee are not taken advantage of to any extent. What is more common is a decree for aliment, which apparently gives as effectual relief. With the very poor, amongst whom my work lies, this is obtained through the officer of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. He is probation officer under the Children Act. Some of the cases under his charge are personally known to me—women anxious to live respectable lives freed from a miserable tie. One of these, a Mrs. G., married at 18 to a man whose only apparent fault was that he got drunk occasionally. She left him 15 months after marriage, and a month before her baby was born, on account of his drinking habits. He sold up the house, including everything she had contributed, and was seen openly in the society of immoral women. His wife has never gone back to him. She is only 20 years of age now, a spinner earning 11*s.* 1*d.* weekly. She is able to keep her child and herself respectably living with her mother, who keeps the child when she is at work. In my opinion there is great disadvantage in binding a young woman to a celibate life. The case of Mrs. F. strengthens me in this. She is a jute winder and was married at 17 to a man with whom she only lived six months on account of his cruelty to her. A child was born and she applied for a decree for aliment. This was paid irregularly, and after a short time a reconciliation took place. Another child was born. She was unable to live with her husband, however, and went home to her mother. His family have custody of one child now, and she is paid aliment occasionally for the other. She is only 25 now and a very respectable young woman. She says she is anxious for a divorce, and believes it possible to get one, as since she parted with her husband he has been leading an immoral life. It is quite beyond her reach, however, at the present cost."

36,550. These cases puzzle me I confess, because of the facts proved by one or two witnesses, thoroughly competent with the matter, Lord Salvesen and Mr. Lorimer, as to getting a suit before the Court for the mere expenses of the witnesses?—Still, I think 5*l.* would mean a good deal of money.

36,551. For even the expenses of the witnesses?—Yes.

36,552. They have to go all the way to Edinburgh?—Yes.

36,553. Do you think it would be different if there was a Court in Dundee?—It would be cheaper. Another case is Mrs. T., "She left, her husband after seven months of unhappy married life on account of his cruelty to her. She consulted a lawyer and got a decree for aliment which was paid for 10 weeks regularly, and afterwards occasionally for seven years. There was then an attempt at reconciliation, but his habits were even more intolerable, and after four months she left him. A lawyer was consulted about a divorce, but it was too expensive, so a decree for aliment was taken out again. This has been paid at long and irregular intervals for 13 years, and she keeps herself respectably by working as a cook in a Nursing Mothers' Restaurant. I find in my work that there is always a sense of shame where there is illegitimacy in the family life. I have known it to be most carefully hidden for many years, and have seen great sorrow at the discovery. I am strongly of the opinion that the laws relating to marriage should be altered, so that it would be possible for a woman to obtain freedom from a marriage which is degradation to herself and her children, and to permit her to form a legal union with a man who would be a healthy parent and a good example to his children.

36,554. Your laws in Scotland do not want altering for that purpose, a woman can get a divorce for adultery. The difficulty in every case is the question of money. The only suggestion I can think of is a Court in Dundee for you?—Yes.

36,555. Do you think that would make any difference?—Yes, I think it would give relief to those cases.

(Chairman.) I think we shall have to ask Lord Guthrie how it is.

36,556. (Sir George White.) I notice almost every case you give are cases of marriage on the part of the woman when 17 years of age?—Yes.

36,557. Is that a common age at which marriage takes place in Scotland?—In Dundee it is very common. I think 18 is more common.

36,558. That would be, probably, because they are mill hands and earning money?—Yes.

36,559. It would not be a sample of the age at which marriage takes place in Scotland generally, as far as you know?—I think it is lower in Dundee.

36,560. You ascribe a good many of the evils that follow, to the fact that they marry so early?—Yes.

36,561. (Lady Frances Balfour.) Dundee is nearly entirely a manufacturing town?—Yes.

36,562. The women nearly all work in the factories?—Yes, that is so.

36,563. And I am afraid in a very large proportion support their husbands?—Yes, they certainly contribute to the household.

36,564. I think a portion of them support them?—Yes, I think so.

36,565. I am afraid it is not a very high standard of living as compared with the rest of Scotland?—I believe not.

36,566. The poverty of the women is a good deal due to the fact that they are very much dependent upon their own exertions?—Yes.

36,567. You cannot quite argue that the condition of Dundee is that of the rest of Scotland. It is a very peculiar population?—That is so.

36,568. (Mrs. Tennant.) In spite of the fact there is of wage necessity a low standard of living in Dundee, you find a strong feeling about illegitimacy?—Quite.

36,569. Have you experienced that on the part of children when they have discovered themselves illegitimate?—Yes, and I see other women pity the children for being illegitimate.

36,570. (Mr. Brierley.) Have you had experience of any other divorce case, besides the one you mention, brought through the poor roll?—Personally I did not get to know of any other case. I had a long conversation with a lawyer who had been a poor man's lawyer.

36,571. I understand there is a regular roll of poor agents in Dundee?—That is so.

36,572. Do you know them?—Yes.

36,573. We were told that everybody in Scotland would be acquainted with this system. What do you suggest would be out of the reach of these people? What sort of expenditure have you in mind?—I think it takes a great deal of saving at times to gather 5*l.* together. There is nothing over when there is a family to keep, and yourself to keep respectably.

36,574. One would think from what we have been told, that the expense would not be so great. We were told that the Court in undefended cases sat on Saturday so as to relieve the working people as much as possible, and the only expenses that had to be paid were the witnesses' expenses. I cannot understand how it is that even 5*l.* is necessary in some undefended cases from Dundee. All they have to do is to bring two or three witnesses, which at 7*s.* apiece, amounts only to 21*s.* You are not able to explain that?—No, this lawyer who thought 13*l.* was excessive said he thought 5*l.* very fair.

36,575. If there are several witnesses it might be 5*l.* We were told that it was simply the expense of taking the witnesses to Edinburgh and back, and that in undefended cases it was not necessary to stop more than one night?—Yes.

36,576. I do not understand it?—Still they would need food.

36,577. It is rather important, because we were told that it was an ideal system in Scotland, and one would like to know how it works out in practice?—I do not think it is ever so cheap as that.

36,578. (Mrs. Tennant.) Do you happen to know how long the witnesses were absent from their employment in this particular case, or how long the wife was absent from employment?—I think one day, but I am not sure.

36,579. One day only would not be a very big factor?—No.

36,580. No wages for one day is 2*s.*, perhaps?—Yes.

36,581. (Chairman.) It has occurred to us it may be that the solicitor will get his out-of-pocket expenses. He might have had to hunt round in different places for the witnesses?—Yes.

36,582. Or he might have had himself to go to Edinburgh. The case may be one in which it was difficult to prove the case without travelling about, and so forth?—Yes.

36,583. It is possible there may be expenses which would make it come to more than we thought at first. Do you think you can procure for us the details of the bill which make up this 13*l.* 15*s.* You have evidently got the exact figure?—Yes, I am sure I can.

36,584. Because we should like to have it looked through by one of the Commissioners, the learned judge who assists us here. If you could get that, or a copy, and send it to us we should be much obliged?—Yes, I will do so.

(Chairman.) I ought to thank you very much for your interesting evidence.

Supplement as requested in Q. 36,583.

Grey Lodge, Dundee.

Dear Sir, 24th November 1910.

I was requested by Lord Gorell at my examination on the 8th November to procure further particulars of the cost of the divorce case I cited in my proof. This I am not sorry I have not been able to do as no detailed account was rendered to the woman, but I enclose an account for divorce proceedings from another source, where the sum is less, also a letter from Mr. Charles Soutar, Deputy Procurator Fiscal in Dundee. He has served a term as Poor Roll lawyer, and I think his information may be useful to the Commission.

It may also be of use if I explain briefly the means which poor litigants have to adopt to get the benefit of the Poor's Roll. A poor litigant should apply at the office of the sheriff clerk for the name of a Poor's agent. This agent is bound to take up the case if a competent case can be stated. He obtains a certificate of poverty from the Kirk Session of the parish in which the poor litigant lives, and then employs a Poor's agent in Edinburgh to have the litigant admitted to the Poor's Roll in Edinburgh. This admission only takes place when evidence sufficient to support a competent case is submitted. The evidence is collected by the local agent and transmitted to the Edinburgh Poor's agent. The Edinburgh Poor's agent engages Poor's counsel when the case has been sufficiently advanced to be brought before the court.

I have ascertained that poor litigants frequently employ local agents who are not Poor's agents. In such cases local agents agree to accept a very modified fee, but these local agents must employ the Poor's agents in Edinburgh, otherwise the litigants could not be admitted to the Poor's Roll.

I have now ascertained that the case I cited where the expenses were 13*l.* 15*s.* was one of these—the local agent not being a Poor Agent, but charging a modified fee and employing a Poor's agent in Edinburgh.

This custom has arisen through litigants who have themselves had the benefit of the Poor's Roll taking others in a similar plight to the same agent whose term of office has, by that time, expired.

Mr. Soutar's letter may be taken as a general estimate for undefended cases. The expenses in a defended case would be much more, but these are few amongst the poor.

Trusting these particulars will be of use to the Commission.

Yours faithfully,

Jessie W. Allan.

The Hon. H. Gorell Barnes.

11, Whitehall Street, Dundee,

Dear Miss Allan, 18th November, 1910.

With reference to your call upon me when you desired me to give details of the expense of an action of divorce carried through on the Poor's Roll I think the undernoted particulars may suit your purpose.

The sum which is generally asked by agents varies from 5*l.* to 10*l.* The minimum cost of 5*l.* would be made up as follows:—

	£	s.	d.
Making copies of precognitions of pursuer and witnesses to send to Edinburgh Agent for the Poor—in all 10 sheets of 250 words each	0	15	0
Fee to messenger-at-arms for serving summons upon defender and for citing witnesses to attend court	0	10	0
Railway fares of three witnesses (Saturday fare)	0	15	0
Allowances to three witnesses for time and food, say 5*s.* each	0	15	0
Postages and incidental outlays, such as stationery and expense incurred in visiting witnesses, say	0	5	0
Payment to Edinburgh agent to cover his outlays, which would include copies of precognitions for himself and for counsel	2	0	0

In certain cases the witnesses number more than I have allowed for, and an additional outlay of from 15*s.* to 1*l.* would be required for each additional witness.

It is understood that Poor's agents must give their services free of charge, but are entitled to ask poor litigants to furnish all outlays. It is difficult to define exactly what would be covered by "outlays," but the practice is, as I have informed you, to make a general charge up to 10*l.* according to the labour involved in the case. Agents doubtless consider that they are entitled to take into account office rent, clerks' services, and stationery over and above cash actually expended, so that it is impossible to figure out exactly how the sum asked from litigants is expended. The bulk of the outlay is, of course, borne by the local agent, so that the Edinburgh agent's outlays are simply an allowance against office rent, clerks' services in furnishing copies of precognitions for counsel and for agents' own use, and in some cases the fees of a messenger-at-arms where these are not paid by the local agent.

I may add that in some cases the agent goes to Edinburgh to attend the proof, and this would add about 10*s.* more to his outlays.

I hope the above may be sufficient for your purpose.

Yours faithfully,

CHAS. SOUTAR.

The Hon. HENRY GORELL BARNES recalled and further examined.

36,585. (Chairman.) I believe you have communicated with the President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division with a view of obtaining through him statistics showing the marriages within the various denominations in the case of marriages dissolved by the Divorce Court?—I did

36,586. I think that instructions were given to the Registry to prepare them, and the result is that the Registry has sent you a paper showing the total number of divorces in 1907 and 1908, and the denominations which they have recorded, of the people?—Of course, as recorded in the petitions.

36,587. They are only taken from the petitions?—Yes.

36,588. It would not necessarily show the exact facts?—No, they are taken as they state them.

36,589. I just put that in. We referred to the figures the other day?—The table is as follows:—

EDGAR BRIERLEY, Esq.
J. A. SPENDER, Esq.

The Hon. HENRY GORELL BARNES (Secretary).
J. E. G. DE MONTMORENCY, Esq. (Assistant Secretary).

Mr. ROBERT JOHN PARR called and examined.

36,590. (Chairman.) You are director of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children?—Yes.

36,591. How long have you filled that capacity?—Since 1905.

36,592. Were you associated with it before that?—I was assistant secretary to the former director, the Rev. Benjamin Waugh, from 1900 to 1904, and assistant director from 1904 to 1905.

36,593. You have had a long experience?—Previous to that I was a speaker and organiser for the society, and before that again I was connected with the work of the society for many years in the country as a member of a local committee.

36,594. You may be taken to represent very fully the experience you have had of the prevention of cruelty to children, and that bears a good deal on the subject under consideration?—Yes.

36,595. Your society is incorporated by Royal Charter which was granted in 1895, and its area extends over England, Ireland, and Wales?—Yes, that is so.

36,596. Not Scotland?—No, they have a separate society.

36,597. During the year ending March 31st, 1905, the society's inspectors inquired into 49,792 cases of cruelty to children?—They did. May I add this statement was prepared some months ago. I should like to put in the figures for 1910 now available. There were 52,670 cases in that year.

36,598. You wish them to be included in these cases. Was the result to show there was a very large number of cases in which there was in fact cruelty to children?—Only 3 per cent. were found to be reported without reason. Only 3·5 per cent. of the cases are dropped.

36,599. What happens to the rest—prosecutions?—No. In 1909 out of 49,792 cases we prosecuted 2,399 only; in 1910 out of the 52,670 cases our prosecutions were 2,466 only.

36,600. What was the result of your prosecutions, broadly speaking, convictions?—Taking the figures for 1910, the prosecutions were 2,466 and the convictions 2,397. The proportion of convictions to prosecutions is a trifle over 97 per cent.

36,601. What happened to that mass of cases beyond those that were prosecuted?—Those were successfully warned by our 250 inspectors, warning followed by frequent visits with supervision, giving friendly advice and persuasion to parents to perform their duties.

36,602. Are there any other figures worth mentioning?—I think that covers the main facts.

36,603. They are very interesting figures indeed. You say in the next paragraph that during the year ending 31st March 1909, 2,399 cases were sufficiently grave to warrant the prosecution of one or both parents?—That is so.

36,604. In the next paragraph, having pointed out your interests are primarily concerned with the children, yet you cannot but be impressed with the large amount of domestic unhappiness existing in the homes where children are neglected or illtreated; therefore you come into contact with the general social conditions of these people?—We do.

36,605. Perhaps you would kindly read your proof from there, and then I will ask you about it?—Though it is true that the society deals with an abnormal condition of affairs, I believe that few people have any real idea of the misery caused to children by the unhappy relations existing between parents. The society is frequently asked to assist in securing judicial separations.

36,606. Has the society been asked through its inspectors as to divorce?—Yes, incidentally, but not to a very great extent, because it is generally known amongst the class of people with whom our inspectors work that there is no opportunity for divorce at present.

36,607. They know about the magistrates' powers, and therefore they ask for judicial separation?—They do.

36,608. To what extent have you had knowledge of applications in which divorce has been suggested?—I should say in not a very large number of cases.

36,609. For the reason you have given?—Yes. The first, and indeed the only consideration under such circumstances, is whether a separation would be for the benefit of the children, and it is only under such conditions that the society's assistance is given. I may say we are not concerned in matrimonial disputes as such. The business of the officer is not to act as peacemaker between husband and wife so much as to secure for the children of the home proper treatment at the hands of the parents. Taking one year, 1907, I find in 73 cases the society has advised or helped with regard to obtaining separation orders, or enforcing maintenance orders under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, and the Licensing Act, 1902. That is an average year. There would have been a large number of cases in the same period in which for the same reason it was considered inexpedient to render such help. I may say that the total number of 73 cases in which we advised or helped by no means cover the whole number of applications received. A very large number of suggestions are made to individual inspectors by people whose houses they visit, that they should be assisted, but we have a system whereby the local inspector cannot advise. All advice as to prosecution, or judicial separation, is given from our Law Department in London, and from the whole of England, Ireland, and Wales the inspectors send their reports to the central office, and we decide there as to what action shall be taken.

36,610. Apparently, being most interested in the children, you only take up a few cases of helping to separate?—That is so.

36,611. You give six cases in which there has been assistance by the society in getting their separation orders?—Yes. Those cases are as follows:—

"Pontypridd, 2740, Dec. 1909.—A. G. W. is the wife of a man, a surveyor. She is of the middle class, and well brought up. The man is a waster, who did no work for three years. He drank heavily and gambled. Illtreated his wife. The furniture was sold piecemeal. The family were living in an empty cottage when the society intervened, and were dependent on food given by maternal grandmother and neighbours. The woman is an excellent mother."

"E. Cheshire, 1433, May 1909.—S. R. is the wife of a coal miner. The man is of drunken habits, most of his earnings being spent on drink. He illused his wife, threatened the children, using most disgusting and violent language to them. His wife went in fear of serious injury. She is a hard working and most respectable woman."

"Cheltenham, 1154, Jan. 1909.—F. W. is an excellent mother. Her husband is a saw setter and grinder, who did practically nothing to support his wife and two young children. He drinks to excess, brutally illtreated his wife, who, with her children, was more than half starved. She had to obtain police protection more than once."

"Doncaster, 1947, March 1909.—L. B., the wife of a filler at a coal pit, with two children. She was 19 years old and her husband 22. The eldest child was born three weeks before marriage. The wife and children were literally starving. The man rarely worked but when he did his money was spent in drink and gambling. His mother fed him and encouraged him to illtreat his wife."

"Barnsley, 1958, April 1909.—A. H., the wife of a miner. The man is lazy, and loses the greater part of what he earns in gambling. His wife had to sell the furniture to buy food for her three young children. If the man was not provided with food he would illtreat his wife."

"Bradford, 2111, October 1909.—M. C., the wife of a comb minder, with three children. Having been imprisoned for two months for assaulting his wife, he left her without means and did nothing to support his children. There is a long list of convictions against him, one of six months for an aggravated assault. His wife stood in fear of him."

36,612. Now we come to paragraph 12?—I believe that the present system of separation without complete freedom is cruel and conduces to immorality.

36,613. I would like you to give the grounds upon which you state that?—In the specimen cases that follow later on, particularly with regard to insanity that we shall reach presently, we find that a man separated from his wife, or a woman separated from her husband, almost invariably enters into cohabitation with some other person. It frequently happens that, as the result,—I will go further, and say it invariably happens as the result of that cohabitation children are born, and we have frequently found that when a woman is separated from her husband, or the husband from the wife, certain children of the marriage being taken to live with either of the people who have separated, and other children being born, the difficulty that invariably arises with two families is the reason of our being called in. The children of the marriage are neglected, while the children of the illicit union are cared for by both parents, and it is my experience that as at present arranged these separations, in so far as our own experience goes—I can say nothing of those outside—in which we have intervened to save the children, the great tendency is towards immorality —illicit unions, I would say.

36,614. Do you represent that as extensive or confined to solitary cases?—The whole of this evidence, I think, must be relative, because I am bound to say that, speaking of the poor generally as a class, they are particularly moral. That is my experience. In all I say with reference to these cases I must tie myself down to the former statement, that we are dealing with an abnormal condition of affairs.

36,615. I mean extensive having regard to the cases in which you intervened; that is all?—Yes, certainly that.

36,616. Then will you proceed to paragraph 13?—I am strongly of opinion that increased facilities for divorce should be given to poor people who can prove (a) continued drunkenness, (b) insanity, (c) brutality, (d) incest.

36,617. Your view would be that then there would be the freedom to contract a lawful union?—Yes.

36,618. And you would not have these mixed families?—Yes, and, indeed, that the conditions of home life for the children would be, so far as we could make them, normal. Our idea of reform, so far as the condition of the children is concerned, is that the reform should take place in the homes where the children live. As a society we are entirely against the State interference for the removal of the child, believing that the proper place for the child is in the home of its parents. Our experience, as you will see by the figures, in successfully warning such a large number of delinquent parents is an indication of the fact that with proper treatment that end is secured. May I add this. Each case of cuelty or neglect is treated more as a case of disease than as a crime. Each case dealt with by individual inspectors is treated very much in the same way as a case would be treated in hospital by a doctor. No two cases are alike: no one remedy will apply to two separate cases. In all these matters in dealing with the individual cases of cruelty and neglect the only possible chance of safeguarding the interest of the children is to give freedom to the aggrieved party, either in drunkenness, insanity, brutality or incest, the moral condition of the home being usually bad, and the mental condition of the children or child being jeopardised by the naturally bad results, and defects of home life.

36,619. I think we fully appreciate your point. Then you deal with these individually?—With reference to drunkenness, the society has had great experience in the working of the Inebriates Act, 1898, especially with regard to placing women in inebriate reformatories. Since 1898 the society has been the means of committing 350 people, mostly women, to such reformatories out of a total number of 443 persons so committed.

36,620. That figure of 443 is the total for the country?—Yes. Out of that number 350 have been committed at the instance of the society. Your Lordship will remember under the section 1. of the Inebriates Act any person who is charged with an offence of cruelty or neglect, if it can be shown that the cruelty or neglect is caused by drink, instead of being fined or sent to prison, can be committed to quarter sessions and be there tried as an inebriate, and the offence of cruelty can be dealt with by committing the person to an inebriate reformatory for a period not exceeding three years.

36,621. I think that is the Act of 1898?—Yes. In many cases reformatory treatment has been successful in effecting a cure, a low estimate being 44 per cent. There are a number of cases coming under the description of continued drunkenness where great hardships have arisen, especially to children, because of the inability of a parent to obtain divorce.

36,622. You say there is a number. Can you give any notion of what that means?—I am afraid I could not give you actual figures, but I can tell you that the effect on my mind of constantly having to consider cases of prosecution, over a number of years, for cases of difficulty are brought to me direct, leads me to say that where the husband or wife is an habitual drunkard the moral conditions are such that it would be to the advantage of either the husband or the wife to obtain freedom for the sake of the children. You will notice that one or two specimen cases are very striking as illustrating that particularly. Without taking the whole of them, I may call attention to the specimen case on the top of page 8.

"C.O., 57,688, Oct. 1905.—M. J. P. A drunkard for 9 years, husband a greengrocer with a good business. The children were grossly neglected. When in drink the woman was violent and of dirty habits, There had been two separations. Afterwards the woman was sent to an inebriate reformatory for three years. On her return home she relapsed; her habits were disgusting. She would sometimes walk into the shop quite naked, with filth all over her."

36,623. Your point is that the husband having such a state of things at home, in the interest of the children, should be allowed absolute freedom—the case is practically hopeless?—That is so. That is not an unusual case, two separations and three years in the inebriate reformatory.

36,624. Two separations against her for drunkenness?—Yes, in the court of petty sessions. If I may go back for one moment to the further fact, just to state it, the cures in the cases treated in the inebriate reformatories are about 44 per cent. There remain these cases outside indicated by this specimen, and that is one of a very large number that could be supplied. These are the failures in which one seeks relief for the benefit of the children.

36,625. They come out at the end of the three years and revert to the old conditions?—Yes, they break out again. This is another case:—

"Sydenham, 1352, July 1903.—M. J. M., a drunkard for several years. Separated from her husband, people of the middle class. She had been in an inebriate reformatory for two years. The man attributes the idiocy of their son to his wife's misconduct, and has a great hatred of her."

In such cases I think divorce should be possible.

36,626. Before we leave that, because this is a very important question, would your view be, after your experience, that divorce in these cases would tend to the morality of the country, or tend to a variation of the standard of marriage?—From my experience of this class of case I should say, with conviction and without hesitation, that it would tend to increased morality, and would create a different feeling in regard to marriage on the part of people, not only those who receive freedom from it, but on the part of their neighbours. I think the existing condition of things—I will not say "I think," I am sure from my experience of individual cases that the existing condition of things contributes very largely to the low standard of feeling and thought in relation to marriage generally, particularly in streets and districts where people of this kind live.

36,627. Now we pass to paragraph 20?—Then there are the cases of insanity where relief should be obtainable. Here are three typical cases:—

"C.O. 83,407, Feb. 1910.—S. cohabits with a man, her husband being helplessly insane and in an asylum for ten years. There are two children of the marriage and one of the illicit union."

"C.O. 83,611, Feb. 1910.—M. Husband in an asylum, said to be a hopeless case. The woman works, receives parish relief, and some help from children."

"C.O. 83,608, Feb. 1910.—J. Wife in an asylum. No probability of her release. The man is cohabiting with a widow."

In each of those cases there has been no prosecution, but we were called in because of what I said just now. Some of the children were being improperly treated, and in each case we found a warning by the officer was sufficient. The inspector warned in each case, and on following that up with supervision we found that the children of the marriage were being properly treated, as well treated as the children of the illicit union. Warning had the desired effect.

36,628. The two typical cases resulted in an illicit union because the other party to the marriage is confined hopelessly in an asylum?—Yes. I have found only one or two exceptions where we have dealt with cases where one or other of the parties is confined in an asylum. It is very rarely found that the person living at home has kept free from such an illicit union.

36,629. Can you give any notion of the extent to which those cases have been brought before you? You say they are typical cases?—It is very difficult to speak in scores or hundreds, but in relation to the cases generally they are not a large proportion. The cases of insanity are not large in proportion to the general number of cases. I should not like it taken, as we had 52,670 cases last year, that a large number related to people who were in asylums.

36,630. Are there enough, in your view, without getting exact figures, to justify an intervention on the ground that there is a substantial case?—I should say so, certainly. I considered that very carefully before putting it in my notes, and it occurred to me that the condition of things was such, and the proportion of cases such, that one was warranted in including that as a real reason.

36,631. Then paragraph 21?—Though drunkenness is often accompanied by brutality, there are exceptions, and I suggest that, whether the result of drink or without it, long continued brutality should be a reason for divorce.

36,632. Again you give illustrations?—Yes. They are as follows:—

"C.O. 81,359, Feb. 1910.—A. P. Husband an engraver, drinks heavily, and uses disgusting language, quarrels with and illtreats his wife, and has illtreated their boy, 6 years old; this boy is terrorised by his father. The woman wishes to leave her husband, as she fears for her life, but he follows her."

"West Ham, February 1910.—F. After several years of marriage these people could not agree, there were frequent quarrels, and eventually a separation with maintenance order. The man did not keep up his payments and went to live with another woman. To nullify the order, after promise of amendment he persuaded his wife to take him back. He stayed with his wife less than a week, illtreated her twice with violence, and then returned to the other woman. The wife has a hard struggle to maintain herself and two children, and would be only too glad to get a divorce."

"West Ham, February 1910.—L. After several years of married life husband and wife quarrelled frequently and fought. There was a separation order with maintenance, but no payment was made. The man went to live with a woman separated from her husband. She has three children. The woman took her five children and is cohabiting with a man living apart from his wife; he has four children."

It is necessary to observe here that the cases quoted as illustrations under each head are types of many others, full particulars of which can be supplied if necessary.

36,633. Before we pass from the last head, I should like to ask whether you have found—because I see there is one illustration, the last one—that brutality also leads to illicit unions?—Very often.

36,634. How is that?—The wife illtreated by the husband leaves him, and often without a separation. She is practically thrown ont of her house. There are one or two cases that illustrate that in the specimens I have given. The wife beaten by the husband goes off and lives with another man: she takes the children of the marriage. Again there are children as the result of cohabitation, and that is the cause of our being called in.

36,635. Have you had any experience of the operation of separation orders granted by the magistrates?—Yes.

36,636. To what extent have they contributed to illicit unions?—To such an extent that I recommend a little further on that such separations should be terminable at the end of 12 months.

36,637. I am so anxious to omit nothing, that perhaps I am anticipating?—I submit that, apart from the question of immorality resulting from the promiscuous association of these people, there are grave questions arising out of the physical and mental sufferings of the children and the unhappy influences surrounding their lives, particularly relating to these cases of brutality. I have known many cases where children, quite small children, have got up in the middle of the night and have been found by our inspectors in the streets terrified as the result of brutality inflicted by the husband on the wife. They have been taken in by kindly neighbours, sometimes taken to our local inspectors' houses and there sheltered, frequently in a state of terror, and in one or two cases the children have been so neglected that they have been removed from their parents under custody orders, and have been transferred to my legal custody. I have found difficulty in getting them placed in homes because of their mental condition. My fear is, in this connection, that part of the insanity we have to deal with may be traced—I am not a doctor—to this state of terror in which the children live for so many years at the most impressionable time of their life. It is mainly in the interest of these children my recommendations are made. There remains one other subject to be specially referred to, that of incest; for though the actual physical results to children cannot be classed in the same order as those arising from drunkenness or brutality, the moral danger is great. May I put in here the number of incest cases we have had I was not able to obtain them at the time of writing my notes. It occurs to me to be important. Your Lordship will remember that the Punishment of Incest Act came into force on the 1st January 1908, and under that Act proceedings are ordered to be taken by the Attorney-General or the Director of Public Prosecutions. In practice the Attorney-General has not intervened, but the Director of Public Prosecutions has ordered such prosecutions as have taken place. We have as a society been working in co-operation with the Director of Public Prosecutions, and at his request all such cases as we discover have been handed on to him without our making any inquiry into it, and I find that from the 1st January 1909 to the 12th August——

36,638. I thought you said it came into operation on the 1st January 1908?—Yes, but we had no arrangement with the Director of Public Prosecutions till 1909. From the 1st January 1909 to the 12th August 1910 we reported 68 cases of incest to him.

36,639. Always with children?—All these with children, the object of our being called in of course being that the case was of a child under 16 years of age. Of that total, proceedings were taken in 22 cases. In 46 cases no action was taken, the difficulty of corroboration being a very practical difficulty in such cases. As your Lordship will see from the specimen cases, it so often happens the man terrorises the child by threatening to murder it if any tale is told, and therefore it is most difficult to obtain corroboration of the actual offence. Two cases are still awaiting trial at the Assizes.

36,640. Of the 22 how many were convicted?—All save one. I put in this fact for what it is worth, it is indicative of the gravity of the offence, in these 22 cases in which there was prosecution, 41½ years imprisonment were inflicted by the judges.

36,641. On the total cases?—Yes. I think perhaps one of the worst, if I may give the result of that without troubling you with the details of it, because you have them in the specimens, occurred at Bristol, in which the Commissioner, Mr. W. E. Harrison, K.C., sentenced a man to 15 years' penal servitude for a gross offence against his little girl of 10 years.

36,642. Will you tell me again the dates—January 1st, 1909, till when?—From the 1st January 1909 to the 12th August 1910, there were 68 cases reported. If I may I will hand in this paper.

* Two cases are awaiting trial at Assizes.

From 12*th August to* 31*st October* 1910.

Nine cases reported to the police (not known if any proceedings taken).

36,643. For the year 1909 only 18 cases were reported to the Public Prosecutor, whereas from the 1st January to the 12th August of this year 50 cases were reported. Why is it for this shorter period there are so many more cases?—The greater knowledge of the existence of the law. We find that in all new legislation. It takes two or three years before people get to know what can be done under the Act, and in addition to that there is a difficulty until the public know that your method of enforcing the law is reasonable; they hesitate before reporting cases to you. When they find you can deal effectively with a certain class of case they are much more ready to report it to you. I ascribe the increase very largely to the growth of public confidence in the efficiency of the Incest Act to deal with these terrible cases.

36,644. From the 12th August to the 31st October, nine cases are reported, but it is not time yet to know what is the result?—No: they are at present in the hands of the Public Prosecutor.

36,645. We shall probably not complete our labours for a good many months yet. Would you mind sending us at the end of June next a complete report for this year and up to then?—I shall be happy to do that.

36,646. A schedule in addition to this one?—Yes.

36,647. Then will you proceed with paragraph 26?—The society has had considerable experience with this class of offence, and has found that many women who are poor and who suffer from great mental cruelty desire the same privilege as would be granted to them if they had means, the opportunity of applying for a divorce.

36,648. Then you instance some of the cases?—Yes.

"Peterborough, 1854, June 1909.—A labourer had regular sexual intercourse for four years with a daughter now aged 15 years; he also similarly abused a daughter aged fourteen. The mother's intervention was prevented by threats of violence."

"Bristol 2012, Nov. 1909.—A labourer criminally assaulted his daughter aged 10 years. He took prostitutes home and misconducted himself in the presence of his wife. On one occasion he brought a man home to assault his wife, and held the door to prevent her escape."

"Westminster, 555, March 1907.—A police pensioner from Metropolitan Police had for four years regularly abused his daughter, now aged 16 years. The girl and her mother, who knew what was going on, were in fear of their lives."

"Rochester, 2693, Nov. 1909.—A labourer for three years had occasional intercourse with his daughter, now aged 16 years, and similarly abused a daughter now aged 13. Wife ignorant; girls were bound to secrecy under threats of murder."

"Newport, 4042, Feb. 1910.—A collier has a daughter aged 11 years whom he has abused occasionally for some time past. Threatened her with vengeance if she told her mother."

"Grimsby, 2868, Feb. 1910.—A labourer has a daughter now nearly 18 years whom he has been in the habit of assaulting since she left school, and for some time before. By threats he induced her to keep the matter secret until recently. The mother was ignorant of the misconduct."

I could give you a brief statement of the whole of the cases that we have reported to the Director of Public Prosecutions. It is a terrible record, but it is of great importance in this connection. With very little difficulty I could give you a return of them all.

36,649. If you would kindly send us that we should be obliged?—Just in brief form as you have the specimen cases, and giving the result in each case.

36,650. The law at present would allow of those people getting a divorce, because it admits of divorce on the ground of incestuous adultery?—Yes.

36,651. This is directed, not to the ground, but to the means, which are excessive and not within their reach ?—Yes, the prohibitive cost. Where convictions are obtained under the Punishment of Incest Act, 1908, I would suggest that divorce be obtainable by the wife of a man so convicted.

36,652. That is why I asked you the question. It is obtainable, but not practically obtainable ?—Yes. To be of any service to the people with whom the society has to deal, divorce must be made cheaper. I would put in a case, if I might, from the "Manchester Evening Chronicle," one of these typical cases where a man had a wife who was practically incorrigible, and had two or three separations, and was advised by the justices' clerk to obtain a divorce, but it was pointed out in court that a divorce would cost 30*l.*, which was quite prohibitive. That is a typical case and advances my argument. If I may put that in it would perhaps cover that matter.

36,653. I do not think you need put that in; we have had the question of cost so fully before us that we thoroughly realise it ?—In my opinion power might well be given to county court judges, or might equally well be conferred upon the courts of summary jurisdiction throughout the country, where stipendiary magistrates sit. Where, owing to the poverty of the applicant, there is a difficulty in securing legal aid, I would recommend that aid be provided at the instance of the court. May I say in connection with that that our experience with applications for judicial separation is that the woman, who is invariably the applicant, is in such a condition of poverty that she cannot make her own application, and our intervention on her behalf and in the interest of the children is really to provide legal aid. We instruct our solicitor to make the application on her behalf, feeling sure that it will be better for her that she should obtain a judicial separation.

36,654. Apart from your aid, how do you suggest, as a practical matter, she should act ?—If jurisdiction were given to the local County Court, the registrar, I would recommend, should have power to provide legal assistance, or if to a stipendiary, the clerk to the court might be applied to, and if the stipendiary agreed that legal assistance should be given, something in the same way as it is now given to poor prisoners in the higher court.

36,655. You would apply that both to separation cases before the magistrates and to divorce cases ?—I have not thought of it in connection with separations, more particularly with regard to divorce. So far as I can see now there is no great hardship with regard to separations as to cost; separations are usually dealt with quickly, and it is a question of one guinea in all probability. I fear legal aid in questions of divorce, even if divorce is made cheaper, would involve a greater expense than that.

36,656. You think they can get relief so far as the applications to magistrates are concerned ?—Yes. If children are concerned the Society will help. There are local philanthropic agencies in most towns, and rescue societies to help poor women in such need, who might provide legal aid. I am afraid, if it came to asking them to provide more than a guinea, their funds would not stand it.

36,657. Have you been present at many of the separation cases ?—Not personally.

36,658. Do you know from the reports of your officers or other experience as to whether the separation cases are satisfactorily dealt with ?—Yes; each officer sends a report daily to me on any case in which he has appeared in any part of the country, and if anything happens out of the ordinary way he is instructed to report that. I do not remember throughout my experience having any comment made as to any suggestion that could be made with regard to separation orders. Speaking broadly, the Justices are most sympathetic to these poor women, and render facilities for relief of this kind, if you can establish your case and show in the interests of the children it should be granted.

36,659. Do you find, or not, that they are too sympathetic ?—I would not say that.

36,660. Will you proceed with your proof ?—In each case a short report should be made to one of the Registrars of the Divorce Court for confirmation. Any question in dispute might be referred to one of the Registrars of the Divorce Court, or, if necessary, to the President, and power might be given to the Court appointed to refer to the Divorce Court for direction on any matter of difficulty which might arise. Power should be retained to grant separation orders, but these should, in my judgment, only be regarded as tentative. The period for which a separation order is granted should not exceed 12 months, and at the end of that time it should be open to either of the parties to apply for a dissolution of marriage.

36,661. Do you regard the magistrates' jurisdiction as disciplinary and properly confined to that ?—Yes. I am going back to a point I tried to make just now in dealing with a case, showing the treatment of it. Where separation is a part of that treatment, we still follow the home and look after the children, care for the mother, sometimes pay the rent, tide her over a difficulty, and still continue, as far as we are able, to exercise some restriction over the delinquent husband, finding him work if he will take it, and treating him practically as a man who wants assistance. To that end I think it would be of enormous advantage if the man knew, when a separation was granted, that he would be compelled to attend in 12 months before the same Court and give an account of himself. For men of that type it would be an excellent discipline. As it is, they seem to think they have thrown off all the responsibility. An order for maintenance is frequently made which is not complied with, and most of the trouble arises from that fact. The woman without means goes to live with another man.

36,662. Whatever form it takes, you think that the magistrates' powers as such should be exercised as a treatment, and, if found unsuccessful, allow the application for complete separation to be made in a proper court for that purpose ?—Yes. The Court should consider the question of the future of children and have power to make reasonable provision for their maintenance, the wishes of both parties being taken into consideration, except where it was found that a parent had disentitled himself to any voice in their future. I was thinking in that last sentence of cases of incest, where the man has obviously robbed himself of his right to say anything about the future of his children. It is my experience that Separation Orders as granted at present are of no benefit: they break up the home, leaving neither husband nor wife in an independent position, while children are often left unprovided for and deprived of their legitimate protectors.

36,663. You mean granted in the form of permanent separation, instead of being of a temporary character ?—Yes. I am of opinion that increased facilities for divorce as advocated here would not materially lessen the power of the marriage tie. On the contrary, I am inclined to think that the marriage bond would be strengthened, for if either party to the union knew that divorce proceedings could be taken there would be a restraining influence on both.

Nor do I believe that by making relief as wide as possible it would interfere with the conscientious opinions of those who regard marriage as a sacrament.

The publication of reports of divorce proceedings should be forbidden. They are injurious to young people, by lowering the ideals of life, and by throwing a glamour of publicity on indecency. In reference to that, I should like to say I have had frequent reports from honorary workers of the Society. We have a very large body of lady workers, 15,000 throughout the whole of England, Ireland, and Wales, who are concerned in distributing literature giving information as to how cases can be reported, and to mothers who are ignorant as to how to bring up their babies, and I frequently obtain reports from them, particularly in certain districts—I will not particularise the districts—where young girls leaving work at mills buy up copies of the evening papers and read the details of police court cases, which are the subject of conversation in the works for the whole of the next few days, much to their disadvantage, it is said.

36,664. Have those reports been frequently made to you?—I should say that in connection with most of the cases that have attained great publicity. Some such remark as that has been made by one or other of our workers in different parts of the country. The strange thing about it is that it is not confined to any one part. I have had the same thing said over a period of several years from almost every part of the country, and suggestions made that we should refer to the matter in our monthly paper and call attention to the fact. We have not done so because I knew of the sitting of the Commission, but it is a matter that is causing grave anxiety to people who are interested. I am not now referring to the ordinary social worker, the paid worker, but to the voluntary worker who gives up time and devotes a good deal of time to improving the conditions of the poor, and especially workers in Girls' Clubs.

36,665. You have had experience of the Children's Court under the recent Act?—Yes.

36,666. Would your view be that marriage disputes should be heard in the same way?—Yes. I would suggest that the same power be given to the Judge as is given by statute under the Children Act, to exclude from the court any persons when a charge is being enquired into in which the morality of a young girl is concerned. It is Section 114 of the Children Act—power to clear the court.

36,667. You would apply that to separation orders and divorce cases?—Yes. Finally, I say it is not desirable from the standpoint of national well-being that men and women should lead lives of perpetual irritation or martyrdom, and it is not to the advantage of the children who will form the next generation.

(Chairman.) I ought to thank you for your very instructive paper; it is a most valuable one.

36,668. (Mr. Spender.) May I ask you to expand a little what you said in paragraph 40 about the Press and the publication of divorce proceedings. You say in your proof that the publication of divorce proceedings should be forbidden. In your illustration and your answer to the Chairman you extended that to police court cases. You said you had reports that the young people were corrupted by reading reports of police court cases?—I should not wish to convey that. If I was taken to say I would put the same restriction on separations I should like to qualify that. I do not think there is any great difficulty in having those reported, because as a rule there are no details. It is generally conveyed in a brief paragraph; the proceedings are usually taken early in the court, or after other business has been completed, and it is generally confined to a small paragraph. I was thinking more of the occurrence of taking divorce cases in any other court than the High Court, and the same provision should apply then.

36,669. You would agree that a large part of these reports which have this effect are not merely divorce court reports but are police court reports raising sexual issues and containing indecent details?—That is so.

36,670. Consequently, if we closed the divorce court we should only touch the fringe?—I should hope the influence would be extended and eventually we might improve the condition of affairs.

36,671. You hope for some kind of rule which would apply to all sexual and indecent cases, whether divorce court, police court cases, or criminal cases raising an issue of indecency?—Yes.

36,672. Have you any idea how that could be managed? You suggest only the interference of the judge or the magistrate in a particular case?—I am bound to say the great hope I have is that the proprietors and managers of papers themselves will help us, as they are constantly helping in all these ways. When it is brought before them, I believe they will themselves render the greatest assistance to us.

36,673. I agree with you in hoping that, but in all professions there are certain persons who, if the particular trade is very lucrative, are likely to pursue it apart from public opinion. We are considering what possible restraint in law we could get at. Do you rely on the action of the magistrate or the judge in the particular case, or would you try to form a rule to cover the whole ground?—Provided we could have a similar provision as exists in the Children Act.

36,674. That is, the power of hearing in camera?—Yes.

36,675. (Chairman.) Would you read the section?—Yes. Section 114 is: "In addition and without prejudice to any powers which a Court may possess to hear proceedings in camera the Court may, where a person who, in the opinion of the Court, is a child or young person is called as a witness in any proceedings in relation to an offence against, or any conduct contrary to, decency or morality, direct that all or any persons, not being members or officers of the court or parties to the case, their counsel or solicitors, or persons otherwise directly concerned in the case, be excluded from the court during the taking of the evidence of the child or young person: provided that nothing in this section shall authorise the exclusion of bonâ fide representatives of a newspaper or news agency. This last sentence is the unfortunate addendum which so often happens in Acts of Parliament, and which bothers us who are trying to deal with these things.

36,676. (Mr. Spender.) While the representatives of the Press are present, the magistrate in that case asks them not to report the case, and that is final?—That is so.

36,677. Your suggestion is that it should be left to the discretion of the magistrate or the judge in a particular case to apply that section, and that it should be extended to all cases where it is a sexual issue or indecency, that that discretion should be given to the judge or magistrate in all cases?—And I think also that a circular from the Home Office to the clerks of the justices calling attention to such a provision to be used in certain cases would in all probability strengthen the hands of the justices and stipendiaries.

36,678. How far is it within the power of the magistrate at the present time to clear the court on his own initiative, without that extra section at all?—I think Mr. Brierley could tell us better than I can.

(Mr. Brierley.) We have no power.

36,679. (Mr. Spender.) There are cases a magistrate can hear in camera?—I know of no other provisions save this which is contained in the Children Act. We rather looked upon that as a great step forward.

(Chairman.) I do not think it ought to be taken that the magistrates in the theory of the law have no power: you will find plenty of expressions in the debates on the Bills about publication, by some of the most learned lawyers in the House, that they have an inherent power in the interests of decency, and also if they find that a witness is oppressed by the publicity and cannot give evidence in the interests of justice, but those are only dicta.

(Mr. Spender.) It is not in the name of public decency. That is in pursuance of justice.

(Chairman.) In both instances, but they are only dicta; there is no Act about it.

36,680. (Mr. Spender.) Your view is that you would extend these provisions for decency to all cases, not divorce cases only, but separation cases and all police court cases, the reports of which might have a corrupting influence?—Yes.

36,681. You would not make a positive rule, but leave it to the discretion of the judge or magistrate in the particular case?—Yes.

36,682. You would look forward to the practical effect of that being the closing of the courts?—For deleting from the newspapers references to evidence affecting the sexual relations of people.

36,683. Would you see no possible dangers in the loss of a deterrent, in the case of a man who deserves to be disgraced publicly, or a woman?—I think any possible advantage that might follow from that is overwhelmed by the great disadvantages to the young people whose ideas of life are corrupted by what they hear.

36,684. Taking the experience of your Society, you would say, would you not, that the publicity given by the newspapers to the class of cases your Society is interested in has been a great help in stirring public opinion?—Most decidedly.

36,685. Then you somehow have to balance that, because if we shut up all the courts the advertisement your Society gets out of these cases in its efforts made on behalf of the children would go, and it would lose the public interest which is always aroused when these cases are reported, and especially so with your Society?—In that connection, may I say, owing to the system I have already described to his Lordship of governing the whole of the prosecutions from a great central authority, instead of dealing with them locally, whenever there are details in a report that appear to me in the exercise of my discretion to be unfit for publication, the letter of instructions to the local solicitor who appears for us will contain an intimation that he should ask that that part of the evidence should not be public, and he makes a request to the representatives of the local papers that that does not appear.

36,686. I follow that?—I would strike a line between the actual indecent cases with which we are mostly concerned, in which we prosecute, and cases of gross brutality or long-continued neglect, the details of which, sordid though they may be, are not corruptive.

36,687. We get to the point that we have to draw a line so as, if possible, not to entirely close these courts, but to keep alive the public interest in your part of the work, and at the same time follow if we could in practice what you do privately in your Society, to prevent the publication of the indecent details?—If you please.

36,888. That is a slightly different thing from what you say here, that the publication of proceedings should be forbidden?—I had this provision in my mind really when drafting this note. It is quite a piece of modern legislation, and I am afraid I had that in my mind. I am quite prepared to soften the word "forbidden" down to such limits as are suggested in the question.

36,689. May I ask you one question arising out of paragraph 28. From reading that, the conclusion I draw, I am not certain whether it is your conclusion, is that a conviction on that ground should ipso facto entitle a wife to a divorce?—Yes.

36,690. Is that your view?—Yes.

36,691. And say on the trial, supposing the wife presented her case at the prosecution of the husband, would you make divorce in those cases follow?—It was in my mind that power should be given to the judge hearing a case of incest to grant a divorce to the wife on her application there.

36,692. That is the point I wished to get at. In regard to your suggestion that the man should appear again at the end of 12 months, have you thought of any means of enforcing that if the man should disappear or pass out of the jurisdiction? We have had considerable evidence about that, that it was extremely difficult and costly to bring a man back within the jurisdiction again?—I do not think it would be costly in the great majority of cases. The only case I can think of where there has been expense in bringing back a man on a magistrate's warrant, is the case of a man who was charged at Liverpool and had to be brought back from Ireland, which, after all, was not very great.

36,693. We have had several cases suggesting that. You do not think, if you said definitely within 12 months for the worst class of offenders, that would be an incentive to vanish out of the district just before the 12 months were up?—No. My feeling is strengthened by the experience I have had in the working of the Probation of Offenders Act. The suggestion is practically to put a man on probation for 12 months, although I would not put that under the terms of the Act. Reverting to the idea that a case is to be treated, the exercise of certain influences on that man might in the meantime conduce to his resuming proper relations with his wife and doing his duty.

36,694. On the whole you think that is more likely to be the result in most cases than that the bad ones should attempt to disappear to avoid the trial?—Yes. If a man knew he would be called upon to come up at the end of 12 months there would be restraining influences on him, and our officers could exercise those influences in the right direction.

36,695. Has your Society advised clients to undertake suits for divorce in the High Court, or assisted them in that way?—We have only given assistance through allowing the inspector to appear and give evidence. We have, I should say, in half a dozen cases during the last 5 years allowed our inspectors to appear and give evidence of what they have found while visiting houses, in order that one or other of the persons might secure a divorce.

36,696. You do not provide funds or assist people?—No.

36,697. Practically you would say that divorce as it stands in the High Court is out of the reach of the great mass?—Quite; for the class of person whom we deal with, certainly.

36,698. (Sir Frederick Treves.) Your Society penetrates into all parts of the country?—Yes.

36,699. How many inspectors have you got?—250.

36,700. In addition to that there is a large number of voluntary workers?—Yes.

36,701. Amounting to thousands?—There are about 15,000 ladies who are engaged in circulating literature by which we get our cases. I ought to explain the inspectors do not discover cases. They enquire into the cases that are reported to them, and the cases are reported as the result of the labours of the ladies who circulate literature, giving the address of a person to whom complaint can be made.

36,702. Your Society has the fullest opportunity of becoming acquainted with the married life of the poor?—Yes.

36,703. To an exceptional degree?—Yes.

36,704. Is the general drift of your evidence that you regard the children as a great moral influence in maintaining the family tie?—Yes.

36,705. You would put that almost more strongly?—I should say it is essential to the happiness of home life that the interests of the children should be paramount.

36,706. In any divorce laws the case of the children ought to be specially considered?—Most decidedly.

36,707. From that point of view?—Yes.

36,708. As almost outside the actual child itself?—Yes. The only reason I have in advocating certain facilities in divorce is to secure proper treatment for the child and better influence for it, the existing conditions being inimical either to its moral or physical health.

36,709. With regard to continued drunkenness you consider that divorce is a better means of dealing with that than separation?—In such cases as these referred to, where there has been prolonged detention. We have had some extraordinary cures, I am bound to admit that. The longer period of detention the more chance of success we find.

36,710. In the case of drunkenness would you suggest that separation should precede divorce?—Yes, for the 12 months.

36,711. That is to say, it would not be a ground for divorce per se; separation would come first?—Yes.

36,712. And if the individual proved to be hopeless, then divorce?—Unless you had such a case as that quoted in the paper, which is typical of a great many, where the person has been a hopeless inebriate over a period of years. I could not suggest the period of years; it would be for wiser heads than mine, but in such a case quoted as the two separations and three years in an inebriate reformatory, I think the person should be entitled to divorce outright instead of separation first.

36,713. Have you been able to define "habitual" or "continued drunkenness"?—Scientifically, no.

36,714. Have you experienced any practical difficulty in the use of those terms?—No, I should say not, because we never take proceedings in court against any person in which we have not tried every other means of recovery. We find a woman who is said to be an habitual drunkard, and we try all sorts of reformatory influences. It is only when those have failed and warnings and supervisions have broken down that we go into court. Of the women taken into court to be dealt with as inebriates I do not remember many that have gone down. Conviction invariably follows because we have exhausted every other means first before taking her to quarter sessions. So far as the society is concerned, there has been no great difficulty in defining the person as an habitual inebriate.

36,715. I suppose where the wife happens to be committed, the condition of the children must be deplorable?—Beyond description in nine cases out of ten. I sent a good deal of evidence on that subject before the Departmental Committee inquiring into the working of the Inebriates Acts a short time ago.

36,716. As a matter of fact, in a case where the drunken wife is divorced, what becomes of the drunken wife? How is she supported?—That is a very practical difficulty, but in that matter I am afraid the only place to which she can drift would be the workhouse. I would deal much more firmly with her than leave the workhouse as the only place for her reception. I would treat her as a person to be permanently detained until she could prove herself cured.

36,717. In the greengrocer's case you quote, that woman would have to go to the workhouse?—Under existing circumstances. She has no means of support, and would have to apply to the Poor Law.

36,718. It is not suggested her late husband should contribute to her support?—Under those conditions, no, but I am hopeful we shall before many years detain such people as these permanently, and refuse to allow them out to reproduce their kind as is done now.

36,719. At the charge of the State?—Yes, treat her practically as it is proposed to treat the feeble-minded persons, as a hopelessly insane person on the drink question. I feel strongly that to let a person of that character perpetuate her kind is a national disaster.

36,720. You would not make that a feature of divorce law?—No; that is rather outside my suggestion here.

36,721. With regard to these cases of insanity, you have seen actual cases of hardship, of immorality, and of great discomfort and damage to the children?—In a great many cases.

36,722. That has been the direct experience of your society?—Yes.

36,723. You think there must be a large number of cases where insanity should lead to divorce?—Yes.

36,724. There is one small point arising out of a question Mr. Spender asked. In these cases of incest do we gather that if the case be proved ipso facto divorce follows, or is it left to the option of the wife?—There is no power now.

36,725. No, but supposing there was?—I suggest that it should be open to the wife to make such an application.

36,726. It is not compulsory?—No; it should be open to her to make an application on the conviction of the husband, should she so desire.

36,727. It does not follow as an addendum?—No; power should be given to make the application at that time.

36,728. (Sir William Anson.) These cases of incest and some others would be met if divorce was cheaper and more accessible to the poor?—Certainly.

36,729. And if you put the woman in the same position as the man?—Certainly.

36,730. The additions to be made to the grounds of divorce would be brutality, insanity, and drunkenness?—Long-continued drunkenness and such cases of extreme brutality as are instanced here.

36,731. It would be a matter of degree in each case?—Yes.

36,732. And the same with insanity, confirmed or hopeless insanity?—Yes.

36,733. Would you limit granting separation orders to those cases?—No. I would say nothing about the ordinary power of granting separations, because I have confined myself strictly to the cases in which separation is applied for and granted as a means of helping the children. On the broader question I have no authority to speak, nor much experience.

36,734. You would not regard the separation order as a necessary preliminary to divorce. I understood you to say that power should be retained to grant a separation order only as tentative and for a period of 12 months, and if the parties were not willing to come together again then either should be entitled to apply for divorce?—To make the application.

36,735. You would allow power to grant separation orders outside that?—Yes.

36,736. Outside the three elements of insanity, brutality, and drunkenness?—Certainly.

36,737. Would you think 12 months was long enough to determine these questions of insanity and drunkenness?—Yes. Extension of time could be granted. It could be within the power of the court to say, "We give you another six or twelve months," as in the case under the Probation of Offenders Act.

36,738. Would you leave it to the magistrates, to the same jurisdiction that grants the separation order?—Yes. I have nothing to say with regard to the present jurisdiction in that connection.

36,739. Would you leave the question of divorce to the same magistrate?—No; I would recommend divorce should be in the hands of the county court judge or a stipendiary magistrate, not of a bench of local justices.

36,740. (Mr. Burt.) With regard to the Inebriates Act, you have had some experience in watching its operation and in bringing cases before the court?—Yes.

36,741. That experience has been very satisfactory, according to the statistics. I think you say 44 per cent. of the cases have been cured?—Permanently cured.

36,742. That is an estimate. I suppose you have not definite figures?—Those figures are rather more than an estimate. They were worked out with some degree of accuracy for the purpose of helping the Select Committee on the working of the Inebriates Act. If that is material to the issue I could send a copy of the number of women who have been successfully cured from inebriety. It did not occur to me to do it.*

36,743. I am glad you make that statement, because you state in your proof that is a low estimate?—That is so.

36,744. It is probably under rather than above the actual number?—Yes. I ought to say that we do not speak of cures until a person has withstood temptation for three or four years. If a person remains sober for six months we do not consider it a cure. We should not include any case as a cure that had not stood three or four years. A woman is constantly visited on her release from the Inebriate Reformatory by a lady in the district, who will help to complete recovery, again treating these cases as requiring special attention.

36,745. I was going to put a question on that, but you have cleared it up. I think you say that the cases have been mostly women?—Yes.

36,746. There have been men also, I suppose?—Yes, but very few in comparison.

36,747. Has it also been satisfactory in the case of men?—We have not had a sufficient number to make the figures of any value. The feeling both of justices at petty sessions and at quarter sessions with regard to drunken men has been that a term of imprisonment in all probability would be more of a corrective than detention in a reformatory: but with regard to the women, they have proved more amenable to kindly influences, and it has been found that they are more subject to good treatment. The number of men so committed is not sufficiently large to be able to give any figures of value.

36,748. Imprisonment would carry with it, I suppose, the necessity of abstinence from drink?—Temporarily.

36,749. (Lady Frances Balfour.) I wanted to ask you about the history of the Incest Act. If I am right in my recollection, it was a long time before it was passed: it was brought before successive Parliaments?—Yes.

36,750. Your society and kindred philanthropic societies found the necessity of it very great?—Yes.

36,751. And the absence of such a law I am afraid caused a great increase in the offence?—Yes.

* See "The Report of the Inspector under the Inebriates Act, 1879 to 1900, for the year 1908," and particularly p. 9, et seq.

36,752. It was with excessive difficulty at last the law was passed?—Yes. I think the first statement of incest cases we made to the House of Commons was something like 15 years ago.

36,753. It came up to successive Governments, who paid no attention to it?—I am afraid to venture on the number of Bills we drafted and endeavoured to get introduced.

36,754. The House of Lords, I think, was one of the great obstructors?—I am afraid that both Houses must bear the blame. My experience as a lobbyist would lead me to say there was an equal difficulty in getting it introduced into the Commons.

36,755. This Bill chiefly affects children, and through children the mothers. Do you feel that if they had had any direct power of expressing an opinion upon this, perhaps the legislation would have moved a little quicker?—I can only give my own personal opinion.

36,756. The evidence of it all has come through women workers and through women sufferers and women experts upon these children?—I have been led to say in moments of great depression, when I was trying to get a Bill on, if the women could not do better than the men were doing we should be in a bad state.

36,757. I think the Salvation Army was a great helper in getting the Bill passed?—Mrs. Bramwell Booth and her assistants and friends have been of great assistance in this particular matter.

36,758. Did the Church of England take any great part in it?—I have no knowledge of that except in so far as we get much information from friends of ours who are connected with the Church. Several clergymen are honorary secretaries of branches in the country, and they, with others, send us information they receive from their branches which enables us to prepare statistics.

36,759. All societies working in these questions have felt the absence of such a law made a great increase in the vice?—May I go further and say that the mere passing of the Act will in my opinion have a considerable effect in reducing the number of offences. It is very remarkable that in cases of brutality we get a fewer number of extremely bad cases in proportion to the total number of cases each year, and I attribute that fact to the growing knowledge of the law. I believe it will be the same in regard to incest. If we can get a few more convictions like 15 years, 10 years, and 7 years, we shall inspire something like fear into the minds of these people who at present have been allowed to do as they would.

36,760. You have had experience of a man saying the law allows him to do it?—Yes.

36,761. May I ask you about paragraphs 36 and 37 of your proof. You say, "I am of opinion that increased facilities for divorce as advocated here would not materially lessen the power of the marriage tie." You mean by that, when the spirit of the marriage tie is broken, increased facilities would not weaken the real power of it?—No. The real opinion of the people of whom we are thinking more particularly on this subject would be improved if we show the increased responsibility that would be put on individuals to do their duty.

36,762. Then you say, "Nor do I believe that by making relief as wide as possible it would interfere with the conscientious opinions of those who regard marriage as a sacrament." That is a very hopeful outlook from the point of view of those who regard marriage as a sacrament indissoluble, and that therefore anything must be suffered under it?—Of course one has to avoid talking of the historical interpretation of the sacrament. What was in my mind was this, really, that if we could only improve the general habit of thought and mind on these subjects we might be very much more hopeful that the idea of marriage as a sacrament would be improved generally. On reflection it appears to me it would be wicked to talk of marriage as a sacrament with the people with whom we have to deal, who simply walk down the street a certain evening and in a few weeks are married, without any thought of life or parenthood, and within a few months find themselves in such a condition as to warrant the intervention of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. That is what was in my mind.

36,763. It would be vain to say to a wife suffering from the knowledge her husband has committed an assault on her child, "This is a sacrament, therefore you must not try to dissolve it"?—Yes. I am hoping the result of your deliberations and recommendations will so affect public opinion in the districts in which these people live, that they will look with considerably more seriousness on the mere act of getting married, apart from the sacrament, that the responsibilities of the marriage tie will be more felt and appreciated.

36,764. (Mrs. Tennant.) Have you any arrangement with the inebriate reformatories by which they report the police cases, or do you hear of the cases only as they arise from the children's cases?—Only the cases in which women are committed for cruelty to children. You will notice by the figures nearly all the women in inebriate reformatories are sent for that purpose. We send a photograph of their children every year they are there. We keep in touch with the family, and every year we have a photograph of the children taken and sent to the women. That is part of the cure. The woman is thus kept in touch with home. Just before the release, if the husband is living in the district where the woman is likely to be subject to temptation through old companions, we recommend removal to another part of the town, and, if necessary, pay for it, so that the woman can start under different conditions, removed from old temptations. On her release she is regularly visited either by an inspector, or more often by a lady who is found to visit, say, once a month or six weeks, until she is strong enough to walk alone.

36,765. You give two cases which at the end of three years were apparently uncured. Did the Home recognise that they were uncured?—Yes, quite.

36,766. A previous witness distinguished, in the hopefulness of cure, between those women who went of their own will and those who were rather forced to go: in the one class of case the cure was remarkable, and in the other there were no cures at all?—That is not my experience. Indeed, I am rather inclined to say from experience some of the most remarkable cures have been the cases of the women whom it was most difficult to get sent away, and who told us on their conviction that they were perfectly sure that no cure could be effected, and that they did not want to be cured. The remarkable thing is that the longer these women are kept away from intoxicants the more hope there is, and they get out of the way of using it. I would lay great emphasis on the removal of the family from the corruptive centre and taking the woman away from her companions. I think that has as much to do with it as anything, because she starts in good surroundings.

36,767. Do you include among the efforts you make to help a woman who has been separated from her husband any effort to secure the payment of alimony?—Yes. We have gone so far in certain cases as to collect or endeavour to collect the sums from the man and pay them to the woman. I may say in that matter we are very strong on compelling payments from men to wives and for the support of children. We go so far in every case in which we take custody of the child, either through gross brutality or grave moral danger, as to ask the magistrates to give us a maintenance order against the man, believing it is essential not only for the individual but for the community that the responsibility of the parents should be compulsorily attained.

36,768. Have you ever gone so far in cases of great difficulty as to claim the intervention of the employer to attach a man's wages, or a portion of them?—That is the last step that would be taken.

36,769. Have you ever taken it?—Yes, it has been done more frequently in attaching a pension or part of a pension. There is no risk to the man then. There is a risk if you go to the employer while the man is in employment. If the employer knows he is a bad man he might dismiss him and the second stage would be worse than the first; but we have attached pensions. There is power given in the Children Act to do that.

36,770. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) You have had very great experience through your officers in the working of separation orders and applications. I suppose probably a greater experience than any one body in the country?—I think that is so.

36,771. Your view is that on the whole the jurisdiction is well exercised?—Yes, the occasions we have had reason to complain being comparatively few.

36,772. You find great differences in different parts of the country, the differences between town and country?—Yes.

36,773. Paid stipendiaries and petty sessions, and so on?—Yes,

36,774. On the whole you think that jurisdiction is ample?—I have no suggestion to make with reference to a change there.

36,775. I do not think you answered this clearly before. Would you be of opinion it would be wise that all these applications for separation orders should be made in a court constituted like the Children's Court? You remember the press are to be excluded?—Yes.

(Chairman.) I thought the proviso said the press could not be excluded.

36,776. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) That is why I am asking. There is a great confusion about it. I will bring it out. I am dealing now with the Children's Court. I want to know whether you think that applications for separation orders might well be taken in courts so constituted?—I think so.

36,777. The effect of that would be that both the public and the press might be excluded?—That is so.

36,778. And then they could be taken in the Children's Court, which might be in the magistrate's private room?—That is so.

36,779. That is a different arrangement altogether from the provision to which you have called our attention, under which in any case if the child is giving evidence on a sexual case, the court can exclude everybody except the press?—That is so. There are two different sections.

36,780. The suggestion I want to get your evidence about is whether there is any reason why these separation orders should not be applied for in the Children's Court?—None. As I said in reply to Mr. Spender's questions just now, the report of such applications is so brief, simply a statement that the order was applied for and made, that there is no great objection to it being taken publicly.

36,781. What is in my mind is not only the press reports, although that comes in, but do you not think that it would deal much more satisfactorily with the case itself, that the evidence of the wife generally would be given with much less humiliation and much more freedom in a court so constituted than in an ordinary public court?—Most decidedly.

36,782. From something you said I thought you did not think it would be a good thing that where a separation order is made like that, on the application of the wife, the man should be put under the probation officer, and that there should be statutory power to do that?—I have not gone so far as to think that. I had simply got the Probation of Offenders' Act in my mind in suggesting 12 months.

36,783. I want you to consider whether there is any reason, where a man has committed an offence, because he has either failed to maintain his wife, or been cruel, or done something wrong, why he should not, where an order is made against him—it is a penal order—be put under the probation officer?—I am inclined to think that would be an admirable suggestion, because I have found the influence of the probation officer most advantageous in cases of a similar nature.

36,784. I gather your view is that if a separation order for drunkenness is granted for a twelvemonth, and at the end of that time there is no improvement, it should be made a divorce?—An application should be made for a divorce.

36,785. It should be in the jurisdiction of some tribunal to grant it?—On the application of one or other of the parties.

36,786. You have told us you know a very large percentage of successful cures of intemperance?—Yes.

36,787. And in some cases they take a very long time before you can tell whether the cure will be complete or not?—In certain cases, but you will notice, even with all our advantage of removal, the proportion of cures is only 44 per cent. We are grateful for those, but there is a large percentage of hopeless failures.

36,788. Take that 44 per cent.: could you say at the end of a year in all cases whether that person would be curable or not?—No.

36,789. Would not your proposal of allowing divorce at the end of a year sometimes work injustice, say in a case where the delinquent party had not been cured but was in the course of being cured, and was cured subsequently?—In that case you would have tested your cure, because the person would have been committed for three years beforehand and it would be on a relapse on discharge that you would have your separation and your 12 months period of probation, after the discharge.

36,790. Perhaps I am misunderstanding your evidence. I thought your view was that where a separation order was made on the ground of drinking, whether there has been a committal to an inebriate home or not, and that separation order lasted 12 months, there should be jurisdiction to turn the separation order into a divorce?—I had not that in my mind. I was thinking more particularly in regard to drunkenness. You will remember I am speaking purely of those cases in which children are concerned. In cases where the person had been committed to an inebriate reformatory and the attempted cure had failed, and on release from the inebriate reformatory she had broken out, then there should be power. I was not thinking of a case where a man got a separation because his wife was a drunken woman.

36,791. Your suggestion does not apply to any cases except where there have been committals to inebriate homes?—That is the only point on which my opinion would be of value; I have no experience of separations outside those where children have been concerned.

36,792. May I read paragraph 34 of your proof: "Power should be retained to grant separation orders, but these should, in my judgment, only be regarded as tentative; the period for which a separation order is granted should not exceed 12 months, and at the end of that time it should be open to either of the parties to apply for a dissolution of marriage"?—My answer to that is this. I have no recollection of any case of an application being made for a separation order where it was purely a question of drink. The case of a drunkard is treated in an entirely different way. This paragraph refers to the separation orders that are granted now for other causes outside drink.

36,793. As, for instance, failure to maintain, and desertion?—Yes, constant brutality, and things of that description. I would except from this paragraph the inebriate cases, because they are dealt with in an entirely different way.

36,794. I did not understand that. Take the case of the insane. You have found very great evil arise from the fact of divorce not being allowed where one of the parties is insane and in a lunatic asylum, and you give some very sad cases?—Yes.

36,795. If I understand your evidence rightly, it is that in your experience the party left behind at home very frequently makes an irregular alliance and further children are born of that, and your experience is that the legitimate children are neglected for the sake of the illegitimate ones, the second family?—Yes.

36,796. How would the condition of things be improved if there had been a divorce? I will assume instead of the irregular alliance the parties have married. There would be the second family?—I was not thinking so much of the prevention of cruelty in that connection as the legitimising of the offspring. You will remember in these cases that we give, we can only report to you such instances where we have been called in because children have been neglected. There are many others, a much larger proportion where children are concerned, where we are not called in.

The point there was that the woman or man who is left alone by being granted a divorce would have an opportunity to marry again, and you would avoid bastardizing the children of that second union. That was in my mind.

36,797. That could not have been your point on that evidence. Your point was that the legitimate children were neglected for the illegitimate?—If I conveyed the impression that that happened in every case, I should like to alter that. I did not wish to give that impression, that the legitimate children were always assaulted.

36,798. No, not always, but the case you put as one of the drawbacks of the present law was that a second family was produced, being illegitimate, and being the issue of the de facto parents, the legitimate family was neglected. I do not see how that condition of things would be improved if instead of irregular alliances the second alliance were a regular one, divorce having been granted?—I agree entirely, but in drafting these notes I had not at that moment the question of the treatment of the illegitimate children in my mind. I had in my mind the undesirability of increasing the illegitimate population. The fact a man living apart from his wife, who is in an asylum, or a woman, enters into an illicit union, has the result that there is a considerable increase in the rate of illegitimate births.

36,799. This is the first time you have referred to that since you have given evidence?—Yes. If I conveyed the impression that in the majority of cases the legitimate children were illtreated and the illegitimate not, that is a wrong impression, and I should like to alter it.

36,800. Supposing there were a divorce in any of these cases, how, in your view, would the first family, the wife and the children—say the man is divorced—be supported in an ordinary way?—It so often happens with the present cases of separation we are able to put a woman in the way of supporting herself. I should say that in a large proportion of the cases in which separations are now granted the husband fails to maintain, notwithstanding the order made upon him, and we set to work at once to enable the woman to become self-supporting. We find relations who will support in a small degree, put her in the way of business, put one or other of the children away to be trained, and endeavour in that way to help the woman to become self-supporting.

36,801. You mean that is more easy where the husband is out of the way than if she is simply separated from a husband who is there with some sort of control over her movements?—It so often happens when you have got a drunken or a brutal man, that when the woman goes to work he will come home and insist on demanding from her the money she has, and the children go without food. I have found again and again a man will stay at home lazy for weeks, the wife is at work regularly, and the children suffer because the man takes the money the wife earns, and I know the men in scores of cases take the food provided for the children and eat it themselves.

36,802. If there was a separation order that could be prevented?—We could keep the man out of the house.

36,803. He could not eat the food?—If there was a separation order we could keep the man out of the house. We want to get him away from the family and the children. That is the difficulty.

36,804. How are the family going to be supported after the divorce if there was a divorce instead of separation? You tell me that it is easier to find work for the woman when the husband is out of the way than when he is about?—Yes, and her mind is much more at ease, and she is better able to do it than if constantly worried by his presence and taking her money and food.

36,805. You attach great weight to the husband making his payments; you try and compel that under a separation order?—Yes.

36,806. You would not let him off because he had a divorce rather than a separation order, or because she had a divorce from him?—No. You will notice that I make a suggestion that power should be given to the court to consider the question of the children, and that power would be given to the court to make such an order for the maintenance of the children as the court may think fit.

36,807. A sort of alimony?—Yes.

36,808. Do you think as a practical matter you would find that easy to enforce, or as easy as under a separation order?—I think so. May I just for one moment give my experience in connection with custody. A certain number of children, not a large number, 70 or 80 a year, are removed from the custody of the parents, the custody being vested in me as director of the society. In every case we ask for a maintenance order against the father. I will speak of last year: I should say we had at least 1,300*l.* or 1,400*l.* from delinquent parents, many of them worthless people, towards the maintenance of their children, and those we enforced even so far as to ask for a committal for failure to pay.

36,809. What proportion does that represent over the whole number of children? 1,400*l.* does not convey much impression unless one knows what it refers to?—We have at the moment 340 children who are in my legal custody. The cost of maintenance would be approximately 5*s.* a week each. If I may take it further, the total cost of maintenance would be about 5,000*l.* Towards that we get from delinquent parents 1,300*l.* or 1,400*l.* It must be remembered in many cases the order made against the parents is only for 1*s.* or 2*s.* a week, as the case may be, and in that matter I am quarrelling with the justices, because I ask them to give more than they are inclined to.

36,810. You think alimony could be enforced against divorced people?—I think so.

36,811. Have you had much experience as to reconciliations after separation orders?—Yes; we try that wherever possible. Unfortunately, I am afraid it has not often come to pass.

36,812. Reconciliations have not been common or have not been real reconciliations?—They have not been common.

36,813. You know that a very large majority of separation orders are practically annulled by the people coming together again?—Yes.

36,814. A very large majority?—Yes. I give a specimen case, where a man to nullify the order made against him comes back and lives with his wife and treats her in the same way.

36,815. Without gross wickedness of that kind, it is within your knowledge that the vast majority of separation orders are put an end to by the parties coming together?—Yes.

36,816. I do not understand how far you carry your suggestions for the enlargement of the grounds of divorce, because in your final paragraph you say, "Finally, I say it is not desirable from the standpoint of national well-being that men and women should lead lives of perpetual irritation or martyrdom, and it is not to the advantage of the children." Would you say that wherever parties were living in a state of perpetual irritation they ought to have a divorce?—No. I am confining my reference there entirely to the cases described within my evidence. I cannot express the slightest opinion outside that.

36,817. Cases of brutality?—And insanity and incest, where children are the victims of the misdeeds of one or other of the parents.

36,818. You do not take the view that where there is what is called "incompatibility" by people living a cat-and-dog life, that in itself is a reason for divorce?—I am afraid there would be a very large increase in the number of applications made.

36,819. That might or might not be an advantage. You have no desire to give that as your evidence?—No, I have no experience of that.

36,820. (Mr. Brierley.) You told Mrs. Tennant you sometimes attach the pensions of fathers and husbands?—Yes.

36,821. You do that, I suppose, in the case of sums made payable to you in respect of the custody of children?—Yes.

36,822. For that there is power under the Children Act?—Yes.

36,823. You are aware that there is no such power under the Married Women's Act, 1895?—That is one of the defects of the Act.

36,824. Do you think it would be a good thing that there should be a similar power in the case of separation orders and maintenance orders?—I have long desired to have that change in the Married Women's Act, so that we might have in that the same powers as are given in the Children Act to attach any pension.

36,825. You have found that a useful power to possess?—Very.

36,826. There is one other question about the figures you gave in respect to incest. You would not suggest that those account for all the cases of incest in the country?—No.

36,827. The Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, is not repealed by the Punishment of Incest Act, 1908?—No.

36,828. There are many cases of incest committed with children under 16 which are proceeded against under the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885?—Yes, and the proportion of such proceedings has not decreased since the passing of the Incest Act.

36,829. The figures which you give of proceedings under the Punishment of Incest Act, 1908, do not tell us in any way what the total number of cases of incest is?—By no means. I ought to say this, I think I have mentioned it incidentally, that the number of cases reported to us either of cruelty or neglect or incest, are by no means comparable to the number of offences committed. Much as we discover, we cannot hope that we are discovering all that happens. That is the melancholy fact.

36,830. I thought the Commissioners might not be aware that there are a large number of cases which are tried under the previous Act, the Criminal Law Amendment Act, and for which no direction of the Public Prosecutor is required at all?—That is so.

36,831. I was a little struck by your figures with regard to the committals to inebriate reformatories, especially the large proportion of the cases with which your society has been connected. Do you mean that the 443 you mention is the total number of people who have been committed to inebriate reformatories since 1908?—Yes, under Section I. of the Inebriates Act. These figures are taken from the return of the Inspector of the Home Office under the Inebriates Act, Dr. Branthwaite. These are the actual figures taken from the Government return..

36,832. Where were they committed?—At quarter sessions.

36,833. Surely a large number is committed to inebriate reformatories by courts of summary jurisdiction? Are you really speaking about inebriate reformatories or inebriate retreats?—Inebriate reformatories. The power to commit to retreats under the section of the Children Act is never applied now. I asked when they were drafting the Children Act that they might delete it because it is never used.

36,834. I want to see whether it is the case. Do you mean these 443 persons are committed at quarter sessions?—Yes, under section I.

36,835. You give us no account of the total number. May I suggest to you a considerably larger number of persons are committed to inebriate reformatories by courts of summary jurisdiction than by courts of quarter sessions or assizes?—If I may I will send on those figures. I will send you the Government return, published by Dr. Branthwaite, from which these figures are taken.

36,836. The larger number of cases sent to inebriate reformatories by courts of summary jurisdiction, I should suggest your society has really nothing to do with?—That is perfectly true.

36,837. And yet, according to you, since 1898 there would only be some 93 persons?—Yes, and Dr. Branthwaite draws particular attention to that in his report, and says it is a remarkable fact that nearly the whole of the women at present in the inebriate reformatories of the country sent there under section I. have been sent there by the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. He makes that point. I will send that report along if I may.*

(Chairman.) The report showing the total number of people in the inebriate reformatories.

36,838. (Mr. Brierley.) It surprises me?—It surprises many people. It is an astonishing fact, but the fact remains.

36,839. It surprises me that so large a proportion of the total should have been sent by quarter sessions. May I suggest to you in Lancashire alone nearly 100 are sent by courts of summary jurisdiction?—Mostly men, are they not?

36,840. No, women. We have no inebriate reformatory for men in the county, and it is difficult to find a place for a man anywhere in the country?—Not under section I. of the Inebriates Act.

36,841. I was asking whether you meant this was the total figure?—May I repeat an answer I gave to the Chairman just now, that section I. of the Inebriates Act gives power to deal with an offence of cruelty to a child where the offence has been committed by a drunken person, and to commit that person to quarter sessions and treat him or her as an habitual inebriate. I think I did get that in just now in reply to your question, and that is the point that is referred to in this paragraph, the people who are committed under section I. of the Inebriates Act.

36,842. That is what I wanted. You mean the 443 is the total of the persons committed under that section of the Act?—Yes, under section I. of the Inebriates Act.

36,843. That you know only accounts for a small proportion of the total number?—Yes.

36,844. I think that is the explanation. In those cases you found so large a percentage as 44 per cent. permanently cured?—Yes.

36,845. You would not get quite so large a percentage if you included the total number?—No.

36,846. (Chairman.) With regard to the 433 you have explained already. Will you send us the returns of the total number of persons committed to inebriate homes in any way?—I will send Dr. Branthwaite's report, which contains all the figures.*

36,847. We are going to have him called?—Then you will get it from him.

36,848. If you can send it beforehand we can deal with it more fully?—I will send it to-day, if I may.

36,849. May I clear up some of the points? You said you get maintenance orders against the fathers?—Yes.

36,850. Are those maintenance orders obtained under the Summary Jurisdiction Married Women's Act?—No, they are maintenance orders under the Children Act. Where a child is removed by order and given into my custody, an order is made against the man to contribute so much a week.

36,851. Will you give the reference to the Act?—Section 21 of the Children Act, 1908.

36,852. Have you the reference there to the Probation Act?—Probation of Offenders' Act, 1907, 7 Edward VII., cap. 17.

36,853. You are aware that in the Divorce Court if there is a decree of divorce an order may be made against a husband for weekly or monthly payments?—Yes.

36,854. You would use a similar system if the divorce applied to the class being dealt with?—In some way to provide for the maintenance of the children of the marriage.

36,855. That goes to the wife as well?—Yes.

36,856. With regard to these cases of conviction for incest, the fact of a conviction on proof would, according to you, justify a decree for divorce?—Yes, that is so.

36,857. I take it that those convictions are before a jury who have already tried the case?—Yes.

36,858. Therefore you are of opinion that if the case had been heard and the conviction obtained, the proof in that way, without proof of the fact over again, should be sufficient?—Yes, quite, in order to save the woman, which is such a grave consideration, the necessity of appearing again and going over the whole of the facts.

* See footnote in answer to Q. 36,742.

36,859. In paragraph 13, where you give your category of cases for increased facilities, incest is confined to the cases that you have mentioned?—Yes.

36,860. Have you considered whether you could give any extension with regard to cases under the Criminal Law Amendment Act, on proof of conviction of that?—Incest under the Criminal Law Amendment Act.

36,861. Acts under that Act are not incest, but are offences of a grave character. Would your view be to extend the grounds upon which the divorce could be obtained to that kind of conviction too?—I have not considered that, but subject to reflection I should say at the moment, yes. It is a very serious point where a man has been charged with an offence against a girl.

36,862. If women and men were on the same footing it would amount to proof of adultery. At present that is not so. Have you considered that?—Speaking on the impulse of the moment, I should be prepared to make that suggestion.

36,863. In that paragraph you put down "continued drunkenness" as a ground?—Yes.

36,864. You have followed that up with a reference to the Inebriates Act?—Yes.

36,865. Is your view as to continued drunkenness being a ground of divorce confined to cases where they have been in an inebriate home, or if it has been of a continuous character is it to be proved in another way?—In my own mind I was referring to those cases we had dealt with ourselves, where there had been an attempt to cure and that cure had failed.

36,866. Those confined in inebriate homes?—Yes.

36,867. Does that apply where there is continued drunkenness of an aggravated character which has not resulted in the person being put in a home?—I am afraid I have had no experience whatever of such cases. My experience has been confined in this matter to those persons who have received treatment in one or other of the homes.

36,868. The point of the matter is the impossibility of family life afterwards?—Yes.

36,869. If that were a sound point it would apply to continued drunkenness proved in another way?—Yes.

36,870. Apart from the details of this incest point, your evidence is of very considerable public interest, and although you have wished it taken in private I should like to know whether we might not after it is printed let the press see it?—I have no objection.

36,871. If the other Commissioners take the same view?—I am entirely in your hands.

36,872. No, we are in yours, because you wished it to be private?—I did not understand that. I am afraid it was a misunderstanding, and I took it as the view of the Commission.

36,873. Never mind the misunderstanding?—I have not the slightest objection.

36,874. It will be printed. Are you willing, instead of waiting till the Report is out, that the print of your evidence as transcribed should be looked at by the reporters and the public?—Quite.

36,875. You can revise it before that if you like. I ought to say I thank you very much indeed on behalf of the Commissioners for what I regard as extremely valuable evidence, which has been prepared with great consideration, and has presented many matters which I am sure will be very carefully and anxiously weighed?—I thank you very much on behalf of the society.

Mr. Ninian Hill called and examined.

36,876. (Chairman.) You are the General Secretary of the Scottish National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, and your headquarters are at 137, Princes Street, Edinburgh?—Yes.

36,877. You have been general secretary of the society for the past four or five years?—Nearly five years.

36,878. And previously for many years you have been more or less a student of social problems, and personally acquainted with the conditions of life among the lower classes of society?—Yes.

36,879. Has your society a staff of 42 inspectors stationed at 27 centres throughout Scotland, 10 in Glasgow, 6 in Edinburgh, 2 in Aberdeen, and the rest in various places?—Yes.

36,880. Does your society operate in every county in Scotland?—Yes.

36,881. During the year 1909, there were 7,514 complaints received and investigated against 10,184 offenders, affecting the welfare of 22,224 children?—That is so.

36,882. Why does the investigation against offenders result in a larger number than the complaints? Is it the same person over again?—No; sometimes it is a complaint against both a father and a mother.

36,883. You mean, therefore, the complaints may be less than the actual persons complained against?—The cases may be less than the number of persons complained against.

36,884. The cardinal principle underlying all the society's work appears to be that every endeavour should be made to reform the home and to maintain the unity of the family?—That is so. We make a very strong point of that.

36,885. Cases are only reported for prosecution when good advice and warnings fail, and children are never removed to institutions unless it is absolutely necessary to rescue them from criminal and vicious parents?—That is so.

36,886. That is the general position?—Yes.

36,887. How many persons were convicted at the instance of the society in 1909 for offences against children?—During the year 1909, 676 persons were convicted of offences against 1,789 children.

36,888. That is for cruelty to the children?—For the offence of cruelty. 291 children were committed to industrial schools and 235 were admitted to various homes and orphanages.

36,889. Will you proceed to state your paper? It is in a convenient form?—"I am of opinion that among the lower classes of society there is a strong feeling in favour of the desirability of a woman being married rather than cohabiting without legal marriage. I do not think that this arises merely from money motives or altogether from higher motives, but is prompted by not unworthy self interest. A man cannot get a respectable well-doing woman to live with him unless he marries her, and a respectable well-disposed woman will not cohabit with a man without marriage, because she knows that he would be apt to leave her as soon as his responsibilities became irksome. Marriage alone provides for the stability and welfare of domestic life among the poorer as in other classes. My experience is not sufficient to enable me to say whether or not marriage is regarded as less permanent now than formerly, but I have no reason to suppose that this is the case. With regard to tinkers, one of our most experienced officers writes me, marriage is generally observed and respected amongst tinkers. At the same time a considerable number of them are living together without having been married, and I have an impression that this is on the increase. I am of opinion that the lower the position in the social scale, the less frequently are proceedings for divorce or judicial separation taken. I have often been greatly impressed by the forbearance of erring spouses towards one another. This probably arises from a less keen sense of personal dishonour than in the higher classes, and from the general necessity to make the best of circumstances. The keeping of lodgers is undoubtedly a cause of domestic dispeace in many cases, but many respectable couples take in lodgers without any evil arising. Domestic quarrels frequently lead to a more or less temporary separation. Almost every day the society is dealing with cases in which children are neglected through parents quarrelling. Efforts, very often successful, are made to reconcile parents." The inspector whom I have already quoted gives me an instance of this. Is it the wish of the Commission to hear particular cases?

36,890. Yes, as typical cases?—As illustrations. This was a woman who was married to a perfect savage of a man who was frequently imprisoned for seriously assaulting her. Our officer gave evidence before the court, and separation and aliment were granted. About three months afterwards she was back living with her husband again. Aliment is usually paid through the law agent. Occasionally the society's inspectors have undertaken the duty on behalf of the father in non-judicial cases of paying aliment for the benefit of the children. Our superintendent of inspectors at Glasgow writes as follows: "Several parties who through jealousy and drunken quarrels have separated and come under the supervision of the society, and after being warned of their responsibility to their children, have come to the office, the father offering to pay a weekly aliment through me, which I undertook to take if the mother was satisfied, thus saving them the commission charged by agents. I have found this course very satisfactory, as on all occasions it has been the means of their settling their grievances and resuming cohabitation. Some have kept apart for 12 months, but in the majority of cases they come to terms in periods from two to four months and do well afterwards." Reconciliation and resumption of cohabitation after separation are by no means uncommon, and are attended with more or less permanently satisfactory results. "On several occasions agents for the poor have written me" (this is from one of our inspectors) "regarding parties applying for separation when they knew that I had been visiting the case, and I succeeded in reconciling the parties. One of these occurred recently, and so acute was the breach that it seemed hopeless. The man had taken a house in another part of the town and would not go near his wife, who, with three children, would have starved but for the kindness of neighbours. She refused to go and live with him, although he was willing to receive her and the children, as she professed to be in terror of him, for he had when in drink threatened to murder them all. The man was cited to appear before the sheriff on a charge of neglecting his children. He pleaded not guilty, and evidence was led. The sheriff gave the man a sound warning and put him under probation. He and his wife went home together and have lived happily ever since." The presumption would be that a marriage of necessity would not be very favourable to domestic peace and happiness, but on the other hand, I think there is often a resolve to make the best of the circumstances, and I think it by no means follows that such marriages are invariably unsatisfactory. Drunkenness is undoubtedly the cause of by far the largest proportion of cases of cruelty to children that come under the observation of the society, and in some of the worst cases it leads to actual separation on the part of the parents, but there is undoubtedly a remarkable indisposition to resort to separation on account of intemperance alone. The inebriate has usually many excellent qualities when sober, and I think that the separations which take place are more the result of temper and the interference of relatives than intemperance alone. I think the indisposition to separate is largely due to the fact that the spouses have got accustomed to each other and go on the principle of, "better the evil you know than the evil you do not know." It is the case I think that the intemperance of one spouse does not always create a repugnance to drink on the part of the other. On the contrary, in too many cases an intemperate spouse teaches the other to drink, or the other loses heart and takes to drink. I should say that in the majority of the society's cases one of the parents is more to blame than the other, but not infrequently the complaint is against both parents for drinking and neglecting their children. I have no suggestions to make regarding the proposed magisterial regulation of the relation of separated spouses as regards aliment, children, &c. The operation of the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, as applied to parents, I think tends to maintain family life. The Children Act, 1908, gives increased powers for committing children to industrial schools, in addition to previously existing powers of committal to the custody of relatives or "fit persons."

36,891. Your paper deals chiefly with the efforts which are made by the society to protect the children?—That is so.

36,892. In Scotland you have a law of divorce different from ours in England?—Very different, I understand.

36,893. There is the ground of desertion, and both sexes are on the same footing?—Yes.

36,894. You do not propose to go into the question of grounds at all, as I gather from your paper?—My opinion, as far as I have been able to form one, is that the law of divorce in Scotland meets with general acceptance, and I have been unable to find any evidence of any desire for any alteration.

36,895. Have you considered the question of insanity in Scotland?—I have considered that matter, and I have a very sad case I could quote. Undoubtedly, as regards many individuals it is a very serious matter, and especially for a working man whose wife has become insane and has had to be removed to a lunatic asylum: but, on the other hand, it is a very far-reaching question, and while an alteration in the law might relieve many an individual with great benefit, on the other hand it might do incalculable harm. I feel that the harm that might result is so incalculable that I would not wish to appear to advocate any change in the present law.

36,896. How would you deal, in your view, with cases of gross brutality which are not checked by the intervention of the society, and might continue if left? There is no power in Scotland for divorce for that, but only power to separate, I think?—Yes. That would rather be covered by the remark I have made, that the forbearance towards an erring spouse, even a brutal husband, is very remarkable. Nobody who is acquainted with the lower classes of society in Scotland can but be impressed with that fact. These brutal assaults are usually the result of a drinking bout, and when that passes over the brutality of the assault is forgotten, and it is common experience in the police courts that a wife, even although she has been horribly illtreated, is most reluctant to come forward to give evidence against her husband.

36,897. (Mr. Brierley.) You have told us there is a very large number of cases in which the parties come together, but I suppose you have experience of a good many where permanent separation is the result of brutal conduct?—Very often a man just simply clears out and disappears.

36,898. That would be a case of desertion which is met by the law of Scotland as it exists, but are there not several cases where the parties separate permanently owing to the cruelty and brutal conduct of the husband?—Doubtless there are.

36,899. Where no reconciliation takes place? What do you suggest should be done in such a case as that?—My feeling in the matter is that the law as it stands is sufficient, but there is a great weakness in the law. A woman may institute an action for aliment and separation against such a husband as you refer to, but the trouble comes in enforcing the order. The husband may either clear out altogether and disappear, or he may work irregularly and not earn sufficient to pay the aliment. The difficulty of the woman in enforcing the decree for aliment against her husband is a very serious matter.

36,900. No doubt, but what I was suggesting is this: do you think it would be an advantage, instead of applying for separation and aliment, that she should be able to apply for a divorce on the ground of her husband's continued cruelty, I mean such cruelty as renders it unsafe for her to live with him, and thereby put an end to the conjugal union?—I am afraid I would not like to express an opinion upon that point. Of course, if a man deserts his wife for four years she can apply for divorce through the agent for the poor.

36,901. That is perfectly true, we are aware of that, but in the case I put there would be no desertion.

On the other hand, possibly the husband might be willing to live with her and be allowed to treat her cruelly as before. How do you deal with a case of that sort? Do you consider it is not a case for divorce, or do you think there ought to be a remedy for that? —It is a very serious matter, but I should not like to say that such a woman would be entitled to a divorce.

36,902. Does your society assist in getting divorces for women in the cases in which they are entitled to them?—Occasionally, of course, our inspectors are cited to appear as witnesses, and they have no option but to give such evidence as they are called upon to give. The policy of the society is rather against encouraging actions for separation and aliment, or divorce. We rather try to bring the parties together and reconcile them.

36,903. As a society have you much experience in the obtaining of divorces through the medium of these agents for the poor?—Not very much.

36,904. We had a witness from Dundee yesterday who told us it does not supply the needs of the very poor in Scotland at present. Have you found there is much difficulty on the part of poor women who really want a divorce, in obtaining one?—I believe they have a good deal of trouble.

36,905. I did not mean trouble; I meant difficulty in the way of providing means for it?—The actual cost of a poor case tried is very nominal, I believe 2*l.* or 3*l.* for a divorce case, which can only be tried in Edinburgh, and for a person in Dundee the whole proceedings are undoubtedly a little formidable; but any deserving woman with a good case will have no difficulty in finding kind friends to help her and advise her, and to see the thing through for her.

36,906. I rather wanted to know whether you had that experience in your capacity as the general secretary of the society, as to whether women had been debarred by want of means from obtaining a divorce even through the medium of the Poor's Roll?—I have had no personal experience, but I do not think so. For a woman outside Edinburgh the necessary formalities that have to be gone through make the process so troublesome that I think there is a tendency to question whether the divorce is worth the trouble.

36,907. I should have thought the procedure was tolerably simple. We are told there is a poor's agent in each district, and all that the poor person has to do is to apply to that poor's agent, and the trouble, so far as the trouble goes, seems to be taken off her or his hands?—I suppose in theory that is something like it. What happens is this. A poor woman wanting divorce has first to go to the parish minister and get a certificate as to her indigence. With that she has to go to the poor's agent at the Sheriff Court in the place where she is living. He will tell her that it is a case for the Court of Session in Edinburgh, and that she must go to one of the poor's agents in Edinburgh with the case. Then the case comes before a committee consisting of representatives of the various law societies. They examine the information which is put before them, and they decide, in the first place, whether or not it is a case for the Poor Roll, and secondly, whether or not there are primâ facie grounds to warrant proceedings being taken. If these questions are decided in the affirmative, the case then goes forward, and the agent for the poor takes it up and sees it through. A case of separation and aliment is much more simple, because that comes before the Sheriff Court, which is found in every town of any importance in Scotland.

36,908. I really wanted to know whether your experience goes so far as to be able to tell us that even this system of Poor Roll does not suffice to enable women in poor circumstances to obtain divorce when they live outside Edinburgh?—I think the difficulties are such as to discourage frivolous cases, but not sufficient to debar anyone with a really good case from getting it carried through.

36,909. People are not debarred in proper cases?—No.

36,910. (Mrs. Tennant.) You say you think no woman, however poor, would be unable in Scotland to get a divorce, because of the kindness of her friends. They would subscribe money which her own wages would fail to supply?—It is only a question of 2*l.* or 3*l.*, I understand.

36,911. That is if it is only 2*l.* or 3*l.*?—Yes.

36,912. Would you still hold that opinion if we found that the expenses alone are as great as was reported to us yesterday, 13*l.* 15*s.*?—Of course that would modify it.

36,913. Or even 10*l.* or 8*l.*?—It all depends on the kindness and the ability of the woman's friends.

36,914. If a woman is very poor her friends are probably very poor?—Her associates probably are very poor, but if she was suffering an injustice the probability is that her very position would gain her friends who would help her in an emergency of that sort.

36,915. Is it not a position she would not like to advertise? If her friends are very poor they could only give her very small sums?—The first step she would have to take would be to go to the parish minister, and if he was satisfied that the poor woman was deserving he would be the first man in the parish that would be most willing to help her.

36,916. The funds of the parish minister are limited; it really turns upon whether the sum is as great as 13*l.* or as little as 3*l.*?—I cannot say from my own experience about these matters. I understand that a divorce case undertaken by an agent for the poor is supposed to cost absolutely nothing, but as a matter of fact there are a few outlays which amount to 2*l.* or 3*l.*, and that covers it. If the case is an ordinary one, then I understand the cost, if it is not defended, amounts to something like 30*l.*

36,917. (Mr. Burt.) In clause 2 of your proof you state, the lower in the social scale the people are, the less frequently are proceedings taken to secure a divorce, and you give as a reason for that the probability that there is a less keen sense of personal dishonour felt than among the higher classes. Would not the difficulty of meeting the cost of divorce also affect the matter?—I have already tried to explain my view that this little cost in itself may be a barrier, but I believe that the trouble involved is perhaps even a more serious matter.

36,918. In Scotland the cost is not so high, I think, as in England?—I have no information as to England.

36,919. In clause 5 you state that separations are most common when the responsibilities begin, and are less frequent in the absence of children. Have you any statistics to bear that out?—No, I am sorry I have no figures to bear that out. We have not infrequently to deal with cases of a very young father and a very young mother, mere boys and girls, getting married, and when the first infant arrives the husband sometimes deserts altogether, sometimes sends his wife home to her parents, at any rate fails to provide.

36,920. Is the separation in cases of that kind usually temporary?—I think so, sometimes.

36,921. They come together again?—Yes.

36,922. Is intemperance a very common cause of domestic discord leading to separation?—Undoubtedly, but there is a great deal of separation of a non-judicial character. The number of judicial cases that come under our observation are a mere fraction of the cases in which the husband and wife separate after a quarrel, perhaps a drunken quarrel, and come together again from time to time. Very often as the result of the drunken quarrel the children are neglected, and the society is called in, and we act the part of peacemakers.

36,923. (Sir Frederick Treves.) You say that if insanity were made a ground of divorce, you think it might do incalculable harm? Would you explain in what way it would do incalculable harm?—I used the expression "incalculable" not meaning so much an enormous amount of harm as an amount of harm that it is difficult to estimate.

36,924. The kind of harm would be what?—I think it would add to the terrors weak-minded persons possess already, when they feel that there is a tendency to mental instability; the fear a woman would have, if she were removed to an asylum, that she might recover and come out and find her husband married and herself supplanted. I think that is a very serious matter.

36,925. Would that be the only point in your mind? —That is the only point that occurs to me in the meantime apart, perhaps, from the religious point of view.

36,926. Supposing you excluded that class of insane person you mention, and the ground for divorce were limited to those who are hopelessly insane, and who have no conception of what divorce meant, that would remove the objection you have just given?—Not altogether, because there would still be this anticipation of what might take place.

36,927. Before they went there?—It would be at the back of every woman's mind, that if her reason was to give way this might happen.

36,928. You rather take it on medical grounds?—I am not competent to express an opinion upon medical grounds, but I do know the case of an old lady who was removed to an asylum of some sort, and it was thought that at her time of life she could not recover, and under legal advice her furniture and all her belongings were sold off. In the course of a few years the lady recovered, and when she found out what had happened she nearly went out of her mind again.

36,929. On the other side, have you had any experience of great distress consequent upon the fact that either husband or wife is immured for life in an asylum?—I have information of a case in which a woman was removed to an asylum 22 years ago. Her husband took in his wife's sister to keep house for him. They have cohabited and have a family of four children.

36,930. Do you think those cases are fairly common? —I have not heard of any case until I inquired specially and came across this one.

36,931. Do you think such a case as you have quoted a hard case?—A very hard case.

36,932. Do you not think relief should be given in such a case as that?—One would like to give relief in a case of that nature; Whether it would be always wise or not is another question.

36,933. In what way, taking up your instance where the unfortunate woman has been insane for 22 years, could harm happen? Where does the lack of wisdom come in?—This poor woman might recover.

36,934. It is conceivable?—Yes.

36,935. You think that should be the sole ground to decide a matter of that sort?—Not the sole ground, but certainly an important ground. The other ground is that behind every woman's mind, in fact any man's mind, would be always this, that in the chances of life it is conceivable that anyone's brain might give way, and there would be this consequence.

36,936. Then in the meantime an irregular union is formed, and a number of children are born who are illegitimate?—Yes.

36,937. Which is rather deplorable?—It is very deplorable.

36,938. You think the possibility of insanity being made a ground of divorce, and the effect it would have on people of unstable mind, would outweigh the whole of that?—I would not like to express an opinion. I think it is a very difficult problem, upon which a great deal can be said on both sides.

36,939. (Mr. Spender.) Could you explain a little more fully what you mean in your proof when you say the operation of the Probation of Offenders' Act, 1907, as applied to parents, tends to maintain family life? I did not follow that?—I think one of the cases I mention bears that out, the case I referred to in which a man had threatened to murder his wife when he was in drink. He was cited to appear before the sheriff on a charge of neglecting his children. The sheriff gave the man a sound warning and put him under probation.

36,940. You mean under the First Offenders' Act? —No, the Probation of Offenders' Act, 1907. We have a system in Scotland, apart from the Statute law, of a sheriff deferring sentence. He convicts and admonishes the offender and defers sentence. The offender is ordered to come up in three or six months, as the case may be, for sentence, and then the sheriff gets a report from the police or the society as to the offender's conduct during that period, and it depends on the report as to what sentence is passed. I think that the Probation of Offenders' Act put that system on a more regular basis, and the placing of the offender under a duly appointed probation officer has had an excellent effect.

36,941. Do you find in those cases where the probation officer is in waiting and there is a chance of his being brought up for sentence again, he is deterred from fresh acts of violence? Does the wife usually welcome him back under those conditions?—In many cases. Deferring sentence or placing an offender under probation has a most excellent effect, but there are a certain number of cases in which I am sorry to say it is absolutely ineffectual.

36,942. It is a considerable responsibility for a sheriff to take, to send a man who is violent back to his home under threat of sentence?—I find that there are very few cases of sober violence, if I may express it so. These outbursts are usually the result of drink, and when the drink passes off the man is a peaceable enough citizen.

36,943. Broadly speaking, from your experience of Scotland, do you think, as compared with the English law of divorce, the extensions in Scotland to desertion and the equalisation of the conditions between the sexes operate fairly?—I think, so far as I am able to form an opinion, the law of Scotland with regard to divorce is accepted generally as fair and sound.

36,944. It would not be alleged in Scotland that those two causes led to an unnecessary multiplication of divorce? There is a fear expressed here. I am asking about the working classes especially. You have special facilities for divorce in Scotland at comparatively cheap rates, on two extended grounds, which we have not here. It would not be said of Scottish experience that those three causes operating together tended to weaken the marriage tie or multiply divorce beyond necessity? —I do not think so. I do not think it tends to promote frivolous cases at all.

36,945. (Chairman.) Can you give us any information about the working of the attachment of wages in Scotland? I think I am correct in saying in Scotland there is a power in these alimony cases to attach the wages when they exceed 20*s.* a week?—Wages under 20*s.* per week can be arrested only for aliment, and if a man wants to avoid payment he takes good care not to earn a wage that can be arrested. In other words he takes to casual labour.

36,946. There is the law that over that sum you can attach as much as the magistrate thinks fit?—I am not quite sure of the limit.

36,947. That is the way he works it?—Yes.

36,948. Have you heard any objection made by employers in Scotland to any order being made upon them?—No. I am afraid many employers are too familiar with it, for debt of one kind or another.

36,949. Supposing the man has 2*l.* or 3*l.* a week and he does not choose to pay; he does not drop down to 20*s.* in order to get out of it?—He works one or two days in the week.

36,950. You mean a provision of that kind is practically nugatory?—It is very difficult to enforce if the man is determined not to pay, as he usually is.

36,951. Would you advocate that there should be no limit; if a man was in employ there should be power on the part of the magistrates to attach the wages, no matter what they were? Your point is that the limit upsets the arrangement?—I would take this view. In some cases the man would be thankful to pay to get quit of his wife, and other men of a more contentious nature will do one of two things, either clear out altogether or take good care not to earn a steady wage.

36,952. Or perhaps leave one employ and go to another, that sort of thing?—Yes. He will work irregularly with different employers.

36,953. You mean there is no real practical use in giving magistrates power to attach wages, except by the committal of the man's body himself to prison. That is your general experience?—The sheriffs have power to grant separation and aliment, and that carries with it a power to arrest the wages.

36,954. In Scotland it does not carry power to arrest a man does it?—If he fails to pay he may be prosecuted or imprisoned for a period not exceeding six weeks.

36,955. At any rate the power to arrest the wages does not effect the desired result?—It would not necessarily deprive a man of a good situation.

36,956. That is not the point. Would it bring the money in? You say the limit is under 20*s*. It will not bring the money in if the man reduces it below that?—That is the weak point of the law. The man can evade payment without much difficulty.

36,957. (Mrs. Tennant.) You say the way in which the workman manages to evade the order is by reducing his employment from five or six days a week to one or two days?—Yes.

36,958. That would make him an unattractive servant to most masters?—That would be so in certain employments, but in others it would be quite practicable, of course.

36,959. Have you any figures you could give us to illustrate that experience?—No, I am afraid it hardly comes within the scope of our society's operation.

36,960. (Chairman.) It does surely, to get the money in from these people?—We look after the children and see they are not neglected. It is only incidentally we come across these other matters.

(Chairman.) I have to thank you very much on behalf of the Commissioners for your evidence. It will be of considerable use, especially on the last point.

(Witness.) It is very kind of your Lordship to say so.

Miss Margaret Llewelyn Davies called and examined.

36,961. (Chairman.) You have prepared a very full paper of the evidence which you will give yourself and which you have corrected, and I am going to take you carefully through it, but I will preface it by asking this. Some of the cases and opinions are not your own. You have a note that they have been supplied by members of the Women's Co-operative Guild?—Yes.

36,962. You are really here as a representative of that guild?—Yes.

36,963. What is your own position in it?—General secretary.

36,964. The guild is a self-governing organisation of women connected with distributive industrial co-operative societies, stores, and it has 520 branches. Are they all over England?—England and Wales.

36,965. There are 25,897 members. The branches elect their own committees, they meet weekly and fortnightly, and do voluntary work in connection with local co-operative stores?—Yes.

36,966. I think it will be more convenient if you read the paper you have prepared and we shall get the details very quickly?—Branches are grouped into 37 districts and 6 sections, which elect their own committees, and hold quarterly and half-yearly conferences. A central Committee of 7 members is elected annually by all the branches. It superintends the work of the whole guild, and arranges the annual congress, which sits for two days, is presided over by its own officials, and is attended by nearly 1,000 delegates and members. The Central Fund of the guild is made up mainly of branch subscriptions, 2*d.* per member, and of a grant of 300*l.* from the Co-operative Union, Ltd., while branch funds consist of individual subscriptions and grants from the local co-operative societies to which the branches are attached. The members of the guild are nearly all married women, whose husbands work in the ordinary trades of different localities.

36,967. Does that mean there are nearly 25,000 married women members of the guild?—25,000 women members.

36,968. Nearly all of them are married?—Nearly all married women. As shareholders and purchasing members in co-operative societies they take part in the business control and educational work of the movement. They discuss all kinds of industrial, social, and political questions affecting working women. Outsiders remark on the intelligence and good sense shown in their discussions. They hold strong views on the duties of women as wives, mothers, and housewives, and their opinions are based on experience of life, and usually show a balanced practical judgment. I may add, from my own personal knowledge, after having been annually elected their general secretary for 21 years, and staying in their homes in all parts of the country, that as a class they are equal to any for sense of duty and public spirit.

36,969. How often do these discussions take place?—The branches of the guild meet weekly or fortnightly.

36,970. How often do you have a central meeting?—There are conferences held in districts and in larger divisions, called sections. The district conferences take place quarterly, and the sectional conferences half-yearly, and the congress annually.

36,971. In London?—No, in various towns in England.

36,972. That is the focussing of the whole society?—Yes.

36,973. With regard to the method of inquiry which you have adopted to prepare yourself for this evidence, I think that is stated on the next page?—Yes.

36,974. That has been done expressly for the purpose of giving evidence?—For the purpose of this Commission. In order that the opinions of these women—representing married working women, who form the largest class of women in the country—should be placed before the Commission, I have obtained first of all the views on the questions given below, of 124 individual women who are, or who have been, elected officials of the guild, living in all parts of England. They were merely selected on account of their intelligence (we happened to know these officials were especially intelligent women), and with no regard to their views on the subject, which were unknown in every case.

36,975. They were simply sent without knowing what the answers would be. That is the point?—Yes. 124 individual women replied to papers sent them, and there were 431 guild branches, representing 23,501 members, which answered the following questions:—(1) Do you think the grounds for divorce should be the same for men as for women, as they now are in Scotland? (2) Do you think divorce proceedings should be cheapened, so that divorce may be within reach of the poor? Those were the two questions that were sent to the guild branches. The other questions were sent to individual guild members.

36,976. Before we go to the next point, with regard to these branches, what class of women are they who form the branches?—The majority of them would be married women, the wives of every kind of artisan, miners, weavers, railway men, all the ordinary trades that belong to the locality where the branch is.

36,977. They are not what you would call the lowest class at all?—No.

36,978. They are respectable artisans?—Yes.

36,979. Your acquaintance with the country is not confined to London, but you know many of the branches?—Yes, I have been about the country a great deal speaking to the members of the guild, and I have stayed with them in their own homes in different towns all over England.

36,980. Will you now continue with paragraph 3?—"Demand for Reform.—This inquiry has brought out in a striking way an overwhelming demand amongst married women belonging to the artisan class for drastic reform in the divorce laws. I can recall no other subject in the life of the guild which has aroused such immediate response, and elicited such strength and earnestness of feeling. I regret it is impossible to place before the Commission the manuscript letters—often many pages long, laboriously written after thought and consultation—which have been sent in, for the personality and attitude of mind of the writers are largely lost in printed extracts. Great gratification is expressed that evidence on their behalf is to be given, and the hope is strong that reform will come. Such sentences as the following occur: 'I only hope 'this will help you to bring forward a better condition 'for women,' 'trusting that the results of the Commis- 'sion will be justice to the masses,' 'the members 'sincerely hope that the formation of these resolutions 'as law, may come to pass,' 'do please do all you can 'to get equal laws for men and women,' 'we can only 'hope that the result of the Commission will do much 'to amend the laws existing in England.' Where the subject has been discussed in branch meetings, the following remarks are made: 'We had a lengthy dis- 'cussion,' 'these questions were all well discussed, and a 'good deal of feeling put into expression on behalf of 'the members,' 'caused the best discussion we have 'ever had,' 'the questions were freely commented on,' 'they fully realised the immense importance of divorce 'to working people.' A member writes: 'It is said the 'poor are satisfied and do not want divorce laws 'altering, but there is another class perhaps as poor, 'but a different position, who need consideration. 'There are doubtless hundreds like myself suffering a 'martyrdom.' 'There is great need for it among the 'poor, but they never ask for or speak about it, because 'they realise it is only the luxury of the rich.' At a meeting of Lancashire guild officials, held last month, in Manchester, the question was asked: 'are the women 'of Lancashire satisfied with the present divorce 'laws?' 120 officials were present, from over 50 towns in Lancashire."

36,981. Will you tell me what those officials are. Are they artisans' wives?—The women who are members of the guild and who are officials.

36,982. Are they superior people or of the artizan class?—Through their own intelligence they have become officials of the guild. They are taken from the ordinary rank and file of members. They were secretaries of branches and presidents of the local branches of the guild.

36,983. This is not representing the opinions of upper class people?—No, all this evidence is absolutely that of working class women. Feeling was extremely strong—unanimous as regards an equal standard for men and women, and equal facilities for rich and poor—and all except about five or six were of opinion that serious incompatibility should be a ground for divorce. But the most remarkable display was given at the Annual Congress of the Guild last July at Oxford. There was an attendance of 680 working women delegates from all parts of England. The Central Committee member for the Midlands moved a resolution, in a weighty and restrained speech, with a grave sense of the difficulty and responsibility of her task. The seconder was a midwife from the South, who spoke from intimate personal knowledge of the lives of women. The audience listened with great attention, and a discussion was fully anticipated. Instead, not a single delegate rose to speak. They were prepared to vote instantly, The motion was put, and a forest of hands showed itself immediately and silently. There were only five raised against. The summarised results (given hereafter) show a practical unanimity for equalising the grounds of divorce for men and women, and an overwhelmingly great majority are in favour of cheapening the proceedings, while nearly all the 124 individual members consulted agree in desiring greatly extended grounds for divorce.

36,984. Are those the members you have consulted by letter?—Yes there is a small minority of individuals and branches who are opposed to divorce altogether, namely 10 individuals out of 124, and 40 branches out of 431.

36,985. Can you tell us what the resolution referred to on the previous page was?—The congress's resolution was in favour of equality.

36,986. Have you the terms of it?—No, I did not bring that.

36,987. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) What was it in substance?—It was for the equalisation and the cheapening of divorce, simply those two points.

36,988. (Chairman.) If you can get a copy will you kindly insert it here when you correct your proof.* A print of your evidence will be sent to you?—Yes. But one or two of these, while expressing their objection to it, evidently look on it as a necessary evil, and the greater part of them say that as it exists, it should be made equal between men and women. Six branches and five individuals definitely base their objection on religious grounds ("those whom God has joined "together, let no man put asunder"). The following opinions are expressed: "I fear many will not agree with me in not allowing re-marriage, but this has been taught me is contrary to God's command." "From a Christian's point of view I do not believe in a second marriage whilst either of the divorced persons is living. It is quite contrary to the teaching of Christ, and as I profess to be his follower I try and mould my ideas of social life and reform from his teachings." "We take our marriage vow till death (not the law) do us part. At the same time if a couple cannot live together in peace and happiness, it is better for all that they should separate. Especially is this the case where there are children, as it is very hurtful for them to see and hear their parents quarrelling, even if there should be no blows given, which is often the case." Other reasons given for opposing any increase of facilities are that it would "lead to more sin and wickedness," would "lower the standard of the nation's morality," would "make divorce more common," and because "the cost of the law keeps men faithful." A branch secretary writes: "It was resolved that the time was not ripe to alter the laws on marriage or divorce. Instead of doing away with the workhouse we should want more, for if the poor get divorce easy, and there are four or five children, who will keep the wife and children, as we know the woman would not be able to support them: then they fall on the State." Four other individuals are doubtful about allowing divorce. Twenty branches which do not state an objection to divorce in itself are opposed to cheapening it, and seven are in favour of cheapening it for the poor only.

36,989. That is a summary of the objections?—That is the very small minority who are opposed to any extensions. Then paragraph 4: "Attitude towards "Marriage and Divorce.—Our present divorce laws are not only out-of-date when compared with those of other Protestant European countries, but, as I think the evidence of the guild will show, out of touch with the predominant opinion of representatives of the largest class of women. The opinions of these women are not the result of their own unhappiness, for the great majority appear to be happily married, but are based on a close knowledge of the sufferings and needs of others, and guided by a feeling as to what will conduce most to happy, moral—in a word, civilised individual and family lives. Out of 131 cases sent in, only eight related to their own lives. A guild member wrote saying guild women generally are happily married but they are just the sort of women who have other people's troubles confided to them in a way no district visitor or such person, however kindly disposed, hears them. I have thought it desirable to give almost all the cases, in order: (1) to show the nature and causes of the suffering that goes on, and (2) to show how widespread it is, especially among women. Owing to the state of the law and the fear of hostile public opinion, this suffering is so often borne unseen that the extent and character of it is not realised. It is striking to find out of all these cases which have been sent in, over 130, that only 24 referred to any hardships to men, and of these 24, 11 are insanity cases. I think it is rather remarkable as showing that the suffering is evidently very much more on the side of women than on the side of men. I think women would have an opportunity of knowing and would be quite as sympathetic with men who were suffering with wives who were unfaithful, or from any other cause, and having actually had only this very small number of cases in which the hardship was on the man's side, in spite of some of the cases referring to women only, such as refusal to maintain and cruelty, it is very striking as showing that the great mass of suffering is on the part of the women. The general attitude of the women towards divorce is very definite. They look upon it as a much needed method of release in cases where the marriage tie involves a life of degradation and suffering, most often to women and children. No woman could inflict on a man the amount of degradation that a man may force on a woman. The desire for reform does not proceed from any light wish for a life of pleasure, or for the loosening of home ties. One branch secretary writes, 'I am instructed to say that all present 'considered the divorce law not one to be lightly 'sought for, but when a just need calls for action, it 'should be brought within the reach of the poor.' It is clear that by the great majority, the sanctity of marriage is regarded as depending on the nature of the marriage relation. All our members were most emphatic that where the husband and wife could not live happily together, it was no real marriage. It was a life of fraud, without love. 'Nothing but love should 'hold two together in this most sacred of all bonds.' Another member, who is a churchwoman and a communicant, writes: 'I have just resigned from the 'Mothers' Union, of which I have been a member for '15 years, because I do not hold with the line they are 'taking over this divorce. I am told they are getting 'up a petition, and that people are signing it just to 'please the ladies, although as a matter of fact they 'approve of divorce. If I had my time to go over 'again I would not be married in a church. It is said 'that marriages are made in heaven, but in my opinion 'the only real marriage is when men and women are 'real comrades. When they are not, then in the sight 'of God it is not marriage. Never, never will I 'believe that submission to man who has killed every 'scrap of affection and respect by his unfaithfulness 'and neglect, is accepted in the eyes of a loving and 'just God.'" Where the marriage relation is bad, divorce is looked upon as a right course. Analysing the answers, it appears that the better relation to be desired between married people and the power to dissolve a bad relation, are hindered by a combination of causes:—(1) the view sanctioned by law and custom that the wife is the property of her husband; (2) the want of any effective and reasonably reliable means of support for married women, felt especially where there are children; (3) the fact that the children are the property of the father; (4) the dread of public disgrace.

* The following is the resolution requested in Q. 36,988:—"That this Congress unreservedly condemns the inequality in the grounds for divorce for men and women in England, and is of opinion that divorce proceedings should be made cheaper, so that, where needed, divorce should be possible for the poor as well as for the rich."—(Moved by the Central Committee.)

(1) The feeling against the idea that the wife is the property of the husband is extremely strong. "It lies," says a member, "at the root of the whole question." Others write: "We want to get rid of the idea that a man owns his wife just as he does a piece of furniture. Men have in the past looked upon women as something they could own as one of their possessions as long as they choose. There is so much harm done by a woman regarding herself as a man's personal property. It would be well for England if men and women knew they did not possess each other as property, but felt rather that each was the complement of the other. It is certain many married people would consider each other more if they knew there was a probability of a separation; now a man often feels that his wife is his, no matter how he treats her, and that she must stay to attend to his home and children from social as well as economic reasons. Certainly divorce in itself should not be looked on as shameful, continued intercourse may often be more shameful. I believe if it (divorce) was equal, men would look on women with more respect than at present. I think it is this difference which gives a man the idea that a woman is his property to do as he pleases with. Much needs to be done in educating woman to a realisation of her own importance and responsibility, then she may be the companion and not the servant or property of her husband. I believe it is because men and women think marriage is so fatally binding that in many cases they rebel and err or sin against existing laws, and I feel sure that if women had equal chances with men in this respect, they would respect themselves more and really look upon their bodies as their own property, and not so soon give in to the brutal desires of lazy selfish men. It is terrible to see women giving birth to babies that are born handicapped by the vices of the father."

(2) Although the law recognises the claim of a wife to maintenance, it gives her no legal power to enforce it unless she leaves her husband. The wife who devotes herself to home and does not go out to work has no money of her own at all; and at any moment, owing to a man's selfishness, whim, loss of work, illness or death, a woman may have to submit to being given insufficient money for the family expenditure (and few people know how common it is for men to retain a considerable portion of their wages), she may be left entirely without support, or may even have her home sold over her head. A member writes: "I always remember saying to a woman living apart from her husband what I should do if my husband had turned out to be the beast some men are, nearly killing their own wives to satisfy their own lust, and she said to me: 'And what if you had no wage at the week-end?' and the horror I felt because I thought of the women who could not earn money, but were bound to submit to men because of economic reasons, to get money for themselves and their children. It is rather a serious matter for women. Many men desire young wives, and get rather tired of wives who have been faithfull and perhaps through caring for a family have been kept in the house and have not had a chance of progress. They have aged whilst their husbands have kept young. Now it is no light matter for a woman to turn out in the world again to earn a living, especially with no trade. We know there is not work for young girls, never mind women who have been at home several years, and you cannot always blame a woman who puts up with fearful things for the sake of her home. I was thinking what an awful thing it must be to go round to get work, and if they knew at a works that you were separated from your husband, well that would go dead against you, so you see it would often mean starvation. It is an awful thing the economic dependence on the man, if he happens to be a worthless one, or one that thinks he is 'keeping his wife' when she is at home doing the work." Another member says: "One of our own guild members is compelled to live a life of worry and disgrace through the misconduct of her husband. Because she has a young family for whom it is impossible for her to provide, she must drag through a more than living death."

(3) and (4) The woman has so long had to bear any stigma arising from seeking divorce that she accepts her life for her own and her children's sakes; and the fact that her children belong to her husband if she leaves him is another reason for enduring terrible personal cruelties. "The woman covers up everything for the sake of the children." "A woman endures everything, even amounting to martyrdom, before saying a word." "I suppose it is the children which stops more divorce cases than anything—that is the worst of the marriage tie, all children born in wedlock being the property of the father." "A mother feels it a duty to suffer and bear unkindness in silence for her children's sake. She will suffer much to prevent the finger of scorn being pointed at her children, or that they should have the knowledge of a drunken and brutal father. There are many homes where a mother will hurry her children to bed so soon as she hears the footsteps of a drunken and cruel husband. I know a young man who was 18 years of age before he was aware that his father was intemperate, and that his mother had suffered all these years from various forms of ill-treatment." But there is now a strong and growing feeling that these conditions and views, formerly either accepted or submitted to, are wrong. There is also a rapidly growing conviction that it is the right of children to be born well, and to be brought up in a good home. Children should be borne in love only, and never in any lower or any less satisfactory conditions." "I consider it is a greater shame for a woman to be obliged to bring up children under such conditions than it would be to have a divorce." "I think I would work my fingers to the bone rather than let my children live with an immoral husband." "What a different state of affairs might exist if the feeling prevailed that it was not moral to bear children to an immoral father or drunkard, or to a man they do not honour or love. What, are our future citizens to be brought up in homes where ill-treatment and no mutual affection exist? No credit to the name of Briton." "I think it is an awful position for a woman to be compelled to live with a man and suffer the degradation of bearing him children when all respect and love for him is lost. And I greatly fear it rests on the poor unfortunate children to such an extent as to warp their whole lives." "Undoubtedly it is bad for children to be brought up in a loveless home, far better to separate, otherwise it is so difficult to train them to live a Christian life. I speak from bitter experience."

These women think that divorce is essential for the destruction of wrong and suffering; but they also believe in its constructive value. They believe that greater facilities for obtaining divorce will tend to the happiness and stability of married life. The following quotations express the view that divorce might lead to better and more moral behaviour:—"It would be one way to keep young life more pure if divorce was cheaper, as when some young people get married unhappily, they would be able to get free and so not lead so much a wicked life as some do now." From what I know of working people, I do not think cheaper divorce will cause more immorality. But I think one cause of immorality is the code of ethics held by such men as Judge Bigham, and it is a commonly accepted one. "While one feels that with easier facilities, the number of divorces may increase, there will be the satisfaction of knowing there is less suffering, and greater happiness with a higher standard of morality." "Reforms on similar lines to Norway will make for a better home life and a strengthening instead of weakening the bonds of true marriage." "I have in mind where a woman lived for years with a man and the clergyman got them married, and the woman said they got on very well together as long as the man knew she could leave him, but directly they were married—tied to him—he treated her cruelly." "Our present system actually puts a premium on unfaithfulness." "Only in homes where no love exists will divorce ever be thought of." "I think making divorce easier would have a deterrent effect and stimulate to better things." "When the economic conditions of women's lives are altered and they learn to value themselves as something better than to have to marry, as so many hundreds do, not for pure love but for the sake of having a home of their own, because they see no prospect of an independent old age, we shall have fewer divorce cases to sadden us." "I am sure if the law of this country was reformed in the same direction (as Norway) we should soon see a happier and purer family life as a result, for if either man or woman knew that the result of incompatibility would likely be divorce, how much more careful it would make each one when making a choice of a partner, and how much more careful to display only the best qualities in the house." "I feel sure if divorce could be obtained at less cost, I believe it would have a tendency to bring about a better Moral State in the near future." "I believe that equality in the divorce law would raise the standard of morality for both men and women, and in cases where there are children, equality would have a beneficial effect on their standard of morality."

36,990. Then the next part of your proof are opinions of branches and individuals with sample cases?—"It will be seen from the opinion of guild members given below what are the specific reforms wanted, some being more urgently desired than others. These reforms include:—(1) The same grounds for divorce between men and women; (2) the cheapening of divorce, and, where necessary, the payment by the State of the whole costs; (3) the extension of the grounds of divorce to include: (a) persistent refusal to maintain, (b) insanity (with restrictions), (c) desertion over a period of two years, (d) cruelty, (e) separation order which has lasted three years or less, (f) mutual consent, (g) serious incompatibility; (4) offences on both sides to be no bar to divorce; (5) the general suitability of the parent for bringing up children to be the ground on which the guardianship should be decided; (6) the trial of cases in county courts with closed doors; (7) women to be given some part in the administration of the law; (8) maintenance under the law of separation and divorce to be collected and paid out by the court." Since this proof was printed 87 additional branches have sent in, so that the numbers that follow are altered.

Below are summarised the replies of the 124 individuals and of the 431 branches and 23,501 members on the questions submitted to them, with a few illustrative cases and opinions. Further cases are given in an Appendix.

"(1) Should the present grounds for divorce be the same for men as women?—It is impossible to exaggerate the strength of the feeling that there should be an equal moral standard for men and women and that the grounds of divorce should be the same. There is not a single individual who gives a negative or doubtful reply. It is felt that the present law actually encourages immorality, and unfaithfulness is spoken of as 'the most refined cruelty of all.' The idea is deeply resented that cruelty should be interpreted as bodily cruelty only."

Shall I continue with all this?

36,991. Yes, I think this is so valuable we ought to have it all?—"Out of 124 individuals asked questions 123 women reply in the affirmative, including 13 who are opposed to divorce, but who are of opinion that while there is divorce, the ground should be the same for men and women. One, whom I happened to know is opposed to divorce, does not reply."

"Branch replies.—413, out of 431 branches with 22,558 members, reply in the affirmative, including 25 branches with 1,438 members who are opposed to divorce, but who are of opinion (often strongly expressed) that while there is divorce, the ground should be the same for men and women. Three branches with 156 members reply in the negative. 12 branches with 650 members are opposed to divorce and do not reply to this question."

The cases are as follows:—

"1. Husband left wife and five little children all too young to work, and went to live in a neighbouring town with another woman. Wife earns 7*s.* 6*d.* She has applied for a Separation Order, but cannot get one, as the husband times his visits to her sufficiently often to prevent it, yet he has not sent her a penny for nine weeks."

"2. The wife of a man in a fairly flourishing condition could only obtain a Separation Order with small alimony, although the husband is living in open infidelity with another woman."

"3. A wife sold all her property (1) to help her husband in business, (2) to save his name being dragged through court in an affiliation case. The husband brought home another woman and made her sit at the head of the table, the wife knowing he was keeping up a house for this other woman. When she inquired about getting a divorce, she was told that as the house was the husband's, he had a right to bring anyone he liked there. She used to lock herself in another bedroom at night. She tried to obtain a Separation Order, without success, because he provided a good home for her, and there was no violence. In the end he turned her into the street, and she was able to bring a witness to prove it, so got a Separation Order."

"4. I know of a case now where the husband (who is a tackler in a mill) boasts to his wife that he can do what he likes with certain women and does. They are past middle life, he and his wife, and have a married son. She has reached that stage of intolerance when she longs for a divorce."

"5. Husband went to South Africa as reservist; while the war was on the wife got her money from the War Office, but when the war was over, of course that was stopped. He stayed out there to get work for some time. After a time he came back home, while his wife was at work, and brought another woman and demanded she should live with them. The house was in his name, so she had either to submit or leave him; in which case she would have had no claim for maintenance and there were four children to be kept, so she lived through it. I know too well what she suffered while that kind of thing existed. After a time he went away again with the woman and she does not know where he is."

"6. I know myself of a case where a woman has suffered untold agonies through the disease given to her by an unfaithful husband, her children also suffer from a skin disease and are puny and sickly-looking, and yet he has never struck her. Outwardly he is apparently all that a man should be. I think the evidence of the woman herself and of the doctor who has attended her should be sufficient evidence."

"7. I know of one case in particular where the husband has committed adultery, but the wife cannot show proof of cruelty also (the 'cruelty' taking a form which cannot be shown, but nevertheless less endurable). He could claim the children (girls) and because of this she puts up with him, and her life is a misery. He knows the existing law, and trades on this grave inequality of moral standard for men and women." (See Appendix, Cases 58–66.)

"Opinions.—Men have argued with me that it is not so bad for the man because he does not take it home, and the woman does; but I answered that he does what is quite as bad, he sends the trouble to someone else's home, and perhaps has been guilty of immorality with the very woman 'who takes it home.' I have heard men declare it is safer to have relations with a married woman, because none of the consequences will fall on the man."

"The fact of a man committing adultery ought to be considered cruelty, without having to prove bodily cruelty."

"There should not be two codes of honour. If a man expects to mate with a virtuous woman, it should be her right to expect the same from him."

"Otherwise a lower standard is encouraged for men."

"A woman has a right to expect from a man the same purity he demands from her. Unhappily, she is, I believe, often disappointed, but whatever a man may have done before marriage, it is to my thinking an abominable idea to regard any act of unfaithfulness as an accident."

"Is not adultery itself a great cruelty?"

"I very much object to divorce altogether, unless the guilty person should be prevented from remarrying . . . As it is deemed necessary to have a Divorce Law . . . the same conditions should be applied to men and women."

"I think certainly the grounds for divorce should be equal, as the women in most cases suffer more from the husband's wrong-doing."

"A witness said an offence on the part of the wife involved 'confusion of progeny,' and was therefore criminal. I fail to see where the difference lies. In the man's case, it must involve 'confusion of progeny' in the woman with whom he has committed adultery, just as much as in the wife's case. The witness who made this statement was merely putting it from a husband's point of view. What difference does he imagine there is between his wife and any other woman with regard to confusion of progeny?"

"Grounds for divorce should be equal, to prevent men carrying on a life of immorality, knowing the law cannot touch them, as long as they refrain from physical cruelty to the wife." (This remark from a woman illustrates my meaning.) "He would not illtreat me although carrying on with other women, because he knows if he did, I should apply for separation or divorce."

"I am surprised to find that so many respectable men think a man should be forgiven for occasional immorality, but not a woman."

"It is a very unjust law for a woman to be (in some cases almost starved) and ill-treated in many ways before she can be allowed a divorce, when she can prove without doubt adultery against her husband."

"I myself have had such a happy married life that I cannot possibly think women would in any way abuse the law if it was made the same for them as it is for men, especially when there are children of the marriage. As a rule, English people hold marriage as a sacred tie, and it is only when some very deep incompatibility arises between them that divorce is thought of."

"We have cases that we know where the above law (permitting divorce for adultery without cruelty) would be very helpful to some good women and mothers and their families."

"(2) Should divorce proceedings be cheapened, and where necessary be free of all cost?—The feeling is very widespread that the poor should have the same chances as the rich. The question of cost is of special importance to women. As most wives have no money of their own, they are prevented from either defending a case (thus often are unable to prove their greater suitability as guardians) or from bringing a suit. Where the only chance of payment of costs is out of the husband's weekly wage, it is most difficult for a woman to get her case taken up by a solicitor. No cheapening of divorce can meet the needs of wives. All costs, including the expenses of witnesses, must be State paid, where they cannot be recovered from the husband, and the wife has no property."

"(a) Should divorce proceedings be cheaper?—Individual replies.—Out of 124, 119 women reply in the affirmative, including nine who are opposed to divorce, but who are of opinion that, while there is divorce it should be within reach of the poor as well as the rich. Three who are opposed to divorce reply in the negative, one of whom is of opinion it should only be made cheaper in exceptional cases. Two who are opposed to divorce do not reply."

"Branch replies.—Three hundred and sixty-four branches with 19,124 members reply in the affirmative, including six branches with 223 members which are opposed to divorce, but are of opinion that while there is divorce it should be within reach of the poor as well as the rich, and seven branches which desire that the cost should not be lessened for the rich, but should be graduated according to income, or paid by the State in the case of the poor. Fifty-three branches with 3,000 odd members reply in the negative. Of these, 33 branches with 2,064 members are opposed to divorce. Fourteen branches with 1,155 members are doubtful, or made no reply."

"(b) Should all costs of Divorce proceedings be paid by the State where necessary?—Individual replies.—Ninety-seven women out of 124 reply in the affirmative, of whom, six are opposed to or doubtful about divorce. Six women reply in the negative, of whom three are opposed to or are doubtful about divorce. Four are doubtful. Seventeen do not reply."

36,992. Do your branches include all denominations of people?—Yes, I think the majority would probably be non-conformists, but it is never asked and it is not known definitely. Then the cases are as follows:—

"8. A woman wished to obtain a divorce, but had to wait till after the birth of her baby. Her husband left her alone in London, a few weeks before the birth of her child. She knew no one, she had no money, and he had pawned all her jewellery. When the baby was born the doctor wished to send for her father as she was in such a terrible condition. When she was strong enough she went with her baby to her people in Manchester. With the help of her father, she managed to obtain enough money to start proceedings, and the case was dated for some little time before the long vacation. She had to come with her baby from Manchester to London, find lodgings for herself, then find her witnesses, one of whom was the nurse, who had to be paid, as she lost her employment for the time she appeared. The doctor, in spite of his action at the child's birth, refused to appear as a witness. After being in London several days, some of which were spent entirely in the Law Courts, she was told that, owing to other cases, the divorce case could not be heard until after the vacation. Owing to the need for money, she was unable to proceed any further."

"9. A man had a bad wife who left him. He saved 30*l.* towards a divorce, but was told it was impossible to obtain it for so small a sum. He has since been out of work, and has had to use the money saved."

"10. A young wife was left with one child. The husband went to America and married another woman, and the wife saved up for six years before she could get a divorce."

"11. I know of a case where the man sold the home up while his wife was away nursing a sick mother, and went off with another woman. The wife had to furnish a house on the hire system and take in boarders. She has made a living for herself and two children for five years, has paid for the furniture, and is now saving up to get a divorce. In a case like this she ought to have it free."

"12. I knew a man a few years ago who had to lead a very lonely life as he could not raise the money. However, some friends came forward in the end and made a collection which enabled the man to procure a divorce. But many years of his life had been dulled and wasted through the want of means."

"13. Husband frequently leaves wife to go with another woman who actually leads a life of ill-fame while the husband is with her. The consequences to the wife are terrible: frequent miscarriages and abortion have occurred to the poison. The wife is absolutely dependent on the husband, and has no money for divorce proceedings. Further, her ill-health (due to the man) prevents her working for wages. She is hard-working, clean and worthy in every way."

"14. A married woman was regularly visited by a 'gentleman,' so that even the children, of whom she had five, began to talk about it. Things went on in this way for several years, until a collection of 60*l.* was made by the husband's friends and fellow workmen, and he got a divorce. Eventually he married again and lives happily. He is a good husband and father." (See Appendix, cases 67–90.)

Opinions.—"At present many lives are made miserable because they have no means to take proceedings."

"Only those who have money benefit under the present law."

"Many poor women have to put up with a dreadful life, through not having the means to get a divorce."

"In this respectable town of ours, the members spoke of two cases where the women would be thankful and are praying that the law may make it easy for them to get a divorce; they cannot afford it now. In some cases the want of facility for divorce makes life unbearable, as the expense entailed does not come within their reach."

"It would save a large amount of unseen suffering and sorrow to many poor women."

"It is much harder for poor people to live together, if either party are wanting a divorce, as they cannot get away from each other as rich people can."

"The law if anything should be made easier for the poor than the wealthy, seeing that in the majority of cases they are even unable to have separate bedrooms."

"I know of several cases of persons who are separated from their husbands or wives, who are living with other men and women, and I certainly think they would have been married had they had the means to obtain a divorce."

"A question of justice should not depend on monetary power."

"If divorce were cheaper, the working woman could claim to be freed from the insults and indignities that often follow separation. After separation a man often dogs a woman's footsteps, especially if she has partially earned the living and makes himself a pest, until the woman either in despair or misled by false promises, takes him back, thereby losing the sum allowed by the court and making her own life more cruel than before."

"Divorce has been a thing out of their reach."

"One thing the women were quite emphatic on was that they could never collect the money even up to 50*l.*"

"Divorce should be cheaper, so that the poor can obtain it. The State should bear the cost when it is absolutely necessary, because the poor are brought in to so much closer contact with each other than the rich, which makes it harder to bear."

"All the arguments for cheaper divorce have not proved to me any solution for the woman's difficulty, as the working-man's wife in the vast majority of cases would not be any better off. Where there is unfaithfulness, drunkenness, cruelty, insanity or desertion the wife is almost sure to be absolutely unable to pay even for a cheap divorce, so I cannot see anything but free divorce."

"The State should assist, as it is very few women who have any money."

"Very few working-men's wives can have money of their own, because, where the husband is not true to home ties, his money finds many other channels, therefore the wife has no chance to save anything for herself, more often she can hardly make ends meet."

"A poor woman is not given any wages for her services as wife, but a housekeeper could state a wage and claim it, but a wife has only shelter and food and clothing. If she wants a divorce, where are her funds? She has none."

"It is far from right that the poor should have to suffer without remedy, because expensive, a hateful companionship, while the rich, to whom such a companionship is not nearly so odious or galling as to the poor people in their small houses, can afford to pay for freedom."

"Most wives of working men are poor, as the money they receive or rather their husbands earn, is not enough to provide for ordinary comforts, let alone allowing for any saving, either for himself or herself, and if there was any over, the husband as a rule would have it put away in his own name. Therefore it is necessary for a woman to know of some resource in dire cases of necessity, and that source should be a State Fund."

"Yes, as the husband might object to money provided for housekeeping being used for such purposes."

"Yes, I do not see the use of women who have no means applying for a divorce unless the State pays, perhaps then they will begin to ask why it is that a married woman has no money of her own."

36,993. I gather the Congress dealt with equality and cost. Now we are coming to individuals?—Yes, these additional grounds were only asked of the individuals. The 431 branches also dealt almost exclusively with equality and cost. The only other question they were asked was whether women should serve on juries. The rest of the evidence is what the 124 individuals have given.

"(3) Should there be additional grounds for divorce?"

"(a) Should the husband's refusal to maintain wife and family be a ground for divorce?"

"Replies.—91 women reply in the affirmative, of whom three are not in favour of divorce; 12 reply in the negative, of whom three are opposed to divorce. Two are in favour of punishment or separation as a preliminary step; six are doubtful, one being opposed to divorce; 13 make no reply."

"Cases. — 15. Bright, active, intelligent young woman, learning baking and confectionery after marriage in order to help up the finances. Husband begins to loaf and gamble, deceiving his wife in many ways and when given money (by her) to pay her confectionery bills keeping the money, selling her clothes and even their wedding presents. She finally left him and found herself deep in debt, destitute, and almost naked, having slaved week in week out. Has now a good chance of marrying a most suitable man, but unable to do so and has to work very hard to make a living. Only 35 years of age—a proud and honest woman who has never in her life owed a penny."

"16. Brother going to see his married sister and two little girls, found them starving. He at once took them to his home. Because she had left her husband, he (the husband) refused to pay anything towards her maintenance, but offered to take the two children, one a year and the other two years old. This happened nine years ago, and she has never received a penny from him, but has supported herself and the children."

"17. The man was not over fond of work, consequently did not stay long at one place and she had to follow. She has now two children, and they are parted.

He is deemed to pay 7*s.* a week towards the maintenance. He has been more than once before the Court, and still does not or will not pay, and the girl and the children are dependent on her old grandparents."

"Opinions.—In cases where the husband would not support wife and family, I should certainly grant divorce, in order to limit the family, otherwise I think the family would sink to the lowest level and in time would become chargeable on the rates as paupers. If a divorce be granted, we relieve the wife of a great trouble concerning a worthless man and in nine cases out of ten the woman will rise above it."

"I believe it would make divorce far too easy."

"In some cases it would be unwise to free a husband to marry again."

"(b) Should insanity be a ground for divorce?—The great majority are in favour of this. A considerable number desire it only in cases where the insanity has been pronounced incurable. Others consider that the possibility of children being born should be removed. It is difficult for women to support children without the help of a husband and it is thought a hardship that a woman with a hopelessly insane husband should not be allowed to remarry. The need for some precaution is realised. One member says: 'Yes, provided the patient were not in a private lunatic asylum.' Another writes: 'Provided it is not insanity brought on, as is often the case, by weakness in child-bearing or ill-usage.'"

"Replies.—98 out of 124 reply in the affirmative, four being opposed to divorce, and 18 saying only incurable insanity should be a ground for divorce; 14 reply in the negative, four being opposed to divorce; two are doubtful, one being opposed to divorce; 10 make no reply."

"Cases.—18. Wife has been insane six years, in an asylum, and there is no hope of recovery. The husband has made the acquaintance of a girl who has grown to care for him, and they are hoping for a reform in the Divorce Law to allow them to marry."

"19. Husband has been in an asylum many years, and there is no hope of recovery. The wife has had several offers of marriage."

"20. Wife went insane after birth of third child, and there is no hope of recovery. The husband has to have a housekeeper, and desires divorce."

"21. Wife becomes insane after birth of first child, and is sent to a lunatic asylum. Recovers and lives with husband again. Becomes insane again after birth of second child, and is again sent to asylum. This horrid drama is repeated, until now the woman has been the mother of eight children and is in an asylum permanently."

"22. A man's wife has been in the County Asylum for 16 years. The man is a good tradesman and steady, but with the exception of living with a woman who is not his wife is otherwise a moral man."

"23. Another man not far from here, whose wife is in the asylum and has a family of young children, cannot get a housekeeper without creating a lot of slander. What is he to do? His wife might possibly live for years, thus preventing him ever getting married again."

"24. Man has had his wife in asylum 30 years. This man went through the form of marriage with a woman much younger than himself, and now there is a second family, and the woman does not know her husband has a previous wife living." (See Appendix, Cases 91–96.)

"Opinions.—Unless it is just a temporary attack, it is unjust to both men and women, because the man is left with young children, and he must either engage another woman or send the children away, or they are sadly neglected. Then, if it is the man, the mother is deprived of the income, and if there are any children she must either go out to work and neglect her children or she must become a pauper, and if she does this the relief is so small that often the woman goes wrong."

"Especially where the case is certified by the doctor as incurable, and if ever insanity is stamped out, I think stringent means will have to be taken that no children follow where insanity has been proved, however slight."

"Where insanity was proved to be hereditary or incurable. In cases of insanity from fear at the approaching childbirth or from shock, not until three or four years have elapsed. I have known cases of insanity from these causes where the person has recovered the mental balance."

"I would grant divorce on the ground of insanity, so as to benefit the future race."

"It is often a hardship on a man with young children to be bound to a wife who is insane and for whom there is no hope of recovery. It leads to immorality and often gives rise to a deal of scandal when there is no real cause, as it is impossible for a working man to earn his living and look after his children as well. He should be granted a divorce and be free to marry again, if he so desired, for the sake of his children."

"We cannot favour divorce through insanity. It is an affliction and a person might be detained for a few years, getting out and finding the said person married again. We think it enough to drive them insane again."

"I do not think that insanity (unless proved to be brought about by the patient's bad conduct) should be grounds for divorce. It is an affliction, just as much as consumption, paralysis, &c."

"(c) Should desertion for a period of two years be a ground for divorce? Individual replies.—88 women reply in the affirmative, four being opposed to divorce; seven would make the period of desertion from 3 to 5 years; one would make the period of desertion from 8 to 10 years; seven reply in the negative, three of whom are opposed to divorce; seven are doubtful, two of whom are opposed to divorce; 14 make no reply."

"Cases.—25. Husband had been in Post Office 24 years. Three months after his marriage his wife tired of living with him in Wales and went back to his mother. Three years later she joined him in Shropshire with their little girl, but after two months she left him again, and they have not lived together since. It is simply incompatibility of temper. The husband often says that if husband and wife have no intercourse for 10 years (except an allowance to the wife) divorce ought to be obtainable."

"26. Husband was sentenced to long term of imprisonment, and then deserted his wife. She remained faithful to him 28 years, and then ventured to marry again."

"27. Young woman under 30, well educated and qualified to take a good position, married. The husband by his own fault lost his situation and had to go abroad to regain his character and a livelihood. She supported herself, and I believe sent him money, and after some time offered to pay his passage home and keep a home for them till he got a situation. He refused, and rarely writes to her. She feels the burden of being bound to a man who does not want her. She would get a divorce, but can only do so at the great expense of sending an agent abroad to obtain evidence of the man's life." (See also Appendix, Cases 97–102.)

"Opinions.—By the time two years had elapsed the mind would be fully made up as to the possibility of coming together again or not."

"If they have been parted for two years there can be no mutual sympathy, and it means either a life of celibacy or going wrong."

"If a man deserts his wife and family for two years he would not hesitate to do so always, therefore I think divorce in this case would be just."

"(d) Should cruelty be a ground for divorce? Under cruelty it is thought should be included all forms of cruelty, besides actual bodily cruelty, and the communication of disease."

"Replies.—100 women reply in the affirmative of whom four are opposed to divorce; two reply in the negative, one of whom is opposed to divorce; five are doubtful, two of whom are opposed to divorce; 17 do not reply."

36,994. Do you mean the four who are opposed to divorce in the first line are included in the affirmative although they are opposed to divorce?—Yes, they often say they do not wish for divorce, but given divorce they would be in favour of this particular form. That is what they mean. The cases are as follows:—

"28. In a case I know of the wife has had a terrible life. She has had 11 children, and told me that during the periods of pregnancy he would do all sorts of things to frighten her and so bring on miscarriage. He has even crept down the cellar grate and then rushed up the steps and burst into the kitchen with a great yell. Still she was obliged to stay with him, because she had no means of supporting herself and children."

"29. I know of women who always try to bring on abortion when first they are pregnant, not because they are afraid of the pain for they suffer more than they would at a birth, nor because they do not love children, but because the husband will grumble and make things unpleasant because there will be another mouth to fill and he may have to deprive himself of something. In one case the man always thrashes his wife and has put her life in danger in his anger on discovering her condition. The very fact that they can become pregnant, instead of making them more valuable, makes for their misery. Is it not more degrading for these women to be living in what is, after all, legalised prostitution, than for them to be divorced?"

"30. A woman after being ill-used and kicked about, has tried her husband five times, each time receiving the same treatment from her husband, and has had to work in the factory to keep the house together, and had to be carried home often very ill, and is still after four years under the doctor. I could state many hard cases, in each case the wife a good hardworking and clean woman and mother." (See also the important and detailed cases 113, 114, 117, in Appendix.)

"31. Husband and wife have been separated seven years. He was cruel to her, but she cannot prove adultery. She would like to marry again, but cannot get a divorce (1) owing to poverty, (2) owing to the difficulty of proving adultery."

"32. My cousin married a man who has behaved most brutally towards her, has broken her teeth, blacked her eyes, and bruised her body, and I believe is not kind to the children. This is not a case of drunkenness for the man does not drink; it is temper, which I think is a form of insanity. My cousin has told me with her own lips that he has killed every spark of love she had for him, but she must put up for the children's sake."

"33. I have a neighbour married to a well-educated man and she has said that her husband has been cruel in every form, but such as the law cannot touch."

"34. There are cases where divorce would be beneficial from various points of view, such as insanity, insistence on conjugal rights, when either party are suffering from disease which would cause the children to be born unhealthy, especially if it is sexual disease. I have had a case just lately where the baby was born with this terrible disease, and in spite of every effort on the part of the doctor and myself, the child went blind. This is the second case of the kind that I have personally had to do with. One child is dead. Many more cases where the disease has shown itself in children and adults have come to my notice."

"35. Husband physically rotten through bad life previous to marriage. Compelled wife to cohabit—result three children with sore eyes and ears, and mentally deficient."

"36. There is another question that I should like it as a reason for either a man or a woman to get a divorce, for when a man suffers from a bad disease and contracts it to his wife. This I can speak on with a personal knowledge of, being a victim to it myself, which has meant years of misery for me, not only for me, but there is children to consider, and the woman covers up all for the sake of the children."

"Opinions.—If a man who is so cowardly as to ill-use the woman he has promised to love and cherish, by violence, I consider she is perfectly justified in obtaining a divorce."

"Cruelty is one of the things which cannot be tolerated in the relations between man and woman. No law can make it right for a woman to submit to it. And the present system of separation encourages immorality."

"The power and stability of the State depending upon the units of which it is composed, that power and stability is seriously threatened by the fact that women are forced to bear children (who will be the future citizens) to men often totally unfitted to become fathers."

"Yes, and I would take all forms of cruelty, such as injury to health by the husband's misdeeds, besides personal violence."

"I emphasise this. I know of some cases of persistent cruelty, and they are unable to get a divorce, but can get a separation only. These women are always in fear."

"Some of us women consider moral cruelty worse to bear with than physical cruelty. There are many ways in which a husband can be cruel without breaking the law as it stands at present."

"I believe there would be less cruel treatment if it was known a divorce could be got on these lines."

"(e) Should drunkenness be a ground for divorce?—(This question was only sent to 40 individuals.)"

36,995. Why was that?—It was owing to the fact that my evidence was put off. I was going to give it before the Commission rose. There were a certain number of individuals we included afterwards to make the evidence more complete. In the first number who were asked questions these were not included.

36,996. This gives those to whom this question was sent?—Yes. "26 women reply in the affirmative, including one who is opposed to divorce; five reply in the negative, including one who would allow separation. Three of these are opposed to divorce. Two are doubtful. Seven make no reply. A few others who were not asked the question suggested it as a cause."

"Cases.—37. Husband had a good trade, but drank. In order to bring up her family properly the wife had to go out to work at charing and washing, with her own housework to do when she got in. The man often abused her and drank to excess, which led to immorality. She died suddenly one day while out at work."

"38. Woman had a drunken husband. He would not work, and drank all he could get hold of. She had to work hard and keep him and family—two children. She now has met a fellow who would give her and the children a good home. When doing regular work he earns 2*l.* a week. Would like to marry him, but the law is against her, and she cannot afford to spend any money on solicitors. She has decided to keep house for the fellow. They now have every friend and acquaintance pointing fingers at them!"

"39. Wife has lapsed into intemperance, and leaves her home for days together, on one occasion was away four days drinking, when her baby was 12 days old. The man is a total abstainer, fond of home, and kind in every way, except in allowing such a woman to bear children."

"40. The man was an ardent total abstainer before marriage and for many years after, but he gave way to drink and brought untold sufferings on his wife and children. Surely in a case of this sort the woman could not be blamed for marrying a drunkard, neither should she be forced to live with him, but as things are to-day she could not obtain a divorce however much she desired it."

"41. A relative of mine married a man of good family who has turned out a complete drunkard. She has left him four times, come home and returned, as she says, for the sake of the children, so that they should be brought up with their father. Each time she has returned she has had another little one, making five in all. Now this man has had delirium tremens several times. I ask that a divorce should be made compulsory in cases of this sort, if only to prevent having children." (See Appendix, cases 103–5.)

"Opinions.—There is such a lot of different ways of cruelly treating a woman, and also for drunkenness, which I think is one of the worst forms of cruelty for a sober woman to be married to a drunkard."

"I think drunkenness ought to be a cause for divorce in England."

"(f) Imprisonment as a ground for divorce.—No question was asked as to whether a sentence of penal servitude should be a ground for divorce, but a few suggested that it should be."

"(g) Should a separation order which has lasted for three years be a ground for divorce?—Individual replies.—75 women replied in the affirmative, of whom three are opposed to divorce; seven replied in the negative, of whom three are opposed to divorce; seven are doubtful; 35 made no reply."

36,997. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) How many was that sent to? Was it 124?—Yes.

36,998. (Chairman.) May we take it that the 40 only relates to the drunkards?—Yes. The opinions are as follows:—

"I think two years is enough to allow anyone to make up their minds whether they would be able to live together again."

"Yes, I think separation often leads to immorality."

"Separations are often unsatisfactory, but if at the end of three years there is no desire for re-union, divorce would be better for both parties, and much immorality would be avoided."

"After three years or even less, especially in cases of separation owing to drunkenness and cruelty, the position would be improved by granting a divorce."

"After three years or even less. I do not much care for separation, as it generally leads to immorality. It is much better in the interests of the State that a divorce should be obtained, so as to give them the opportunity to live a happy and useful life with someone else."

"In many cases, after one year, separation orders should become divorce."

"I think it is desirable that an application for divorce could be made at any time by a person who has obtained a separation order—if the Court grant a separation, there is the same occasion for a divorce."

"I think if divorce was granted after a period of separation it would tend to lessen immorality. As it is, neither party can marry, and this leads in some cases to men and women making unlawful alliances, and children are born with the stigma of illegitimacy attached to them."

"If husband and wife have become so alienated that they have lived apart for three years it should most certainly be a ground for divorce."

"I think if man and wife have been separated for three years and still feel they cannot again be united, certainly I think a divorce should be granted, although I am sure many would be against granting divorce."

"If the parties have failed to live amicably together and there is a sufficient case for their separation, that separation should be a divorce. To condemn both parties to lifelong celibacy is cruel, and just as 'separated' people can come together again, so can divorced people re-marry if they wish."

"Yes, I think after three years of separation both must have fully made up their minds that they are unsuited to each other. If this was the case (i.e., if divorce were possible) it would do away with the disgraceful practice of men and women living together unmarried by law."

"(h) Should mutual consent be a ground for divorce?—82 women reply in the affirmative, of whom two are opposed to divorce; 12 reply in the negative, of whom five are opposed to divorce; 15 are doubtful, of whom two are opposed to divorce; 15 make no reply."

"Opinions.—When man and wife agree to part, I feel it would be much better for the morals of both to grant a divorce."

"This is the most reasonable ground for granting divorce."

"If both are agreeable, I think it is sin to compel them for the sake of appearing man and wife to live in the same house when they are divided in reality, though there are many that one knows do so for the sake of the children."

"If it is desired mutually after having tried to agree and failed, yes, seeing it is the only thing they would agree on."

"Many husbands and wives are unequally matched, and would be for many reasons better apart."

"If both are convinced they are unsuitable, why spoil two lives?"

"They should have a separation order first and if this is successful for three years to end in divorce."

"Yes, after time has proved the desire real, not merely a whim or pique."

"Where adequate reasons can be given."

"There would have to be careful investigation made by officers to see if there was real reasons for the parting."

"A man and woman take each other 'for better for worse, till death us do part,' and if there is no stronger reason than that they are tired of each other, I do not think a divorce should be granted."

"It would have a tendency to increase immorality in my opinion. The sacredness of the marriage tie is continually decreasing, and is becoming too lightly treated already. Young people should be given to thoroughly understand before taking this important step, that it is not for a year or two, but for a lifetime."

"(i) Should serious incompatibility be a cause for divorce?—Individual replies.—75 women reply in the affirmative of whom two are opposed to divorce; 10 reply in the negative, of whom two are opposed to divorce; seven are doubtful, of whom one is opposed to divorce; 32 make no reply."

"Cases.—42. The husband and wife though living in the same house have not occupied the same bedroom for a period of two years, and have not spoken to each other for the same period. I can vouch for the truth of this. The climax was reached a few weeks back by the husband leaving his wife and eloping with the music teacher of his children."

"43. I heard of one case recently. The husband and wife have no interests in common, little respect for each other, if any, would be better apart, but neither will commit such an act as is at present considered necessary."

"44. Knowing the case of a near relative, where there is no immorality, only incompatibility, divorce would be welcome."

"45. I have known a most unhappy home, years of misery through a violent-tempered woman who has taught her children to ridicule their father, who worked hard and fretted until released by death."

"46. I was told only a very short time ago by a friend of mine, that when she first got married, her husband and her got on very badly together, for they had both been petted and spoiled at home, and they both wanted the same treatment still from each other and neither one would give in, till she says life was unbearable for some time, and if she could have got away from it she would have done so. But after her baby came things mended, and now, close on 20 years after, they are quite a happy comfortable couple." (See Appendix, Cases 106–9.)

"Opinions.—There cannot be happiness, and without happiness a husband and wife are much better apart, if for nothing else than for the sake of the children. . . . I feel strongly that only when a husband and wife are living together as comrades is it a marriage in the sight of God, and when they are living together as husband and wife and there is no respect or affection, then in the sight of the Father it is immoral."

"I think the children of such parents are greatly handicapped in life, as there should be great kindness and courtesy shown between parents for the sake of their children."

"When constant friction was going on and had prevailed for any considerable period, it would give them release if desired by either. I believe if this was recognised as a cause for divorce, it would do much to prevent that continual nagging and fault-finding that goes on in some homes, making many lives a complete burden and often driving to drink and the other thing."

"It sometimes may happen that very intelligent and capable persons are ruined for life by having to live with either sex when they find they are not suited to each other."

"In the cases of incompatibility, unless very serious, there should be separation for one or two years before divorce. One feels that many married people are overdosed with each other, and separation would give time for reflection and prevent a hasty marriage which might have the same result."

"My personal opinion is that no two persons should be compelled to live together if they do not desire it. I can quite see the difficulties which would arise under our present system if every woman who felt she could not possibly live with her husband were to leave him, of course she would immediately be dependent on her own resources for her maintenance, and that of her children. I think the State should provide adequate means for their support."

"I do not think anybody would desire a divorce unless there was sufficient grounds for one. If it means incompatibility of temper and so on, I should allow it because of the children, which would, if there was any and brought up in an atmosphere of that kind, be most detrimental to their character, and would not tend to make them very peaceful subjects."

"Yes, this incompatibility is what generally leads to events that are generally regarded as the cause of divorce.

"If desired by both, I think it would be far better to grant divorce in cases like this. There can be no love where such a state of things exists, and I think a home where there is no love (and therefore no peace) has a most demoralising effect on every one in the home and round about."

"It is terrible to think of children brought up in a home where ill-treatment, brutalities, and no natural affection exist. What can we expect from the children brought up in such homes . . . children have no right to be born under such circumstances."

"Yes, the only ground."

"If you could see as I do, the misery of incompatibility and the evil effect on the life in the home, I am sure you would feel with me that even if it is the result of hasty ill-considered marriages, the evil ought not to be perpetuated, and that annulment is the best remedy."

"Specific causes would not meet the case of non-adultery and non-bodily cruelty, but nevertheless a life may be rendered almost unbearable by an abdominable, jealous, vindictive temper."

"Serious incompatibility should be considered good grounds for divorce, but careful judgment would be necessary."

"Yes, if care was taken to see that such incompatibility was proved."

"I think that where affection is not mutual, they are better apart, therefore incompatibility should be a cause for divorce, after careful investigation."

"Provided the incompatibility is so serious as to render living together practically impossible."

"If real reasons can be given."

"Yes, if it is serious. I have a married couple in mind, to one at any rate the life is torture, yet there is no remedy."

"No, as they have made their bed, so must they lie."

"No, I think it would have a tendency to make girls take marriage less seriously."

"I do not quite agree with this, as I think there should be a great deal of bear and forbear in married life. Sometimes young couples have some very rough edges to wear off when they are first married and after the corners are smoothed down, they live a very happy life together—(case follows here)."

"I am afraid men would be finding out all sorts of subjects to disagree on if they thought they could get rid of a wife so easily, for there would not be so much stigma of disgrace in this as in an adulterous case."

36,999. Then we come to the last head?—That is the end of the extended grounds. These were just other points.

"(4) Should divorce be allowed when both parties are guilty? Replies.—86 women reply in the affirmative, of whom four are opposed to divorce; 12 reply in the negative, of whom five are opposed to divorce, eight are doubtful; 24 make no reply."

"Opinions.—How can two live happily together, if each knows the other is guilty of offence?"

"They cannot have common respect, and should not be compelled to live together."

"Loss of respect must mean loss of affection."

"More reason than ever."

"It only degrades marriage for them to live together."

"If divorced these would sully others."

"Yes, most decidedly. If only for the benefit of the community, without considering the children which may come from such a union, it is most desirable for the welfare of the future race that home conditions should be kept as pure as possible."

"If both parties are guilty, that is a sufficient reason to allow divorce, for if they are unfit to live together, they are also unfit to bring children into the world in an atmosphere of immorality and degradation, making them totally unfit for the future before them or of ever becoming good citizens."

"For them to live together is making bad worse."

"If there are children it would have a most disastrous effect on their moral natures."

"Yes, as mentally defective children are often the results of such unions."

"If a divorce were granted to them, would they not most likely spoil another couple."

"(5) Should the guardianship of children be given to the parent most fit on general grounds?—Strong feeling is expressed that the presumption should be that the mother should have the guardianship of the children and that she should not be deprived of it unless it were proved that she was unfit on general grounds."

"An unmarried woman is not thought unfit to have the whole responsibility of an illegitimate child. 73 reply in the affirmative.—49 women reply in the affirmative, of whom three are opposed to divorce; 24 consider that the mother should be the guardian unless irretrievably bad. Three of these are opposed to divorce; seven reply in the negative, of whom two are opposed to divorce; two are doubtful; 29 make no reply."

"Cases.—47. A married couple took in a lodger while the husband was out of work. As long as he was unemployed he made no objection, but rather encouraged his wife to go about with the lodger. When he obtained employment, he turned against her, and got a divorce with the custody of the children. Soon afterwards he married again, and used to allow his first wife to see her children. She was a good mother, and being deprived of the children has led her to take to drink and she is going to the bad altogether."

"48. A woman was divorced by her husband, though her friends believe she was only injudicious, not guilty. She was very distressed at not being allowed to see her children."

"49. I know of one here, one of our highest, and she fell, and the father has the children, yet her heart aches for them. How can she help it, for nothing can destroy mother-love after what she goes through and what is there so strong to keep her from sinking lower, and I think sometimes others of us would have done the same if we had been tried like her." (See Appendix, Case 110.)

"Opinions.—I should like to see every effort made even where the mother is the guilty person for her to have the children. It is the exception when she is not the most suitable guardian and the so-called guilt generally is not an argument against suitability. It is very often a thing apart. A man's unfaithfulness is rarely considered a characteristic of parental irresponsibility."

"Who is more fitted to have care of children than a mother? If she be guilty, I feel quite sure she will protect them from the influence of sin as much as possible. I would in all cases grant the care of children to the mother."

"I would lean to the mother if she is not too depraved. I think a mother is more likely to do right to her children than a man, because a man may provide for them, but he cannot look after them."

"The mother is the best guardian for her children if she is at all suitable."

"Mother should always have access."

"I think that the mother should have charge of the children unless it is proved that she is unfit. No other woman can be so suitable, and no one has more right to them, besides if anything will help a mother to keep straight it is her children, and nothing would help to send a woman wrong quicker than to take away her child."

"I think the mother is the proper guardian of her children, few women are so sunk in sin as to lose all love for their children, and while admitting there are some women who neglect their children and are not fit to have charge of them, I think most mothers even if they are guilty would try to hide it from their children."

"One of the most serious and vital questions to be considered. In what manner would you define 'actual suitability'? A guilty mother, in this respect, is not always frivolous, but strong in parental affection. There may be many excuses for her seeking another man's affection, having a hard callous husband for one thing, who might be just as hard to his children, but because of his virtuousness, would he be the most suitable parent? Nothing wrecks home life quicker than absence of affection. I should like to hear discussion on this point."

"I think all possible investigation should be made as to the suitability of both parents. The one that is capable and suitable, whether guilty or not, should be granted the care of the children, the State to reserve the right of taking them in the event of the parent who was granted their custody turning out lax or unworthy."

"The most kind and suitable parent should have the care of the child."

"Much as I dislike separating the mother from the child, I do not like the idea of handing over the child to a guilty parent, as it often means deprivation of both parents, which to me is most sad."

"While I think that no one can do so well for children as a mother who has borne them, in no case should the care of children be given to the guilty parent, be it mother or father. If both parties are guilty, a suitable home and guardians should be found for the children, the father to maintain them, such maintenance to be paid into court."

"(6) Should the maintenance allowance and alimony under separation orders and divorce be collected by the court? Replies.—101 individuals reply in the affirmative; four reply in the negative; 19 make no reply."

"Cases.—50. A stick-maker with a good business, was only made to pay his wife 10*s.* a week, and to obtain this, he subjected her to every indignity possible."

"51. Husband lives an hour's journey from Manchester where the wife has sewing work. She has to go to the place where he lives once a week to obtain the maintenance allowance, and calls for it at a friend's house. The time is fixed, but the husband often makes her wait so late that she only just catches the last train back."

"52. I know of a case where the woman was separated after her husband bringing home another woman, and because the wife refused to wait on the intruder, he kicked her down the stairs, after which they separated. He, of course, had to make her an allowance which he himself would bring, the result he managed to cohabit with her, which brought her entirely under his control, and consequently he greatly reduced her allowance."

"53. The wife sends her boy to receive the allowance weekly, and the husband often makes him come up several times for it."

"54. I know a case here, the husband regularly paying the money each week, leaving it at the wife's door, and one of the children generally takes it. In this case the father is very fond of his children, who are all over 14 now, and often takes them out and helps them, but would not give his wife a penny more than he is obliged to."

"Opinions.—The difficulty of collecting often debars the wife from obtaining justice."

"The present law does not do justice to women."

"Much trouble caused by the wife having to send for it."

"Would cause payment to be made where now it often is not."

"Men pay when they like, women have to apply and often will not rather than stand the exposure"

"If the courts collect the money, they would see it was paid and be better able to trace the man than the poor woman who he has left in the lurch."

"Separate allowances should be collected by court, because often the man sees an opportunity of taking advantage of the woman, and then her case is lost, because she cannot get a second separation as easy as she can the first."

"Maintenance and allowance should be paid through the court. It is most humiliating for a woman to have to receive it from a man who she cannot live with."

"Maintenance allowances should not be paid by the husband direct to the wife, such visits being the means in many cases of adding insult to injury. A third person should forward the money to the wife, preferably an officer of the county court."

"I am strongly of opinion that maintenance allowances should be paid through some independent source."

"If in many cases the woman is to be assured of receiving her maintenance allowance, it is necessary collecting officers should be in charge."

"The maintenance allowance should be collected by special officers to ensure regular payment, to prove the verity of the 'out-of-work' excuse, to prevent insults on envelopes containing payment. These officers should have power to search for missing husbands."

"I certainly think special officers should superintend the collection of maintenance money, so that the parties have no cause to meet."

"I certainly think it would be to the advantage of the woman if maintenance and allowance were collected and paid by the courts. It would also save a lot of unpleasantness and stop the man from escaping payment, as he often does under the present system, by going away to other towns and assuming another name."

"I think the payment of maintenance should be paid according to the discretion of the parties concerned where it can be done by the parties themselves (see Case 54). In cases where it is necessary to keep the peace, the court should take the matter in hand."

"(7) Administration of the Law.—The opinion is nearly unanimous that divorce cases should be tried in local courts, as long as the trial is with closed doors. The great majority are in favour of county courts. Many express strong disapproval of the cases being tried in the police courts.

"The desire that no details should be published is also nearly unanimous.

"Another point that comes out in a striking way is the view that women should take some part in the administration of the law. One of the questions asked was whether women should serve on juries, and nearly all the replies are in favour. If special inquiry officers were appointed, it was considered essential that women as well as men should be officers. Opinion was divided on the question of officers acting as mediators. The idea was welcomed by some, but the views of others who opposed it were very convincing. It was felt that outsiders would probably be ignorant of the full circumstances, that mediation was ill-advised interference, and that attempts to re-unite couples were fraught with danger. The following quotations express the need for free legal advice and assistance:—

"'I have always thought that there ought to be a free lawyer in every town, say someone acting under the town clerk, where the poor people might go for legal advice, because the poor are terribly defrauded because of their ignorance of the law and because of their inability to pay for advice.' Another member wrote:—

"'A man or woman having to the best of their belief just grounds for divorce, but being unable to afford the cost, should be able to appear before either the magistrates or county court judge and apply for legal assistance. The court on being satisfied that the person is unable to meet the expense, but has reasonable grounds for making the application, should be able to grant all necessary assistance and charge the cost to national funds. The court should not need to be of opinion that divorce would be granted, but only that the application is not frivolous.' "

37,000. Are these cases about women serving on juries confined to cases in which women are concerned, or to general cases?—To general cases, although it was in reference to divorce cases the question was asked.

"(a) Where should divorce cases be tried?—Individual replies.—76 women are in favour of county courts; 10 women are in favour of special local courts; three women are in favour of assize courts; four women are in favour of local courts, but only specify that they shall not be police courts; three women are opposed to local courts; two women are opposed to local courts unless the cases are tried with closed doors; 27 make no reply."

"(b) Should women serve on juries?—(This question was asked of branches as well as of individuals.) Individual replies.—104 women replied in the affirmative; four replied on the negative: three are doubtful; 13 made no reply."

"Branch replies.—311 branches with 17,991 members reply in the affirmative; 84 branches with 3,390 members reply in the negative; 36 branches with 2,120 members are undecided or make no reply."

37,001. Do you gather from the communications you have received what the objection to police courts is?—I think they feel that the cases do not get sufficient attention. They are tried rapidly, and they dislike very much the exposure in the midst of other cases.

37,002. The reason I asked that question is because I notice one of the answers is, "It is only fair women should serve on juries when her own sex is being tried"?—They made those remarks, but there was nothing in the question to include that.

37,003. These cases and opinions do not include all the cases. On what principle have you taken one in preference to another?—The total number of cases was 131 that were sent in and in selecting those to be put into the proof rather than the appendix, I selected those that were most striking. The appendix has about 74 additional cases. In the proof there are about 54 that have been specially selected as those which were most striking and interesting. The following are replies:—

"55. I would like to say to you that I had the painful duty of being at the inquest on a girl—just went with the mother. The girl was in trouble and so drowned herself, and I was horrified at that inquest to see how lightly that case was taken up with regard to the girl, and no word of warning to the lad nor chastised in any way, and I say Yes from my heart from only that one inquest I see the need for women to be on juries or anything where women are concerned. The girl was not 16 years old, and the lad not 19."

"It is only fair women should serve on juries when her own sex is being tried."

"It is most essential where women and children are concerned."

"All the members agree it is most essential that women should serve on juries."

"All are in favour of women serving on juries and consider it essential, particularly on women's questions."

"Especially in cases of young girls being the only females in court."

"Members are most emphatic on this point."

"Yes, and in many affiliation cases."

"When women are tried women should be there."

"Only women can understand the woman's case and know how fatal to right motherhood undesirable conditions are."

"There was a doubt on should women serve on juries, because some members spoke on the hardship of men being compelled to sit at assizes and bear all their own expenses."

"Some thought women would be out of place on juries or pleading in court, but the majority were in favour of women serving on either if they were educated to do so."

"The time has arrived when women, as responsible persons, ought to have an equal share in dealing with matters so vital and important as the dividing and annulling of the marriage bond."

"It would be advisable to have women officers as well as men, for the reason that there are many cases where a woman would understand a woman's need and grasp the situation before a man who has not had a woman's feeling and nature to aid him, and also a woman would more readily speak to one of her own sex on delicate matters which often induce or cause separation or divorce."

"Whenever women or children are concerned, then women should have a voice in helping to put matters straight."

"I should like to see women on the bench to try them."

"In the case of a poor woman I would have women—broad-minded women of her own sphere of life—to judge her condition."

"Yes, in sexual questions the 'woman's side' is only properly understood by women."

"In equal proportions, in all cases where either adultery, cruelty, or other cases affecting both sexes, are being tried."

"Yes, women ought to judge as well as men, and especially where a woman is concerned."

Cases.—"56. Difficulty of enquiry.—Strangers—what do they know of the inner life, and come to that, what do friends and neighbours know? A woman told me the other day that she never told anyone about her husband's neglect and cruelty, because no one really believed her. He was so soft-spoken in front of other people, and they always said he only wanted a little managing. 'Good heavens!' she said, 'I wish they could have him to manage for one month. I have been married to him 18 years, and these last three nights I have slept on the floor rather than in the same bed.' Yet I don't think enquirers would learn any reason for a divorce, unless they took the woman's single word for it. Even her own children do not know."

"57. Danger of mediation.—A man and woman were found dead. At the inquest it appeared that they were not husband and wife, and that both were married and had children. They had gone away together, and had been persuaded to return by the relations of the woman. The following is a letter explaining the circumstances:—'I should dearly have liked to have spoken to you yesterday, when you were asking about incompatibility of temper. I send you a cutting about the death of my sister, one whom I dearly loved, and whose death I along with others am responsible for. As you will see, we brought her home. Had you held my sister's hand as I did, telling her, as I thought in love, that she must go home for the sake of her children, had you seen the look of misery on her face, felt the shudder through her body as she said to me, "Annie, you do not know the degradation you are asking me to go through. You do not know the life I have lived for the last few years. Ask me to throw myself in the water or face death in any way, I will willingly do it, and smile at you as I go, but do not tell me to go back to that man (her husband)." However, we persuaded her to go home. She was only there a day. The next thing she was found dead with the most beautiful smile on her face. She could face the great unknown, but not the life she saw in front of her. This is one instance. How many not only lives, but souls are we murdering every day under this system. . . . I should like to add that previous to them going away my sister had visited the wife of the man she went away with, and found they had lived so unhappy that they did not intend to live together again." (See Appendix, Cases 111 and 112.)

"Opinions.—Against mediation.—Advice and mediation between husband and wife would be dangerous."

"Preliminary inquiries or mediation between husband and wife, while it might do good in some cases, in the majority of cases might make the breach wider. . . . I do not think one average English man or woman would have it (I would not)."

"My experience is, that whatever trouble there may be between man and wife, it is never overcome by the interference of strangers."

"I do not quite know what to say about this question. It is rather a delicate matter for any one to advise or interfere between husband and wife. In some cases advice might do good, but in the majority of cases I do not think it would."

"Why mediate if there is guilt between the parties and the non-guilty one wants to be free? I think there is too much glossing it over and persuasion to overlook as it is, and the future generation suffer for it. It is a pity adultery is not a penal offence, as stealing is. It is quite as strongly spoken of in the Commandments, and continence never yet killed a man or woman. I am afraid if I was the injured party it would need to be an archangel who came to mediate between my husband and myself if I felt it so strongly that I applied for a divorce."

"Some kind of preliminary inquiry might take place, but there would be great resentment felt at too much interference on the part of appointed individuals, and no mediation would be likely to induce either a wronged husband or wife to overlook and condone immorality or adultery on the part of the other."

"In favour of mediation.—Sometimes it is really caused by interference from outside, and a word of sound advice from men and women might have a good effect."

"I think every possible means should be taken to prevent divorce proceedings, and sometimes, it may be, timely help and advice would establish a better state of affairs."

"Marriage as an institution is such a sacred and solemn thing that the greatest care should be exercised that no frivolous excuse should separate husband and wife, and every application should be thoroughly investigated by competent officers. . . . It would be advisable to try and mediate between husband and wife in a tactful way."

"I am of opinion that if a suitable officer could have a confidential chat with a man and his wife, many separations would be avoided."

"I do not think it advisable. Married people can generally manage their own affairs. Outsiders only see one side and generally muddle things up and make it worse."

"Yes, a third person is sometimes able to shed a ray of hope and reason in cases of difficulty."

"To mediate between husband and wife, I am sure special officers would be most helpful, and in cases where it is not desirable that they live together, these officers might be the means of preventing crime." (Here follows Case 112 in Appendix.)

"Publicity.—The proceedings should be kept out of the press, as it only ministers to a morbid public taste. It concerns only the family, and when others are present must make it doubly painful and degrading."

"The details of divorce cases should be kept out of the papers, and only an official report, to be supplied by an official of the court, be circulated to the press. It is the thought of the publicity which would prevent many sensitive people, both men and women, from seeking divorce."

"As to hearing cases with closed doors, the plan is certainly a better one than publishing all the details, as some of our papers do. Still, there is a probability of deceit where everything is in camera."

"I quite feel the degradation a family feels when private life is made so public, and would agree that the press be forbidden to make known what takes place in court, but the closed doors I do not feel quite comfortable about. Of course, one shrinks from publicity, but I feel if admittance, even by ticket, were allowed it would have a good effect on the jury. It is a very serious responsibility for them."

"The press and public should not be admitted. The disclosure of family is not only harmful, but hurtful to innocent relatives."

37,004. Then we come to suggested machinery?—Yes. So far the evidence has been that of the guild members. What follows are my own views.

"(a) Suggested Machinery.—The need expressed above for free legal advice and assistance, and for women to share in the administration of the law, might perhaps be met by the institution of municipal legal departments, in which one or more of the officials should be women. I had in my mind something that might be a combination of the poor man's lawyer and the Scottish poor agents, only State-paid. Applications for divorce free of cost would be made to such departments, which would make the necessary enquiries, and the decision as to inability to pay would rest with the County Court, and the State would either bear the cost, where necessary, or undertake to recover it from either party. Seeing that in County Courts there would be no juries, on which women could sit, one or more women assessors might be appointed to act with the County Court judge."

37,005. Why do you say "no juries"? Are you under the impression that they do not come into the County Court?—I thought that was so.

37,006. That is not so?—"Divorce cases being so closely connected with family affairs, what may be called the technical experience of women, in the women's and children's side of family life, is essential.

"(b) A Point of View.—In claiming that women should take part in administering the divorce law, I should like to point out that they have a distinctive standpoint which it is urgent should be understood and recognised. At the time of the passing of the Divorce Act, in 1857, there was practically no way by which women could make their opinions known. Women were unorganised, without channels of expression, and they neither spoke in public nor made use of the public press. Women were admired for their silence and submission, and their views were generally assumed to be what men wished them to be. Speaking in the House of Commons in 1867, Mr. Beresford Hope said: 'Women had never petitioned against the Divorce Bill, although it was well known that the women of England were righteously opposed to the passing of that measure. He honoured the women for not having done so, because that innate modesty which was the great attribute of the sex prevented them putting themselves forward on such occasions.' During a sitting of the Grand Committee on the Factory Bill of 1895, Mr. Asquith, then Home Secretary, referred to the wishes of working women. Whereupon the former Home Secretary, Mr. Matthews, exclaimed: 'I have my own opinion as to what are the wishes of working women, and to that opinion I shall always adhere.' Another instance of the difficulty found in believing that women may have views of their own occurred recently in Finland. On the introduction of certain bills into Parliament, the men of all parties declared that it was only the women's rights' party which urged the revision of the marriage laws. When this became known, women's petitions poured in from all sources, in support of the action of the women M.P.'s. It is of special importance that on Divorce women's opinions should be heard and should be given equal weight with those of men. Women's position in married life must, in general, be more disadvantageous than men's. Even if unjust laws and public opinion were changed, the greater physical weakness, the conditions of maternity, the difficulty of monetary independence, would still put power in the hands of men, and give opportunities for its abuse. We are often told that women's natural disabilities make it necessary that the marriage tie should be made indissoluble, for the sake of the women themselves and their children. It is true that these disabilities produce an extremely difficult complication. In considering the question of divorce the necessity for some solution of the economic problem of the support of married women and for equalising the rights of parents to their children become painfully obvious. While the present state of things lasts, we are tempting women to sacrifice their personal dignity and honour. When a woman continues to be the wife of an immoral and cruel man, we are almost forcing her, on account of the difficulty of supporting herself and her children, into what is little better than prostitution. The economic question will have to be dealt with, but our attitude towards divorce should not depend upon it. Meanwhile public opinion ought at least to reverence the woman who faces poverty and work outside her home rather than degrade her womanhood. And if the institution of legal separation is admitted to be necessary, as I believe it is, there is no valid reason why a woman (or a man) should not re-marry. Indeed, it would often be in the interests of herself, the family, and the State that she should do so. To speak of degradation and suffering under the term of 'hardship,' and to advocate and admire a compulsory 'patient endurance' of them is placing strange values on moral conduct. It is the power of choice, which is the essence of renunciation, and alone gives it its value. If divorce is considered a sin, and the patient endurance of degradation and compulsory suffering a virtue, a most serious moral confusion is created. It means that women's self-respect and happiness are sacrificed, and adultery on the part of men condoned. What other conclusions can be drawn, for instance, from the words used by the Archdeacon of Chichester in a Visitation last May?—'It seems to me impossible to place woman on the same level as man in the matters which are before us now. It seems to me obvious that the State must suffer more by the immorality of the wife than by that of the husband. If that is so, the State is bound to put out greater influence to deter the woman from immorality than it exercises in the case of the man, and the unequal treatment of the man and woman in this matter rests upon a more noble basis than national expediency. Nature, i.e., God, has Himself laid on women a heavier penalty for one particular sin than upon a man, as a deterrent from immodesty and from the beginnings of evil. And that being so, I regard as futile and insincere all attempts to treat men and women as equal in matters concerning their union.' The following extract from a guild member's letter is certainly full of warning:—'I heard a discussion between two girls in our workroom. The girl that had attended chapel was in favour of divorce, and thought poor people ought to be able to procure it so that their children could have a legal right to their parents' name, but the church girl was most vehement in her protest against divorce—once married, always married. This girl said that she would rather live with a man unmarried than marry a divorced person. I know two of her friends are living with married men, and others of her friends have been friendly with married men, and her married friends flirt with men. And yet they pretend to have such a standard of morality that because you have been married in a church, it is wrong to be divorced. It is most illogical, but you find it among a lot of people.' Another guild member wrote, 'She thought she ought to go on living with him as her religion taught her that divorce was wrong. I may say that my religious feeling would lead me in such a case to seek relief for the value of my children who could not fail to become contaminated by the contact with such a father.' In addition to the desire to protect the rights of womanhood, a woman naturally feels strongly as regard the rights of children, and there is a general feeling among us that children should only be born of a happy marriage. We think also that a house divided against itself is not one in which children should be brought up. But while women, as well as believers in eugenics, are concerned for the future of the race, I feel that it is very necessary to protest against the tendency to sacrifice the individual woman's development in the supposed interests of the race. What would be disastrous to individuals defeats the object of eugenics, the object of which is to produce a fine race of men and women. If women are to have a decent and tolerable life, one in which their mental and moral powers have free play, it is indispensable that marriage should be more than a physical relation and that more than legal and ecclesiastical ties should be needed to make it sacred. What we want is a real, not a nominal sanctity. We cannot consider an outward and visible tie as sacredly binding when the inward and spiritual grace is lacking. And it ought to be recognised that marriage is made for man and not man for marriage. A spiritual view of marriage entails an equal moral standard for men and women, and the full freedom and responsibility of women, for the best combined life of two individuals is only possible when each is free and responsible. It follows from this view that the serious desire of either husband or wife will be sufficient ground on which the State may sanction divorce, under suitable conditions as to time and provision for children; and that the public unveiling of private misery will be unnecessary. By making incompatibility a ground for divorce, as in Norway, all charges necessitating proof would be done away with and the great advantage would be gained of doing away also with all the objectionable methods of obtaining the evidence. In addition it removes the serious inequality from which women would actually suffer even if the law were nominally equal, owing to its being so much more difficult to prove a husband's infidelity than a wife's. I feel that is a very strong point. However equal the laws are made the difficulty of proof on behalf of the woman would be greater than on behalf of the man."

37,007. Do you advocate divorce for incompatibility of temper?—Yes, for serious incompatibility. "It also follows that, though divorce will be regarded as a grave misfortune, there will not be the stigma attached to the mere act of divorce which is attached to it now. The notion of 'guilt' will have to be revised. Conduct will be judged by a person's character and motives, and no such unreal division into 'sheep and goats' will take place as is implied in such a hard-and-fast phrase as the 're-marriage of the guilty party.' I think it may safely be said that reform in the divorce laws would not affect those who are happily married, or those who are getting on fairly well together; that in other cases, the relationship is likely to be improved, while an intolerable burden—such as we have no right to forcibly lay on any human being—will be lifted from a minority. No doubt there would be some who would take advantage of divorce in a selfish and base way. But the lives of such are not now marked by good behaviour. Speaking generally, we may surely believe without undue hopefulness that there are more forces at work to unite than to part married couples—that mere inertia, habit, the common interests and convenience of home-life, the love of children, the prevailing desire and effort to make the best of things, and sense of doing right towards another even at the expense of personal happiness, are stronger and commoner factors in life than disruptive selfishness, otherwise society would not hold together and advance as it does."

37,008. You have been good enough to hand in an appendix of cases. Do these cases deal with different points in addition to the cases which have been mentioned by you already?—They amplify them.

37,009. I do not think it is any use reading them through now. Would you like to have them printed and added to your evidence?—It would be advisable, because the accumulated evidence is so effective.

37,010. Do you advocate the sitting of women on juries except in cases where women are concerned?—Yes, personally I should.

37,011. Generally?—Yes.

37,012. Do you belong to any branch of the Church?—No.

"58. Appendix of Cases.—A man was systematically cruel to his wife, without striking a blow, and never contributed to the support of his wife and two children, who were supported by the wife's mother, in whose house they lived. When trying for a divorce, the wife was told that the fact her husband did not support her would have no weight with the judge, because the husband knew she would not be destitute, but would be supported by her mother. She was able to prove that he had children by more than one woman, her own sister being one, and that he came home drunk and insulted her, but this did not constitute legal cruelty. The midwife was finally able to prove legal cruelty, committed on the first day the wife got up from her confinement."

"59. A respectable, hard-working, refined woman was married to an auctioneer well able to support a family. Shortly after marriage he began a course of dissipation and vicious living, with all that it means—no comfort, no peace, no money. Wife broken in health with hard work and trouble, shrinking with all the sensitiveness of a refined mind from the publicity of the court, and unable, by lack of means and inability to prove cruelty, to obtain a divorce."

"60. Woman attended by midwife in four confinements. Midwife noticed from the first that things were not right, as her temperature varied from evident worry. After the fourth confinement, it was found out that the cause was the husband's unfaithfulness. He had been courting a young girl, pretending he was not married. When the wife was in bed after her fourth confinement the girl called, bringing two young children, and claiming the husband as their father. He had also been latterly in the habit of staying away from home for one or two nights a week, and was heard of in connection with a raid on a disorderly house. His wife had concealed her suspicions for the sake of the children, and as the man had never remained away from home for any long time or committed any bodily assault on her, she thought she ought to go on living with him, as her religion taught her that divorce was wrong. I may say that my religious feelings would lead me in such a case to seek relief for the value of my children, who could not fail to become contaminated by contact with such a father."

"61. A case where a husband had taken another woman home and was keeping both women."

"62. Husband is spending his time and practically living with a young girl. Wife is broken-hearted. No cruelty."

"63. Man drinks. Brought home a young woman to the house to lodge. Wife had good faith in him doing so, although her sisters thought different. Cruelty developed. He spent his money in drink (four little children), went about with this young woman. The wife at last got a separation order, with custody of children and an allowance of 10*s.* per week. He never paid it. The result is they are again trying to live together, simply forced to, as she could not maintain herself and children. The surroundings of a home like this are terrible to bring children up in, and morally bad for our future citizens."

"64. I know a young and pretty girl, who has been employed in this city. Last year she disappeared and nothing was heard of her for four months, when it was found she had had twin children, and, to the surprise of her family, who had no knowledge whatever or any reason to suppose anything was wrong, it was found that the father of them was her employer. This man has a wife and eight children, the last one being born within a very few days of my friend's twins. The wife is solely dependent on the husband for her maintenance; therefore, should she desire a divorce, has no money whatever. I don't know whether she does desire one or no; perhaps she thinks she is sacrificing herself for the sake of her children, which I consider wrong, and utterly demoralising to herself and children, as they are bound to know. One of the sons is employed in his father's shop."

"65. I myself know of a case where the wife is made miserably unhappy through the unfaithfulness of her husband. Other women seem to draw the man like a magnet from his own home. The wife is a most hard-working soul and tries her hardest to make her home cheerful and is a devoted mother to her children, and has, so far, kept her children from knowing anything of their father's sins. At times the woman feels almost beside herself with grief. I am sure the woman would feel quite a different being, as the fearful strain is sadly telling on her health."

"66. I have personal knowledge of a case where a woman, under 30 years of age and the mother of three children, is married to a man who for two years has been carrying on an intrigue with another woman, The wife has abundant proofs of adultery in the pregnancy of the woman he has been meeting, but, because he has not beaten her, she would be unable to obtain a divorce. I believe, if she could obtain one, her parents would be willing to keep her and the children."

"67. Poverty.—I know a case where the woman would have had a divorce years ago if she had the money. Married at 17, a baby born soon after, her husband left her in less than two years with a dreadful disease that he brought home with him from bad women. She has struggled on and brought up her little girl so nice, and now at 37 her brain has given way and she wanders about to find her husband who left her so long ago. She knew he was living with another woman and the father of her children, but she has never seen him since he left her. If she could have had a divorce, she might now have been well and happy, instead of a burden to her dear old parents."

"68. A woman married a professional man and had two children. Then she found he was taking about another woman, and he acknowledged it when accused. It was impossible for them to get on together after that, and one day the husband sold all the household goods, including the cradle, took the money and went to Australia. She went to work to bring up the children. After they were married, her sister died, leaving a husband with one child, and she went through a form of marriage with him."

"69. The parties had been married about eight or nine years and they had three children, and the young wife was pregnant of the fourth when he left her without any means of earning a livelihood and without any cause whatsoever, and she was compelled to go and live with her mother, a widow; and she, the forsaken wife, has buried two of her children since her husband left her, and her husband has never contributed to her or her three children's maintenance since he left her over four years ago. He has been living with another woman (as his wife) first at A., then at C., and now he has gone to F., and is still living with a woman (as his wife). Miss—— went over to M., at Easter and saw him there with her (as his wife on a visit). Oh, the sorrow and misery that man has brought to a quiet respectable young woman and to her widowed mother as well! And she would be divorced from him if she had only the means to do it, so as to put an end to his terrible sin of adultery . . . If this true case will help to put a stop to adultery, or to be able to get a divorce from such a man!"

"70. Husband deserted wife nine years ago, leaving her with two children, one a confirmed invalid. On application to the Poor Law Guardians, she received 1*s.* 6*d.* for the elder child, nothing for the invalid. Inquiries were set on foot, but they could not trace the husband. It is now known that he went away and is living with a girl who visited at the house, and who has two or three children now. The man was in a respectable position, much thought of by the vicar of the parish. He did not ill-use his wife, but rarely gave her any money for housekeeping or clothes for the children or herself. But for her mother and an aunt, the wife and children would have starved."

"After the death of her mother, the wife went to live with another man, and has lived with him since, 18 months. Report says they are married."

"71. Woman had been ill-treated by her husband almost from the time of the marriage, sometimes brutally, and he has been unfaithful to her for many years. Not only has she seen him with other women, but the children too have seen him. 'A deed of separation was drawn up and he agreed to pay 10*s.* a week, but left the town with a woman and did not pay it. The wife spent her hard-earned savings, nearly 20*l.*, trying to find him. She found him living with a woman under an assumed name and applied for a summons, but he did not appear and left the town again. I certainly do think in a case like this, divorce ought to be made easier, as a woman in her circumstances has no chance whatever of getting the marriage tie dissolved. She will not always be able to work so hard to keep herself and home comfortable, and it is not right that a woman like her—she is a most attractive woman—should not be able to marry again."

"72. A. married B. some thirty years ago. He never kept her. She always worked between her periods of childbearing and endured not only ill-treatment—viz., thrashings—but unfaithfulness. Six children were born, and for some time she was afraid the youngest would be an imbecile owing to his treatment of her before the birth of it. When the eldest got about 15, she decided to leave him. She took a house, and by dint of hard work, they managed to live; but wherever they live; he follows them and makes endless trouble."

"73. Husband was engaged as groom and gardener, wife as laundry maid near B——. He even brought loose women into her bedroom. At last she left him with her child and came home to her mother's. Soon after the mistress wrote her that she had been obliged to discharge the cook owing to her condition, also the man. I have seen letters from the mistress offering to give evidence, if needed, if she applied for a divorce, but she had not the means, and he had disappeared from the neighbourhood. She eventually engaged as housekeeper to a widower with a family—and married him, it is said. They evidently are living as man and wife."

"74. The case I should like to mention of a woman with four children who lives not far from here. Her husband left her five years ago, for no apparent reason that she knows of, but she heard soon after that he had gone to America with another woman. Anyhow she has neither seen nor heard of him since he went away. She had to go out and work. They had nothing to depend on, only what she earned. The work was very hard, she had not been used to it, and after a few months she broke down, was ill in bed for weeks and dependent on the neighbours for support. One child developed consumption, and she applied to the guardians to grant her a small sum per week till her children got a little older. She went for her children's sake, but the questions they asked her were revolting and insulting, finally they told her they could not do anything till she sold part of her home. The proceeds of her furniture, they said, would keep them a few months longer. There was one alternative, she could go in the workhouse if she liked, but this she refused to do. All this happened three years ago, and the woman is still struggling for a bare existence. A merciful God took the consumptive lad away from her a few months ago, but she has still three more to bring up, wearied and worn out before her time, knowing herself to be tied to a callous brute who has ceased to regard the marriage tie as binding."

"75. Husband persuaded his wife to take a holiday, and in her absence decamped with another woman with whom he had been connected for three years. He cannot be traced. Divorce is impossible on account of expense."

"76. Husband left wife when she was still in bed after birth of first baby. He returned some time later, and then deserted her again. Through ill-health, she is unable to work, and is living with another man, who is quite willing to marry, but she has no money to get a divorce."

"77. A wife left her husband, went off with a lodger. Had had a child to a policeman prior to her marriage. Was last heard of in the neighbourhood of Leeds. Five years after, the man married again and has a family. Has often said he wished he had the means of getting a divorce. Always, and is still a steady industrious man." (See also Appendix, cases 67, 71).

"78. Husband lives with another woman and has children by her. Wife goes out nursing, or any other respectable work she can get."

"79. Wife with one child and kind husband elopes with a single man, who soon deserts her. She annoys husband continually, and he is in a dilemma how to act, but determined to have nothing to do with the woman again."

"80. Two of the Guild members would get divorce if they could afford it. One is separated and it is not satisfactory. The other has a large family, and for their sakes goes plodding on, trying to keep home together."

"Five homes in the little village of —— made unhappy by unfaithfulness of husbands."

"81. I have a cousin whose wife left him and went to live with another man nearly fifteen years ago, and he . . . would have obtained a divorce if he could have afforded it. So she has been living in adultery all these years, and he has not been able to marry again even had he wished to."

"82. The woman has already had a separation order. This she obtained 10 years ago and the grounds on which it was obtained are:—Persistent cruelty and neglect. He was ordered to pay 10*s.* a week, but since that time has not contributed anything towards her or the children's support. He left her with three, the youngest being seven years old at the time. Since that time the man has been living with another woman who has had two children of which he is the father. I think this is a deserving case for a woman to obtain a divorce, but the heavy expense of obtaining this is too much for her, and so makes it impossible to improve her position in life."

"83. Mrs. D. has been separated from her husband for many years. She had one child by him, a girl, whose support he did not contribute to. He was openly living with another woman in an adjoining village, and had got several children by her. Mrs. D. was not in a position to obtain a divorce owing to lack of money, until her daughter was grown up. At that time a brother who had got on fairly well in business advanced the money and a divorce was obtained."

"84. Twenty-five years ago that party that I am writing about was a respectable young woman. She married a man of good appearance, also he had a good trade. To look at him you would have thought he would have made the best of husbands. After their first baby was born, he began to take drink, he abused her and also kept his wages. Things went on like this till their fourth baby was born and he sold up the home and left her. She went to the workhouse and her baby died. He got a month in prison for neglect, since then he has done three years' penal servitude for stealing, also time for sleeping out and many times he has been up for being drunk. He has gone about with all sorts of women. She has brought her three boys up, the oldest is now 24, next 22 and 20. She has been in her present situation 18 years. So you will see what a lot of hardships she has had, for her married life has been very hard and still she has to be insulted with him every time he thinks fit. So that is one case where cheap divorce ought to come in, as this woman has had one or two good offers of marriage. But she has to stop as she is. Her children are a credit to her, but she cannot see her way to depend on them, so she still works."

"85. A girl of 17 married a widower of 25 with one child. She had lost her parents when quite young, and had had to work very hard. The sympathy for the child drew her into marriage. The husband allowed his mother control of his home, wife and earnings, the girl was merely a convenience to him and soon began having children. She had four children at 21 years of age. Her whole married life has been one of suffering and cruelty. She had been locked out at night and had to sleep in the outhouses, has been beaten, kept without food. Had grown to hate her husband, but the love of her children and the dread of publicity made her shut herself up and suffer quietly. She goes out to daily nursing occasionally. It keeps her in clothes. She has been fond of reading and comforted herself in books as she could get hold of them."

"86. The wife was a bad woman; the husband turned her out, and she applied for maintenance, he pays her now 6*s.* a week. He keeps company with another woman who often comes to his house, whose relations, highly respectable people, are much distressed. He has no means to get a divorce."

"87. I filed a petition, grounds adultery and cruelty. Before entering the case, I found 50*l.* as a guarantee. There was no difficulty in proving the case, for the solicitor had already conducted a plea of affiliation against the respondent for a child acknowledged his. He proved the adultery. The cruelty sworn to by my brother. The only extra expense was the serving of an affidavit to the respondent in America, where he had gone. This was done by communication with another solicitor in the town where he was.

"The petition was heard in the London Courts. There was no reply to the plea. Ten or fifteen minutes finished the case, decree nisi.

"When my bill of charges came in, they amounted to 105*l.*, which fell entirely on me. The respondent, who ought to have paid all costs, kept away, and when written to, said he had nothing to pay with. These costs almost ruined me. I had a small business which I had worked entirely myself. I was so crippled for money for two years afterwards that I often went without the necessaries of life. Added to this, my late husband returned, and twice I had to go to the expense of taking him to the police court for threatening my life. My experience was such as no honest working woman ought to have, and had I not had a strong will power, good health, and firm trust in the Divine help, I must have given up in despair."

"88. A young woman who was servant in a good family married a sailor. They had kept company and corresponded a couple of years and she had every reason to believe he was a decent man. They were to be married and she left her place to prepare. When he came off his ship he appeared distressed, his mother had died and he made out that his money had been used by his family on his mother's account. The girl had saved money, and believing in him, used her money to pay all costs. It was arranged she was to live with her mother while he was away and they would set up a home later. He left his ship and said he was promised a better berth . . . he stayed at her mother's with her till her money was done, then said he would seek another ship . . . he went away and she did not hear anything more of him; she inquired of his family and found he had never saved any money and did not know anything about him. In due course she had a child, and was partly helped by her relations. She had to apply for relief and the police found him. (He was summoned for maintenance, imprisoned, and afterwards disappeared. Twice afterwards he was heard of as having married and deserted women.) He is now in prison for bigamy. His first wife is still in service, but cannot get enough money to get a divorce, but if the costs could be paid by the State, what a blessing it would be in this case."

"89. The man was to pay 10*s.* a week to his wife, but he has never paid a penny. He has gone away, and she will have to go into the workhouse to have her third child born. She is a fine girl, only 24. Her life is ruined. She is too poor to get a divorce, and yet she cannot marry a good man if she wanted to."

"90. A widower with three children writes: I got married to a young woman . . . She was very quiet and clean and we lived happily up to the time she left, which was three months later. She went to her mother to do some small jobs. I then heard she had been admitted to the Union Infirmary as a person of unsound mind and from there to the asylum. When better, her parents took her home. I have now heard she was away before I married her, which I was kept in ignorance of. I got legal advice, which was, I could get the marriage declared null and void on the ground of deception, but would cost me 15*l.* and that 'in formâ pauperis.'"

"91. Insanity.—Wife has been insane for 20 years. It is very rough on the husband."

"92. Wife became insane after birth of first child, and has been in the county asylum five years; the doctor holds out no hope of recovery. The husband is a labourer."

"93. My friend's husband was sent to the asylum 25 years ago. She was left with six children. The parish refused to help her unless she sold her home. She refused to do so, and has brought her children up by her own hard work. There is no hope at all for him, so I think a divorce would have been a very good thing for my friend."

"94. The husband lost a great amount of money, and when the wife found out she became insane, but her children loved her better than most children do, and it would have been heart-breaking if the father had thought of such a thing as divorce."

"95. A friend of ours married some seven or eight years ago, and about 18 months after marriage a child was born. The wife was delirious, overlaid the child, and when told of what she had done, went hopelessly insane. This is some six years ago, and she is in the asylum. A woman to whom the husband was deeply attached before marriage is still single, and he, as you will see, is in a worse predicament."

"96. I know of three cases where the women are in an asylum and all have daughters who look after the home and husband, and in one case two younger children. The husbands visit the wives occasionally."

"97. Desertion.—A man left his wife and four children; went off, it was said, to Australia. The woman worked hard to bring up her children respectably. A little over four years after he disappeared, he turned up with a broker when no one was in the house (woman out charing), sold up everything, and has not been heard of since so far as I know. Woman arrived when the broker was busy removing the goods, but unfortunately she had never changed the name on the rent book. She struggled on (heart-broken) for nearly two years, and then died, leaving her four children to the care of a sister-in-law."

"98. I know of three or four cases where if desertion alone could be made a case for divorce, it would have been a good thing for both parties, while it would, so far as is known, have been difficult to prove adultery, though it in all probability existed in each case. The woman was left with two children, another with one, a third, a man, with none, and a fourth, a woman, with four children under seven years of age."

"99. Husband deserted his wife and gone to Australia with their united savings, including her earnings after marriage."

"100. Husband deserted wife and little boy 14 years ago. Last year the wife went to live with another man."

"101. A father went away to a foreign country and left the mother to battle with the home and the children for 20 years. He came back and got admittance to the home without their knowledge, and the law such that they were not bound to feed him, but they could not turn him out, and he made their lives unbearable till the mother had to give way and they were soon reduced to poverty."

"102. A cousin of mine got married to a young man after keeping company about two years. They took a house, got it furnished, and seemed very comfortable indeed. Both went to work, but the time was coming when the wife would have to give it up and stay at home. . . . About a month before their baby was born, the young man did a very mean thing. While his wife was away, he went to the man who had furnished the house and told him to fetch the goods back. . . . When the wife returned at night, she found an empty house and the man had gone, she knew not where nor for what reason. They had had no cross words or anything. What could she do only go to her parents? Months passed by, she neither saw nor heard of her husband, and all the expense of confinement fell on to her parents, and from then to now she has never set eyes on him, and her baby is now a fine girl of seven years. If he had a reason for leaving her at all, it was because he was too lazy to work to keep her when she was not able to go out and earn her own living. 'If divorce had been possible, they would have gone through with it.'"

"103. Drunkenness.—A young woman, now 25 years old, has been married three years. Eighteen months ago her husband began drinking, he neglected his work, stayed off days together. (He lost his place.) Things belonging to the house had to be sold to keep them. Sometimes he would get the money for the article sold, and although he knew his wife was waiting and there was no food in the house, he would stay drinking until he was turned out. (He got another place, but lost it again the week his wife was confined.) He drew 3*l.* wages that week, and sent 10*s.* home by a man who lived next door. For a fortnight he never came home unless he was drunk. (Twice after that he got work at different places, the second time in Scotland. She joined him there), and the first week he brought money home. The second week he was stopped for losing time and on the Saturday when he ought to have brought his money home he did not do so, and his wife and children were turned out into the streets in the pouring rain by the landlady, and had to pawn some clothing to pay their fare back to London (her father's home). In addition to this treatment, she has every reason to believe he has contracted a disease. Yet she still struggles on to keep out of the way of the law because it is so stigmatising and public. She is a clean and most loveable little woman. Her husband, before he began to drink, was a very smart intelligent fellow. . . She says his treatment has killed all the affection she has had for him, and bothers very much at the example he sets the children. She said, 'If only I could get a divorce, but you see I cannot, I am tied for life, oh God, for life.' She broke down then and cried, the only time I ever saw her give way, for she is a brave little soul."

"104. An orphan girl whose education had been somewhat neglected married a man holding a good position in an office. Things went smoothly for a time, except that her housekeeping allowance was so small that she had to go very short of food herself to enable her to provide hot dinners for her husband in the evening. She soon discovered that his spare time is spent at the bar of public-houses, spending his money and making love to the barmaids. After a time a child is born to them. Can that child be healthy? the father addicted to drinking and the mother half starved. Years pass, the man loses his situation, grows careless and fails to obtain employment, wife in despair does a little needlework to keep them from actual starvation. The girl growing up into womanhood develops consumption. . . . Still the mother fights the battle of life, sometimes the girl is able to do a little work, at others she is at a Sanatorium, till the doctors say there is no hope for her.

"I do know that if a divorce could have been obtained in this case, it would have been a blessing to the poor worn out mother and her sickly daughter."

"105. A woman has a drunken husband; he leads her such a life she has to leave him. Some time after he leaves the town, and she never heard of him again—now a period of 12 years! She has not had any support from him since she left him. She is now only 35? She had no family."

"106. Incompatibility.—A man is an epileptic, and both husband and wife have found they have made a mistake because of their temperaments. The wife irritates the man with the result that he generally has a fit, then the wife is miserable, and I don't know how it can be otherwise, and there are children which neither of them seem to want in reality."

"107. Young couple married, fit up a nice home, both very respectable, but she proved to be not fit for a wife. They parted. The result is he did not wish to expose the girl, and after suffering in his own mind, and not having means to get a divorce, at the present time he is an inmate of an asylum. She is at home again."

"108. I know a case at present where the husband and wife had been parted for six years and now are living happily together again, both are older now and realise they must give and take to be happy in married life."

"109. Husband and wife live happily, had a very large family. In late years a strangeness came to the husband, refused to earn any money for keep, &c. They have been separated (not legally) for years. She having seen every child out into the world, now he is wishing to live again with her and I hear she has consented."

"110. Guardianship.—The woman was a very bad one, she used to have men going to the house all day and the children there. Her husband had to buy everything for the house, even the loaves of bread he had to cut up into pieces, because she would sell if the loaves were left whole for drink. Well, her husband had a separation order from her, and he was to have the custody of the children, but when it came to parting, he left the youngest child with her. Now I think it was very wrong of that man, because he knew she was not fit to have the custody of the child, and it was against the orders of the Court. It always seemed to me as though he did not care what became of the child."

"111. Mediation.—The husband and wife had been parted 18 months and the husband wanted his wife back, and to get her back, promised her certain conditions if she would only come. At last she promised to come, and I assisted him to get a home ready for her. Yet if I had known before the wife's views towards him, also the full text of the conditions, I should have exerted all my energies to keep them apart. Every night I fear what the morning may reveal, and am extremely anxious at all times."

"112. I have been told of a case where a man left his wife and two children in connection with his business, being away about a year. The woman fell, and a child was born just at the time of the husband's return. The news was conveyed to him at the railway station, when he refused to return home, and at once instituted proceedings. Divorce was granted, and he again went away. On his return, he sought the woman and offered her marriage, saying he was sorry he had acted hastily, as he, himself, was not free from guilt. They married again, and were, I heard, living comfortably. It seems as if mediation in this case might have prevented all the exposure and waste of money."

"113. Personal Stories.—I first met my husband in Leeds. He was then just started on his own, his landlady and he giving me to understand that he was doing well. Twelve months later we were married, he saying he was doing well, well able to keep me, &c. I found the home, such as it was, was got on the hire system He had no money, and the very first loaf of bread I purchased, I had to borrow the money for. I had spent all my savings, 30*l.*, in bed linen, &c. . . He was doing a mere nothing with work. A pound a month had to go for furniture, and the first month's rent he pawned his watch for. I found he was in debt to nearly all the tradesmen. My wedding ring was not paid for. I immediately became pregnant, and being strongly opposed to any credit, I never knew what it was to have enough to eat until just as my baby was born, unless someone asked me out to tea, which was seldom. Often I could hardly resist picking up the crusts out of the road . . . Baby clothes was my own cut up. The tenth day after the baby was born he came home drunk and compelled me to submit to him. Of course, I had no strength and was at his mercy. My uncle got him a situation when he found how we were situated, but that was very soon lost, drink and a haughty bearing the chief cause. Then there was dishonesty in another place . . . Babies came rather fast. Then I got told I was like a rabbit for breeding and drugs was obtained, as he did not want children, although I was compelled to submit. The second little one died, and soon after the third one came, I was so ill I had to have the doctor, who said there was no disease, but I must go from home and stay as long as possible . . . I was so badly treated that when I knew my condition for the fourth time, I took something which nearly ended my existence. It poisoned me. The doctor said in less than half-an-hour if he had not come I should have been dead. I asked my husband what I should do when my time came. I begged him almost on my knees to stay in nights as I feared I should be quite alone, but he would not stay, out often till 2 a.m. However, an old lady of 80 came at the time and for a week to wash the baby. I never had my bed made or was attended to in any way. Had to do all for myself and dress and wash the other children. I suffered for years through this. 12*s.* that confinement cost, and he swore about that. At three weeks I had to run out in the middle of the night in the street to get away from him. That was in December. The treatment was shameful. Result—the poor babe had consumption of the bowels; however, I pulled it through myself. Often I tried to make up my mind to end my existence, but I could not leave the children with him. I was always miles away from my friends. I then kept him at arms length for 18 months, I told him I would never have another child by him, and I haven't . . . He gives me as little money as possible and for weeks together never speaks to me. I have never been able to put my troubles before him. Have had to keep all to myself. I hid things up from the children as much as possible, but this spring he told me when sober he did not intend to support me much longer. If I earn any, he gives me less, and he never saves any, so what can I do?" The writer tells of her efforts for the children, and goes on: "Years ago he suddenly took a fancy to go to church and took the eldest boy with him. Sometimes I would remark, 'You are late to-night!' 'Yes,' he would always say, 'we have had a long sermon. I found he was in the habit of going straight to a public-house and compelling the boy to come with him. I said to the child, 'why did you go in! Being a member of a temperance guild, it was very wrong.' He said, 'I begged dad to let me come home or stay outside, and he said he would thrash me if I did not come in or told yon.' I never trusted them with him again. My husband has never in his life given his boys one word of advice and has never showed the slightest interest in their welfare. He seems to think there is no wrong in doing anything, telling untruths or prigging; the only thing is you must not be found out. I should have left him years ago, only for the children . . . It is so much worse than being a widow . . . Don't you think in such a case there should be some release? And do you think I ought to be turned out into the world at my age, 54, in a penniless condition, to start life afresh? . . . Just think what the feeling is that there is a woman or women somewhere in the town probably who knows the life he is living, and one has to put up with this or face publicity. I cannot believe it is right that this should be so or that it is good for the children . . . Suppose I get a divorce, what could I do? I could not go back to my old trade after 25 years (dressmaker). I should simply have to turn out as a charwoman, at the time of life when one needs rest, &c. . . . The boys say 'leave him mother,' but I could not wash our dirty linen in public, and if I did, it is the children who would suffer . . . It is impossible to tell you only a little, but I might say . . . the threat has always been held over my head that he should go to some other woman . . . I felt so degraded. I had not the same privilege as the beasts of the field. No one can possibly imagine what it is unless you go through it, to feel you are simply a convenience to a man. I used to feel I was much more degraded than the poor unfortunate women who make a living by it . . . I believe that it is immoral in God's sight for a man and woman to live together as husband and wife when there is no possibility of them living together happily."

"114. Case from Yorkshire.—At the age of 25, I married a man of my own station, one that I believed would make me a suitable helpmate, but a very short time after marriage I was forced to realise intoxicating drink had for him a far greater fascination than home or wife . . . One evening, hoping to keep him from bad company, I went to the warehouse at which he was engaged and met him after work hours. In the presence of his shop mates he drew me to him, kissed me, saying how pleased he was I came, but directly we were alone he cursed me for trying to spoil his pleasure, and all the way home threatened what he would do when we got there. I was not accustomed to talk to my neighbours. Shame held me silent. This he knew. When we reached home, he pushed me in the passage and locked the door. Then to terrify me he beat a chair into small pieces against the wall, and also threw the burning lamp to the ground; and when I tried to extinguish the blaze, he threw me also to the floor and held me there, until the floor cloth became alight. He then laughed at my fright and hurried to put out the fire. Then fearing the neighbours would wonder at the noise, he threw open the door and shouted that all in the street might hear that he had been working hard all day and had come home and found his wife helplessly drunk and the house filthy dirty. He knew only too well shame of his conduct would seal my lips. I would not defend myself. This is the cruelty that stabs the heart though the body may be free from the marks of brutality. Things went on in this way . . . until we agreed to part . . . I went home to my mother and my husband simply lived in public-houses as long as his money lasted, then without money, work or food he made my life a misery till I consented to try him again. I got a few things together, and life was a little better for a short time until he knew I was likely to become a mother. Then so bad was his conduct that on two occasions I appealed to the magistrates for protection." The husband was three times sentenced, the third time to a month's imprisonment without option of a fine. The wife then obtained a separation order but the only money received was two payments of 5*s.* each during the short life of the child. On the child's death, his shopmates, not knowing he was apart from his wife, made a collection for the funeral expenses. "This money he drank in company with a woman he was very friendly with, he also told this woman the dead child was his, but I was not his legal wife. At the earnest request of many friends, for the sake of my child's name, I allowed this woman to read my marriage certificate. Even after all this, once again he made my life a misery by constantly following me about, that at last in desperation I gave him another trial. In a few weeks the old life started all over again, and when at last the neighbours told him he ought to be ashamed of himself, he told them I was not his wife, but a woman he was living with. I should have known nothing of this, but one day after he had been noisy, a man living next door, an elderly man, asked me why I continued to live with a man like that. I told him I expect it was because he was my husband, but he answered. 'Oh, no! he is not your husband, but only a man you are living with.' I then concluded that I had borne enough. I removed my wedding ring from my finger, and from that time to this never again lived with or acknowledged him as my husband. I allowed that man also to read my marriage certificate. During the last 15 years I have lived working and supporting myself. I might have filled a better position than just a factory hand, as I am to-day, had I not always been in dread of my vagabond husband appearing upon the scene as he had frequently done, covering me with humiliation and shame and spreading the vilest rumours about me reflecting upon my character; but the fact that I have been in one empoly the whole time should, I think, speak for my character. I am personally looking forward with hope that divorce will be brought within reach of the people, and I shall be one of the first to try for that relief, not because I hope or wish to re-marry, but because I cordially long to regain that freedom which will relieve me from the necessity of passing myself off as a widow."

"115. Case from the North of England.—Publicity has been my one dread, and I find I am not alone. Then again the ignorance of the law . . . When I have been threatened by legally insisting on conjugal rights. the thought of publicity has made me submit. I was brought up in a very narrow circle . . . I did not understand the world, was married young, left all my early associations, went to the north of England to live . . . Because I had vowed by the marriage law, there was no help but to submit as a duty. Then I had children who comforted me and were very dear to me, and that caused more misery, for my husband was jealous of the children . . . I have worked hard to bring them up decently . . . Since my health gave way my life has not been worth living. When I ceased to add to the income, I was no more than a dog . . . I went into hospital and I vowed if I was spared to go out, I would assert my rights, late in life though it was . . . Still I had not the courage to seek a separation. He would not give me money, but provided the food he thought he would. As I did not work, he thought I would not want much. Then a strange thing happened. My brother, who is a baker, asked me to come and help in the shop for a time, which proved a blessing, to be away from him in the country. It built me up, for I had nearly three months of it. The day I came home I found that early that morning he had moved all the furniture except the bedroom and gone away, so that I was left without a home or money, and he has never been near since. Now . . . I am free. My daughter and I live very happy together. She is a waitress now, but she often remarks we have not much of a home, but we are free to think and talk and work in our own way."

116. Wife was deserted for six months before the birth of her baby, and afterwards refused maintenance except in the house of the husband's father, where she had been most unhappy. The husband has never seen or asked after the child and is walking about publicly with low women, and the wife has no money to get him watched. She is afraid to go out, as he threatens her. Before marriage she earned 22*s.* a week as typist. His parents insisted on her going out to work after marriage, and she then earned 15*s.*—later reduced to 10*s.*

"117. My husband turned out a thoroughly bad man. A supposed teetotaler, yet a secret drinker. Of women he could not have enough, till I was ashamed to be seen out with him. Eventually he lost his work. I had just come into some money; hoping he would do better I bought him a business. He would not attend to it and lost my money. Then he had other chances, all to no purpose, and through it all, by fits and starts, he was making my life and our sons unbearable by fits of ungovernable rage, sometimes lying in bed all day, another time tearing all over the house, and through the night cursing and swearing, using the most filthy language it is possible to imagine, holding a knife over me, but never touching me, because then, and only then, could I get a separation. He never lost himself enough to forget that. It ruined my health. He lost my money, made my life unbearable, and yet through our splendid, just, English, man-made laws, I was utterly helpless, and at my husband's mercy. I got a doctor to see him; he could not certify him insane. Saw the chief constable of the county, he, sorry as he was, could do nothing, the lawyers could do nothing. At last a Christian friend of my husband's came to the rescue; he got him a situation as far away as possible with a friend, took him there, and I was guarantee for 50*l.* I had a letter from him the next day saying he should have come straight back if he had had money, but what's to prevent him coming back, nothing, and I live in terror of it, am afraid to be out in the dark or be left at home alone. He sends me nothing for my maintenance, and I have to work hard to keep a home together, and tied fast to such a man. Is it right or just to a woman that it should be so?"

"118. Miscellaneous Cases.—I have lately attended a woman with her eighth child. She is 30 years of age and her eldest child is 12 years. She had been left a widow at 24 with three children, and married again in order to have a father for her children. In the six years she has been married to this man, she has had four living children, one premature birth, and one miscarriage. She has had to work just as hard as before, at washing and cleaning. On the occasion of the last birth, she worked up to 4 o'clock in the afternoon, cleaning bedrooms in a large hotel. Her baby was born at 9.15 that night, and I know quite well that the birth would have been much easier had she not been so tired and exhausted with having to work when in an unfit state. She had been in actual pain for two days previously, and ought really to have remained in bed and been well nourished. She stayed in bed after the birth for eight days, went back to her usual work on the 12th day, having put the baby on the bottle, and, as a consequence, the child died. Just think of this waste—the pain borne by the woman, the suffering of the child, and the expense of the birth and funeral, and all because the man, who will not work to keep his offspring, insists on his "rights" as a husband. This man does not drink to excess, he is not in the habit of thrashing his wife, and because of this she thinks he is not a bad husband. When I asked her if she did not think it a pity to keep on bringing babies into the world to have to work for them herself, she said: "Well, he is my husband, what can I do?'"

"119. Woman died broken-hearted when she found she was not the legal wife, as the man she married was only separated from his wife."

"120. Two cases where women have committed bigamy, where, if they could have got a divorce, they would have been legally married."

"121. Wife went away with another man, leaving one child. Later, the husband lived with another woman, and she had children."

"122. Wife left her husband, reason unknown, and came with her little girl to another town, where she lived with another man. They would probably have been married had it been possible."

"123. Case where, after a separation order, both parties led an immoral life."

"124. I know of cases here in B—— where couples are living what they call 'tally,' much more happily than with their lawful husbands and wives, and one couple each have the children of the marriage."

"125. Case of divorce. The sender thinks it is possible the parties might have come together again, if an attempt at reconciliation had been made."

"126. Similar case.

"127. I had a sister who fell through my father's friend . . . circumstances lent themselves to this, but the sorrow was great. Now that sister lies in her grave, and the man is now living. He has filled the highest places in the city except lord mayor. His wife looked over the offence. Yet it must be always there. She died with all done for her that affection could give, his family have been kept together. Now, I think, if this had all been brought public, that family had been stranded, but be sure sin brings its own punishment."

"128. The husband ran away, as we call it, with another woman. He had got all their joint savings, and the poor woman was left destitute. She got work after a time and to all appearances forgot, but no, not quite, and whenever she saw me she invariably began to talk about it. After about six months, the man came back and the woman lived with him again, but though she forgave him, she could not forget, and it eventually turned her brain, and she is now in a lunatic asylum"

"129. A woman got a divorce and was given custody of children. She was taken ill and could not keep them, so the guardians had to relieve them. The father was asked to contribute towards their support. He refused unless he was given a guarantee when the children were old enough to work he should be given their wages, with no consideration for the mother." (Mrs. A. is one of the poor-law guardians.)

"130. A good many cases I know where the men earn 2*l.* or 2*l.* 5*s.* a week and gives his wife perhaps 25*s.* or 20*s.* a week, sometimes not that, while he spends what he has left in drink, or gambling, or horse racing, or making himself as bad as ever the law allows him to be, while the wife she has either to go to work and help keep the children or else go neglected."

"131. I know the case of the husband who went bankrupt, and so getting clear of paying his wife the allowance she was granted. He himself lived in hotels as he had no home, and so was able to say it took all his wages to keep him. So it did, for he spent it all on himself."

37,013. (Mr. Spender.) May I take the point on page 48. You say, "It follows from this view that the serious desire of either husband or wife will be sufficient ground on which the State may sanction divorce, under suitable conditions as to time and provision for children." That, I suppose, if it were the practice and principle, would embrace most other causes?—That is so.

37,014. Practically, you would say that if a marriage had broken down in practice according to the feeling of both parties, that should be a ground of divorce. In one of the letters which you have quoted, one of your correspondents is in favour of the cases being heard behind closed doors, and the correspondent adds "It concerns only the family." Do you take that view yourself?—No, not altogether. I am not really prepared to say definitely what I should feel about it, only I think the present custom is undesirable. I should have thought a summary of proved facts would have been all that would be necessary to communicate.

37,015. I am thinking of it not merely from the point of view of publication in the newspapers, but as a matter of principle. It seems to me to go very much to the root of this matter, if you have a divorce on the ground of incompatibility by the two parties themselves, and that becomes a matter of divorce ipso facto. It seems to banish the consideration of the State out of marriage?—I feel that there are certain conditions under which the State might very well step in as they do now, both as regards marriage and as regards divorce, and on the question of children the State should always have some voice in the matter.

37,016. I think in the countries of which we have had evidence in which this ground of divorce is allowed, it is very carefully defined, and it is realised that it is a very important public matter, to which the State is, so to speak, a third party?—Yes.

37,017. You would wish to define it in a very definite way?—Yes, the way in which the State would step in.

37,018. In the Norwegian law, where they admit these grounds, we were told there is a long period of probation when the parties have come for a divorce?—I think in the Norwegian law for mutual consent the period of probation is one year, and where one party makes application it is for two years.

37,019. You contemplate something of the sort?—Yes.

37,020. I put that because on reading this evidence as it stands it looks as if you might interpret it as meaning this was purely a private matter?—I would put it under suitable conditions as to time which you would allow for a probationary period, and there should also be provision for children.

37,021. If I may pursue it a step further, it is commonly said that the loosening of the tie in this respect, relaxing it for both husband and wife, because you would have to give the same rights to the husband as to the wife, would seriously weaken the economic position of women, that a man might easily find ground for dissolving the marriage tie, and throwing off his responsibilities. Is that the view of your working women? Do they feel that the present durability of the marriage tie is a guarantee of their economic position?—They feel strongly the extreme difficulty of the position and the need for some kind of economic independence. What they desire would be the possibility of freeing themselves from a life of suffering.

37,022. Would they take both those things together. In many cases you expound a state of things in which the economic situation compels the woman to live with a man. Supposing you relax that by what you propose, is the economic situation rendered better or worse?—Under present circumstances it is rendered worse.

37,023. Supposing you cannot solve that economic question, would your working class women prefer to take the risk of altering the conditions or to endure the present alleged evils of the marriage law for the sake of the economic assurance it gives to them?—I would rather you ask Mrs. Barton, who is here on behalf of the Sheffield branch of the guild. I understand that they wish to have an opportunity of being free, and would risk the economic difficulties.

(Chairman.) We will hear Mrs. Barton afterwards.

37,024. (Mr. Spender.) We assume, if we do not go to these lengths, there are certain cases to be taken separately. May I ask for a clearer definition on two points: first as to the husband's refusal to maintain. What would that signify exactly? Do you mean where, after a separation case has been brought into the courts and an order made and an allowance given by the magistrate, the husband has refused to maintain?—No; the meaning was where under the ordinary circumstances of married life the husband did not give his wages to the wife, did not give sufficient money for the maintenance of the family.

37,025. You mean a man returning on Saturday, after receiving his wages, and keeping too large a proportion for his own private expenditure?—Yes.

37,026. Do they consider that alone, or a persistent refusal?—I think they would consider it a persistent refusal.

37,027. Which means drink usually, I suppose?—Not necessarily always at all. I have known many cases of this kind in which there is an inadequate amount given for maintenance, and it is not associated always with drink; sometimes it is extravagance and betting habits.

37,028. We will take the consideration we have just discussed: a divorce is not a remedy for that, it leaves the economic situation just as bad?—I admitted the economic situation was a very important factor, but I did not feel in this paper I was called upon to give any kind of scheme.

37,029. The point is raised acutely?—Undoubtedly; it brings the difficulty to a head.

37,030. What you mean in proposing that is this: suppose a worthless husband had for a long time kept back too large a part of his wages, either for drink or gambling or any other purpose, that woman should be free to seek another partner?—That is what they mean, I think.

37,031. Is there a strong sentiment?—Very strong indeed. I was surprised, in talking it over, how very strong this feeling was, and very naturally, because I have had a case where the inadequate maintenance that is given has meant starvation of the family, and illness.

37,032. As to mutual consent and serious incompatibility, that was your phrase?—Yes.

37,033. Does that mean you could have divorce for either of those two grounds, if both the parties agreed in demanding it?—Yes.

37,034. Or if one alleges that the other is incompatible?—Yes.

37,035. You take either?—Yes.

37,036. Have you any idea what you mean by "serious incompatibility"? What does "serious" mean, exactly? You mean something more than mere friction of temper?—Any strong desire that either would express as regards the impossibility of living with the other. I think it is impossible to define it.

37,037. It might be attachment to some other person?—Yes.

37,038. (Mrs. Tennant.) Have you any opinion on the question of penal servitude?—I should include that personally, I think.

37,039. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) Do you share the view of the branches as to the objection to police courts as a court for dealing with these questions?—I have not any personal knowledge, but I should be very much inclined, from all I hear, to agree.

37,040. That is largely, is it not, on the ground of the unsuitable surroundings of a police court?—Yes.

37,041. And the publicity of it?—Yes.

37,042. Would it at all alter your view with regard to that if these cases were heard in a court like the Children's Court? You know what I mean?—Yes.

37,043. Where the press are not necessarily admitted, or the public, and where the surroundings are more what you call "with closed doors," at any rate more private? Would that meet the objection?—I should think it might meet it to a certain extent, but I have not any definite views myself on the subject, not knowing sufficient about the conditions of the various courts.

37,044. You realise that the magistrate very often is a man who is much more in contact with the poor than the county court judge?—Yes.

37,045. You have given your evidence very clearly that you are in favour of divorce by mutual consent, I think you said where the parties for a year are quite definitely of opinion that they would rather be divorced?—Yes. I do not think any definite period was suggested, but there should be some period.

37,046. I thought you said one year to Mr. Spender?—I was mentioning the Norwegian law, which is a year in the case of mutual consent, and two years in the case of one of the parties.

37,047. You think some such period would be adequate?—I should have thought so.

37,048. Or incompatibility. I do not quite follow what you mean by "incompatibility." The explanation you gave to Mr. Spender sounded more like mutual consent?—A serious desire on the part of either of the parties not to live with the other. It is very difficult to define it.

37,049. I do not want to press you about that. For instance, if the husband definitely does not wish to continue his relation with his wife, and the wife would prefer to remain married, if that goes on for two years you think there ought to be a divorce?—I feel there should be the possibility of a divorce.

37,050. Supposing that desire on the part of the husband to be freed from his wife is due to the fact he has transferred his affections to another woman, would that be a kind of incompatibility you would recognise as sufficient for a divorce if it went on long enough?—Certainly.

37,051. That is not only your own opinion (I am not now referring to details), but the opinion of the 124 late officials you have approached?—Not the whole number of them, but a majority of them, certainly.

37,052. You have given the figures?—Yes.

37,053. Have you any reason to think that their views would be shared by the branches themselves?—Yes. On the whole I should say that they were very typical of the other members in the branches. The branch opinion on the whole might not be so advanced, but from the evidence we have had of the branches I may say it would very closely represent the branch view.

37,054. Do those 124 individuals represent all the late officials, or a selected number?—Not late officials. They were women who were selected from those whom we know to be specially intelligent—on no other ground at all.

37,055. They do not represent the whole class of officials beyond late officials?—They do not represent the official class; they do not represent anything.

37,056. I used the wrong verb. I do not mean "represent"; they are not the only officials beyond late officials that exist?—No, we have many more officials than that.

37,057. You selected 124 of the most intelligent?—Women who have been officials or are now officials, and who, from our own knowledge of them, have shown special intelligence.

37,058. Was there any reason why this very important question as to incompatibility should not have been submitted to the branches themselves?—We only submitted the two questions to the branches, the equality and the cheapening, and the question of the juries.

37,059. Why did you not go further?—We did not go into any of the questions with the branches; we did not think they had yet had sufficient study of the subject.

37,060. So far as you are acquainted with their view, you think they would agree with the view you yourself and the majority of the 124 formed?—I should think the majority of the branches would, though all might not be so advanced. But these women are drawn from the same class as the branch members, and would to a very large extent be representative of the branches.

37,061. Your view is not only that the grounds of divorce should be widened to the very large extent you have indicated, but that it should cease to bear any stigma or moral disability at all?—The mere fact of divorce.

37,062. It should be like the severance of any other contract?—It would, no doubt, be considered a misfortune.

37,063. A mere matter of the termination of a contract?—Of a sacred contract.

37,064. Of a sacred contract?—I should be prepared to say that.

37,065. What does that mean? What is a sacred contract?—A contract that had been of a specially sacred character.

37,066. What is a contract of a specially sacred character?—A contract in which the subject was one which would be recognised as of extreme importance and seriousness.

37,067. You cannot define it more clearly than that. It does not convey very much impression to my mind. It is my fault, I have no doubt?—I have heard it called an ethical sacrament; I think that is the term.

36,068. That gets more unintelligible to me, if you will forgive my saying so. Now I want to ask you about women being on juries. I quite follow all you say, but what do you think, from your great experience, would be the attitude of women jurymen in a divorce case? Do you not think that their inclination would be to be hard on their own sex?—I do not think one can specify what women would do in general, any more than what men would do in general.

37,069. That is not your experience; you have not found that in dealing with women, that on the whole women are harder on their own sex?—My own experience would be the contrary.

37,070. Your experience is very large. Would you go further? I rather read your proof to mean something further, that where there was no jury you think a woman ought to be perhaps an assessor to the judge, or perhaps a judge. Do you go as far as that?—I made a suggestion that there might be a woman who would act somewhat in the same way as an assessor in patent or naval cases might act, but I am not prepared to go into detail as regards these leading positions. I feel strongly, and I know I am voicing the strong opinions of working women, that women should take some part in the administration of the law. I am not prepared to specify exactly the kind of legal position they would hold.

37,071. One witness, and I think more than one, suggested that there should be women magistrates to deal with separation orders?—Yes.

37,072. Would you take that view?—I should think it would be very often most advisable.

37,073. If there were such magistrates, would you limit their work simply to the separation orders or would you let them take just the same part as any other magistrate?—I should be inclined to.

37,074. I suppose members of your guild are chiefly of the middle class, what are very inaccurately called the lower middle class?—They belong to the artisan class, the wives of men who would be in trade unions of every kind.

37,075. They are not the very poor?—No.

37,076. I ask that because I see their view, and I gather your view is against outside efforts towards reconciliation between husband and wife?—There is a strong feeling against that.

37,077. You sympathise with that?—I think that is a very natural feeling.

37,078. Is not that largely an incident of the class to which the persons whose opinions you voice belong; I mean to say incidental to their class rather than to the very poor?—The very poor are so very much used to being interfered with, that they would not resent mediation in a way that a better working-class woman would.

37,079. Do you think that is a fair way of describing efforts to make peace between husband and wife among the very poor? I follow it with regard to another class, but do you not think efforts of that kind are very useful?—I think they have been in many cases quite valuable, but I thought it striking that with this better-off class there were many who felt it was in fact almost dangerous.

37,080. You would not depreciate the work of police court missionaries in that way. You know they do a very large amount of work in bringing people together?—That may be. I was dealing with the class of women whom I represent.

37,081. You do not wish to say anything about them?—I think mediation on their behalf would be such as ordinary solicitors now often carry on with people of a richer class, and I think any officials connected with the subject might act as ordinary solicitors do, very often, as mediators.

37,082. A police court missionary going among that class would be considered impertinent?—Yes.

37,083. Does your experience enable you to say anything as to what you think of their work among the class they operate among, the very poor?—I have no knowledge of that.

37,084. (Chairman.) Are your own views formed entirely from your connection with the guild or from study, and so forth, generally?—By thinking about the subject generally, and also from the experience that I have had in connection with the lives of women, which has been large.

37,085. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) There is one question I omitted to ask you. You told us the view of your constituents was strongly that the mother should be the guardian of the children in the event of separation or divorce?—That the presumption should be in favour of the mother.

37,086. Yes. Have they considered as to what age that is to go. "Children" is such a wide phrase. One understands it as to infants in arms, but is it also for boys and girls of 15?—I should think it would include those. I should imagine so.

(Chairman.) I ought to thank you very much on behalf of the Commission for the valuable paper you have prepared, and the extremely careful thought and extensive labour you must have bestowed upon it. I think you have brought with you one of the members of the guild. I have not had a proof, but I should like to ask her a few questions.

Mrs. Eleanor Barton called and examined.

37,087. (Chairman.) Where is your own home?—Sheffield.

37,088. Are you married?—Yes.

37,089. What is your husband?—He is Secretary of the Independent Labour Party.

37,090. Does he work in a trade as well?—No.

37,091. Are you a member of the Branch of the Guild at Sheffield?—Yes.

37,092. Do you attend the meetings?—Yes, regularly.

37,093. Were you at the Congress in London when the resolutions were passed?—At Oxford.

37,094. You have heard Miss Davies' account of that?—Yes.

37,095. What does your own branch consist of?—Thirty-six members.

35,096. Who are they the wives of?—The better class artisan. We have wives of railway clerks, wives of the Corporation labourers and joiners.

37,097. Can you give any idea of the range of wages which they have?—I should say anything from 25*s.* to 2*l.* a week.

37,098. That I think enables us to judge pretty well. I have not very much to ask you because you have not furnished us with a proof of what you desire to say. What does your own Guild say about the equality of the sexes?—There was only one exception; they were all in favour that the divorce laws should be equal between men and women.

37,099. How many were in favour of it?—Thirty-five.

37,100. What is the view of your Guild with regard to the expense of the present system of proceedings?—They feel that at present it does not help working women at all, and that it ought to be brought within the range of the working women.

37,101. They have expressed a desire for that?—Yes.

37,102. The wages are not enough?—No.

37,103. The money is not enough: that is the broad point?—Yes.

37,104. Do they think they ought to have a court accessible to them if they desire it?—Yes.

37,105. To what extent do your people represent the opinion of others in the same rank of life as they are in Sheffield?—I should say the women we have are thinking women, and women who mix with others and take an intelligent interest in their neighbours. They are members of other organisations where they come into contact with other women and they represent a very large opinion, larger than their numbers would seem to signify.

37,106. Do you think that they may be taken as representative of thinking women in Sheffield?—I should say so.

37,107. You have perhaps heard some of the questions that were put to Miss Davies?—Yes.

37,108. There is one point I should like to ask you about, what is called the economic question. Do you understand that?—Yes.

37,109. Can you give us any views of the women about that?—Yes. It is quite true, as Miss Davies has told you, a married working woman in the home has no money of her own at all and that makes it very hard for women to escape from any amount of cruelty. I do not mean physical cruelty; there are different causes and different cases of cruelty; but to understand the position of working women one has to live among them. There is a great amount of suffering which never sees daylight. The women in many cases are martyrs. I think it is really because of the idea of morality. One has the idea if they are married, they have to submit to their husbands. In all cases, and it makes it especially hard in cases of working women, because they are not able to get away the same as people in a better class of life. They live their lives so nearly together, and it means that a great amount of suffering is suffered by these women by, say, a lustful husband, by bearing children unwillingly. It is not talked about. They feel they are married and because they are married they must submit to this sort of thing.

37,110. How do you think that would be improved, supposing you had a Divorce Court sitting in Sheffield?—I go wider than Divorce Courts there, and say our children should be taught the uses of their own body, both boys and girls. I hold strong opinions on that subject, and also that the law of morality should be the same for both sexes. If a man felt that a woman was not his own property, as he does to-day, and it was easier to get a divorce on account of being cruel, it would bring about a greater respect for womanhood.

37,111. You think if there was the opportunity on proper grounds of going to the Court and an easy means of access at a moderate cost, it would improve the standing of women and men?—I believe so.

37,112. There would be greater respect to the woman from the man, and would put a check on his conduct?—Yes.

37,113. That is your view?—Yes.

37,114. And is it shared by your people?—Yes, mostly, I think.

37,115. What is the view of your body of women on the question of the grounds on which divorce should be obtained?—Of course, there are different views, but most of them have the idea that it should be made very much easier. For instance, with regard to incompatibility wherever there are two people joined together and they find their whole interests are quite opposed to each other, it means they are each living their own life apart, a house divided against itself, and one feels that should be a ground for divorce. Then as regards separation, perhaps a man has been cruel to a woman and she has had a separation. We feel strongly where they have been separated two or three years, that should be an occasion for divorce, because we feel that tends to immorality.

37,116. What is the view about a case where a man deserts and goes off to America?—In that case, if he was away some time and did not communicate, they feel that should be a ground for divorce. When a man leaves a wife and children, as many are doing just now, and have to go to another country to seek a living, and keeps up communication a year or two in the hope of sending for them, that is different.

37,117. That is not the case I put?—In that case one would say they should have a divorce.

37,118. Where he wilfully goes off and does nothing for them, I mean?—Yes, that should be ground for a divorce.

37,119. Has your Guild considered the question of cruelty as a ground?—We have not passed resolutions on it, but I know the idea pretty well. We have discussed it.

37,120. What do you say about that?—They feel that a woman ought not to be subjected to a man's cruelty, because the thing they feel very strongly is what a bad effect it has on the children. One feels, especially where there are boys and girls in a home, it is giving the boy a very bad chance for his own home life when he breaks apart from the paternal home and has one of his own. It does not give the boys any respect for womanhood.

37,121. Has your Guild considered the question of where one of the people becames insane?—Yes. The general opinion on that was that each case would have to be decided on its merits. There are cases where women are insane after the birth of each child, and one feels very strongly on this point, that a lot of this evidence is kept underhand and the women suffer, but some feel the doctors might speak out because they know and understand these things. The cases come before them.

37,122. I was rather putting the case where a person was hopelessly shut up, not the case you are thinking of. They have discussed that?—Yes. It came up under the same heading; all the things were taken. They seem to think where a man or woman was hopelessly insane it would be better for the other to form a contract with someone else.

37,123. (Mr. Brierley.) Was this question of incompatibility discussed by the Guild?—Yes.

37,124. Could you tell us what they meant by it? Does it amount to this, that any established dislike on the part of the husband or wife should entitle him or her to a divorce?—They felt if two people are living together in a house under the conditions working people have to live, sharing the same bedroom all the time, and if their interests are totally opposed to each other, it must create dislike.

37,125. A wife who conceives a dislike for her husband, you think, ought to be entitled to a divorce from him and to retain the custody of her children, although the husband may have committed no sort of wrong in any way whatever?—Yes.

37,126. That would follow?—Without love and reverence for each other it amounts to cruelty.

37,127. It may not be the husband's fault that the wife has conceived a dislike; he may have conducted himself with perfect propriety. Do you suggest the wife should be able to obtain a divorce and to retain the custody of the children of whom he may be as fond as she is herself?—Yes, because I cannot conceive any one caring to bind any one who had no liking for them.

37,128. That would follow?—That is so, but it is one of those things in which we have to look to the greatest good.

37,129. I only wanted to know whether that was the view?—Yes.

37,130. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) You told us one of the grievances under which women labour is not having a definite share or any sufficient share of their husband's wages?—Yes.

37,131. I suppose that is a very real trouble, a man spends his money in betting and drinking, and leaves the family almost to starve?—Yes.

37,132. It has been suggested that there ought to be a law that a definite share of the husband's wages should belong to the wife as a matter of right, and she should have her right, if he does not pay it, to go to some court and compel him to pay it. Are you in favour of that?—Yes. Take a man whose wife lies ill and he has to have a housekeeper or pay for all the laundry work and baking: it costs him so much. Men have the idea a woman's work in the home is not work, but it is work that should be paid for just the same as any other.

37,133. You think the wife ought to have a legal claim to be paid for that just like an outside person?—Yes.

37,134. Is that the view of your friends in Sheffield generally?—Yes.

37,135. It has been really considered by them?—Yes, we have discussed that question.

37,136. With regard to incompatibility, Mr. Brierley put to you the case of a man who has done no harm. In my mind the case is stronger with a man who has done harm. Take a man who has transferred his affections from his wife to another woman, and she knows it. Do you think he ought to be able to go and get a divorce because he says, "I have lost all love for my wife, and there is entire incompatibility between us: I have a mistress, and I prefer the mistress: give me a divorce." Do you think that ought to be?—Yes.

37,137. Supposing the wife does not want it, and is heartbroken at the infidelity, but loves him still. Ought he still to get the divorce?—They do to-day.

37,138. How do you mean?—They grant the divorce to-day when it is only desired by one party.

37,139. I am not speaking on the ground of adultery in that case. The wife might get it, but a person cannot get divorce on the ground of their own?—No. The point I wanted to make clear was you do not ask to-day that both persons shall be agreeable for disunion.

37,140. At any rate, you think no matter what the incompatibility is caused by, if it exists, it ought to be a good ground for divorce to either party?—I think so.

37,141. Is that the view of your friends generally at Sheffield?—Yes.

37,142. I think you told us they belong to all classes of working people?—Yes.

37,143. Do they take any interest in politics?—Yes.

37,144. Are they largely Conservatives?—We have all parties represented, both Liberals, Conservatives, and the Labour Party. Of course, we do not introduce party politics.

37,145. Which do they most belong to?—I should say Liberal, really.

37,146. Not the Labour Party?—No.

37,147. There is another case. You put the case of a woman who did not want to bear children, and her husband made her, really. Do you regard that as a ripe case for divorce?—Yes, I should say so. The question is that women suffer a great deal through their husbands' sensuality, and that is more evident amongst working people than other classes, simply because the conditions of life lend themselves to that sort of thing, and they have not been taught the proper uses of their body. If one eats too much, they are immediately called a glutton, and I think we should be taught we should be able to restrain all passions. No passions should be able to overcome man or woman.

37,148. It is rather difficult to talk about this, but you admit marital relations as one of the great objects of marriage?—Yes.

37,149. If that is refused by one side or not desired by one side, do you think that is a reason for allowing divorce?—Yes, seeing that is the object of it, I should say so. I do not see why marriage should legalise prostitution.

37,150. Having entered into a contract and not wishing to perform part of it, that should be a reason why it should be annulled?—Yes.

37,151. (Mrs. Tennant.) I want to clear up one matter. I gather from one of your replies to the Chairman that it is the opinion of women that insanity at childbirth has been caused by what might be defined as the cruelty of their husbands?—Yes.

37,152. Did I gather rightly that they base that opinion upon what doctors have told them?—No.

37,153. You said doctors ought to have spoken up?—Because I feel the doctors know this is the case, and I think they are the people who have this evidence and could give it more conclusively than one like myself.

37,154. Is it merely supposition that the doctors have that evidence, or have the doctors said anything to the women which has made them feel they have that evidence?—I have had things told me by different women that have given me to understand the doctors do know.

37,155. (Lady Frances Balfour.) You were asked some questions about fulfilling the marriage contract. You did not mean to imply you did not wish married people to live together in those relations, only if there had been a good deal of brutal treatment and excess in those ways and the woman had come to dislike it, that would be a reason for breaking it off?—No.

37,156. Not simply from disliking the conditions, but simply from the abuse of them, the woman had been cruelly used and had taken a dislike to that life? —Yes.

37,157. To excess?—That is so.

37,158. (Chairman.) Perhaps I had better get this clear. What did you intend to convey by what the doctors said to these women?—What I mean is that doctors know many things women suffer from by their marriage relations, and that in many cases there have been women who have been sent away completely from their home-life to get a complete rest because of the married relations.

37,159. Then the doctor has given very good advice? —Yes.

37,160. I do not think you complain of that?—I do complain very largely. One gentleman here said—it is rather a delicate matter to speak on, but personally, women are suffering.

37,161. You do not complain of the doctors giving good advice?—I do say that the doctors could give very valuable evidence as regards these marriage relations.

37,162. You mean of the necessity for such advice.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) They could give evidence here.

(Chairman.) To show there was abuse in this respect.

(Mrs. Tennant.) The point was that was, in the opinion of these women, responsible for their insanity at childbirth.

(Chairman.) Yes.

37,163. Do your members belong to any particular section of the Churches?—Yes; we have nonconformists, and we have members of the Church of England.

37,164. All varieties?—Yes.

37,165. They are all agreed?—Yes.

(Chairman.) I think your evidence has been very interesting, and I thank you for coming to give it.

Mrs. Ruth Homan called and examined.

37,166. (Chairman.) Are you an official of the Woman's Industrial Council?—No, I am only a member of the council.

37,167. The reason I ask is because I had the Secretary's proof before me, but it has been changed to yours. I had Mrs. MacDonald's proof, but you have come instead?—She has resigned. She is no longer a member of the council, and I have been asked to take her place.

37,168. May I take it you are an influential member of the Women's Industrial Council?—I have been a member a good many years. I do uot know that I am influential.

37,169. The council, in the course of their inquiries into the conditions of women-workers, find a great hardship often recurring amongst those who have obtained a separation order, and whose husbands then evade the paying of the maintainance fixed by the court?—Yes.

37,170. Will you kindly read what you say after that?—I have to submit definite cases in point from different parts of the country. In some cases the man has moved from the town, and cannot be traced by the wife. Other cases show that the husband causes unpleasantness when he brings the money, or interferes with the children if they are sent for it. A very common grievance is that the husband though within reach and often earning good money, refuses to pay, and it costs the wife 5*s.* or more to summon him, often without any good resulting.

"The council suggest:—(a) That in the case of a separation order, which necessarily implies bad behaviour on the part of the husband (or wife) the couple should not be obliged to come in personal contact, or to communicate by means of the children for the payment of the maintenance. It should be payable into court, or through some official at the option of the parties concerned; (b) That the wife should not be at the expense of summoning the husband for making default in payment. A way should be arranged by which, without a large amount of trouble, she should be able to get her summons free; (c) That it should be made optional for the wife to put upon the court the responsibility for summoning the husband when the maintenance payable by him is in arrears and for tracing him if he leaves the neighbourhood. The machinery appointed to carry out (a) would naturally be utilised also for this purpose of enforcing payment, particularly when there are children; (d) That orders for the wife's maintenance might be served on the husband's employer for payment direct to the wife of the maintenance out of the man's wages (if so ordered by the court)."

37,171. Do you think that the employers might resent that position of an order served upon them for payment?—I dare say some employers might object.

37,172. Do you think it might be disastrous to the husband if they did and they turned him out, so that there were no wages?—In some cases that might be so.

37,173. Do you think that is a counsel of perfection? —No. I think (a) would be a better plan. This was a final alternative.

37,174. That is only payment into court by him?—Yes.

37,175. Do you think calling on the employers is practicable and likely to result in getting the money? I will tell you why I ask. We were told by a gentleman from Scotland it was easy to evade it by moving from one place to another or cutting down wages?—Do you mean the employers would evade it?

37,176. No, the men would evade it?—That is what they do now practically, is it not?

37,177. Has your council seriously considered whether it would produce any practical good result to have this power?—I think they thought it would be better than nothing, supposing we could not get the other.

37,178. What is the other?—The first proposal was much better.

37,179. That can be carried out now without any alteration of the law, but it is not compulsory: it is the payment into court?——

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) Or through the court.

37,180. (Chairman.) It is the same thing. Have you communicated with any employers of labour about it?—I cannot say if the council have: I do not know.

"The council also desire to lay stress upon the need for an equal standard of morality for men and women in the eyes of the law. They do this as a body, having the interests of working women as their special concern, and desire to point out that unfaithfulness on the part of the husband does not only affect the wife, but presupposes the existence of women or girls who are obliged to live an immoral life, whether as professional prostitutes or in conjunction with otherwise respectable employment, as in cases repeatedly mentioned by witnesses already heard by the Commission where a domestic servant is the victim. The council continually have to fight against the existence of such evils and temptations in the path of working women, and believe that as long as the State refuses to set as high a standard of morality for husbands as for wives, it is impossible to remove the existing injustice and danger to other women. N.B.—Besides the specimen cases of separated wives appended herewith, the council have 33 cases, at present on the books of the Association of Trained Charwomen, nine of which have come to our office for the first time in the last two months. In hardly any of these cases does the wife receive any regular maintenance from the husband, but it is not clear in all instances whether she is only a deserted wife, or has obtained judicial separation."

37,181. Then you set out a number of cases to show what you have dealt with?—Yes. They are as follows:—

"Mrs. S., Hull, age 34, blacklead worker.—Obtained a separation order in 1905, after seven years of married life. She has three children, so the man was ordered to pay 12*s.* weekly. He left the town and did not pay the costs. Paid one 12*s.* after the order, and has not been heard of since; supposed to be in Canada."

"Mrs. G., Hull, age 37, parceller.—She obtained a separation order after two years of marriage, owing to husband's drunkenness and neglect. Had two children, both dead. She earns about 15*s.* a week. Husband still in the town, but she has only had a single payment of 2*s.* from him, though the magistrate ordered 8*s.* 6*d.* a week; has paid 5*s.* twice to get a warrant against him, and he has had two terms of imprisonment (one month and two months), which he did not mind at all."

"Mrs. G., Hull, age 26, parceller.—She obtained a separation order after 18 months' marriage. Magistrate ordered a payment of 8*s.* a week towards support of herself and one child, but it has never been paid. She has summoned him twice, and each time it has cost her 5*s.* 6*d.* and there has been no result. The boy is now of school age. She earns about 16*s.* a week."

"Mrs. G., Blackburn, age 48, weaver.—Husband all right early part of married life, then he took to drink and then to going with other women, hence two years ago the separation order. Magistrate ordered 5*s.* a week. This has now not been paid for 12 months. There are four children, each earning a little. Her own earnings are now very small, 3*s.* 9*d.*, 5*s.* last two weeks.

"Mrs. A., Blackburn, age about 25, ring spinner.—She works now to support home and children, and previously to keep idle husband as well. She earns 21*s.* 10*d.*, and has to pay 1*s.* 6*d.* for car fare. She has her mother and sister living with her, three children of her own and two others who are relations. Husband, who is a hawker, is ordered to pay 5*s.* a week towards the maintenance of the children."

"Mrs. G., Bolton, age 34, waste picker now, formerly cardroom tenter.—Husband drinks and will not support her and her children, he is not living with his wife now, and probably will not again. Practically all their married life she has been breadwinner. Eldest girl diminutive through his treatment of her mother; one or two of the children were actually born in the street because he turned her out; one child crippled from birth, died at 18 months because the man kicked his wife when pregnant; the work in warehouse is laborious and at her recent confinement she had to have instruments and chloroform, and the child's arm had to be broken to effect birth. Husband is a collier and earns good money, but has only been giving 5*s.* to 8*s.* for the support of the children weekly. A magistrate's order has been made for 16*s.* 6*d.*, but it is not enforced. Nothing at all was paid last week. He is to be prosecuted on Monday, as she says she has done with him now."

"Mrs. E., Oldham, age 38, tenter, cardroom.—Four children, ages 11 to 4 years. Mother's earnings average 20*s.* Husband is a confirmed drunkard; had D.T. six weeks after their marriage, the first hint she had that anything was wrong. She has left him several times because when away from her he works, but when at home he lets her do all the earning. For the last three years she has not lived with him; he gives her 4*s.* to 6*s.* a week for the children. When he came last Saturday, he was dead drunk, and she had a bad time getting rid of him. She has summoned him several times, but as she has to pay costs, she has not been much better off, and she dreads going again, so she accepts the small amount as being better than nothing. She thinks women would be in a poor plight if prevented from earning."

"Mrs. H., Bermondsey, age 32, jam factory.—Her parents were superior people, and she used to be a canvasser in jewellery, but cannot now afford money to take out a licence. Husband was fried fish salesman, earning good money, so she had no need to turn out. She now earns 10*s.* when on full time, but there is much slack time; 7*s.* 4*d.* this week. She has four children dependent on her. She does not know what her husband is earning nor what he is doing. The court has fixed 10*s.* a week as her allowance, but she very rarely got it; often she had only 1*s.* or 1*s.* 6*d.* from him. She has had a fifth child dependent on her, but the father kept him when she sent him (a boy of 10) to fetch her money, but she felt she had enough to do, so she made no fuss. An exceedingly pretty young woman, and very cheerful. When asked why she did not press for her allowance, she said her mother had married his father and she wanted no family rows. He was living with another woman, and has one child of 10 with him, whom he kept when sent to for her money. He earned very good money, and had taken to drink and gay company. Her pride was evidently hurt by the false statements he had made to the court, saying that he had left her on account of drink, and from appearance the woman was evidently truthful when she said she never had touched a drop even in her confinements."

"Mrs. S., Salford, age not stated, occupation not stated.—Has been married twice. Her second husband was earning 3*l.* a week then; as time went on he gave her less and less of his money, so that she was obliged to go to work herself. Eventually they decided to separate, and she has a maintenance grant of 8*s.* a week, but she does not often get the money, and as she can earn enough to keep herself (20*s.* weaver) she does not trouble to enforce it. The child of the second marriage has died, and there is one child (9) of the first marriage."

37,182. Will you tell me what is the extent of your council, and what does it represent in numbers?—I think there are about 150 members, and its principal objects are to collect statistics in reference to women's labour. This evidence has been forthcoming not specially for this Divorce Commission, but it came out in collecting evidence on women's work.

37,183. You do not go into any grounds except on the question of the equal standard of morality?—No.

37,184. That matter has not been considered?—No.

37,185. (Mr. Brierley.) Do you mean that no other grounds have been considered at all? Might I call attention to the first case you gave. Unless some alteration of the divorce law was made it is not apparent that the wife would obtain a divorce in that case. That is really a case of desertion; the husband has gone to Canada?—Yes.

37,186. Was it not considered?—The question of divorce in that case was not touched upon. It was the question of the man having disappeared without paying maintenance.

37,187. What was the remedy the council thought proper in that case? The idea of getting maintenance is hopeless?—That comes up where they recommend that the tracing of the man should be left to the court.

37,188. Whatever court you left it to I am afraid they would hardly trace him to Canada?

(Chairman.) Supposing they did?

37,189. (Mr. Brierley.) Nothing could be done to him. Do you mean extradition proceedings?—Yes.

37,190. I am afraid not?—That was the idea.

37,191. (Chairman.) That would be a decided case for divorce?—This inquiry was only as to maintenance orders.

37,192. (Mr. Brierley.) In that case they did not consider divorce or desertion?—No.

37,193. (Chairman.) Apparently your information was collected for another purpose?—Quite so.

37,194. How to get the money?—We only thought it more valuable because it was collected for another purpose.

(Chairman.) We thank you very much for your evidence.

Adjourned.

Winchester House, St. James's Square, London, S.W.

FORTY-SECOND DAY.

Tuesday, 15th November 1910.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HON. LORD GORELL (Chairman).

His Grace The LORD ARCHBISHOP OF YORK.
The LADY FRANCES BALFOUR.
The Right Hon. THOMAS BURT, M.P.
The Hon. LORD GUTHRIE.
Sir LEWIS DIBDIN, D.C.L.
Sir GEORGE WHITE, M.P.
His Honour JUDGE TINDAL ATKINSON.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.
EDGAR BRIERLEY, Esq.
J. A. SPENDER, Esq.
The Hon. HENRY GORELL BARNES (Secretary)

The Hon. HENRY GORELL BARNES re-called and further examined.

37,195. (Chairman.) I am asking you to go into the witness chair, first, because I want you to prove some documents and correspondence. I think you produce some returns received from His Majesty's Ambassadors at Vienna, Brussels, Copenhagen, Paris, Berlin, Athens, Rome, The Hague, Christiania, St. Petersburg, Madrid, Stockholm, Berne, and the United States of America?—I do.

37,196. We have had those returns put in piecemeal in the course of the Inquiry, but it has been thought desirable that they should be all put together so that it can be seen at a glance what the provisions of the foreign laws are?—That is so.

37,197. You originally got the information through the courtesy of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to whom you ventured to apply that inquiries should be addressed to His Majesty's representatives in certain foreign countries?—I have received the returns as the result of my application to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, with the exception of Portugal.*

37,198. Of all the countries referred to in your letter of application, with the exception of Portugal, you have them in?—Yes.

37,199. You are in communication with the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs with a view to obtaining the result of the inquiries from Portugal?—Yes.

37,200. You say in your memorandum that they have in most cases been produced to the Commissioners as they have arrived from time to time, and it was thought desirable that they should be presented in complete form?—Yes.

(The Chairman then read passages, giving the substance of the legal provisions in the foreign countries referred to, in the returns supplied to the Commission by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The returns will be found in full in Appendix XVI., page 128.)

37,201. (Chairman.) The next document you produce contains statistics showing the amount of space which has been devoted by various newspapers in this country to the subject of the reports of divorce and matrimonial cases. You have made a table with regard to this?—Yes. It is as follows:—

37,202. That table is from the commencement of sittings in January 1909 until the Whitsuntide Vacation in May 1910. These returns have been prepared by a research worker (whose employment was sanctioned by the Treasury), who was recommended to you by the Superintendent of the Reading Room of the British Museum?—Yes.

37,203. That has been work of heavy labour, and the results are in the table laid before the Commission?—Yes.

37,204. You have checked some of them to ascertain that they have been accurately prepared?—Yes.

37,205. Have you the books which this worker worked upon?—I have here the books. They are tablet diaries in which the various newspapers are entered day by day. From that I tabulated his daily returns, and then made out the gross totals. Any of the Commissioners can go through them themselves if they desire.

37,206. The first total is for 1909, and the second total is for two sittings in 1910 which have already expired, that is to say, the Hilary sittings and Easter sittings, not Trinity sittings?—No. I took it up to the Whitsuntide Vacation.

37,207. The total for the 18 months is given at the bottom of the column?—Yes.

37,208. I believe your instructions were that in estimating ¼, ½ and ¾, liberal estimates should be taken, that is to say, under-estimates rather than over-estimates, and so far as you can ascertain, this has been carried out?—Yes.

37,209. That will speak for itself. With regard to the representatives of the newspaper proprietors, have you communicated with the leading societies or associations with a view to giving evidence?—Yes.

37,210. What are those societies?—The Newspaper Society, The Newspaper Proprietors Association, Limited, The Federation of Southern Newspaper Owners, The Federation of Northern Newspaper Owners, and The Institute of Journalists.

37,211. I think you have the correspondence there which it is nscessary to refer to because it partly includes resolutions. Have you any witnesses from those bodies?—I will deal with that as I come to it, if I may, my Lord.

37,212. Take them in your own order. I want to get the resolutions?—As to communications with the Newspaper Society, I communicated with them formally. I sent a formal letter to all the societies on the 8th December) and in reply received a letter on the 21st December, in which, after acknowledging receipt of my letter, the Secretary, on behalf of the Society, states: "Whilst entirely sympathising with a movement having "for its aim the suppression of improper reports, my "Committee find themselves powerless to formulate "any scheme of reform likely to meet with the general "approval of those they represent. The Newspaper "Society consists of a large number of daily and "and weekly newspapers, necessarily holding a "diversity of views upon any controversial question, "and the executive body are thus prevented from "acting in this instance on behalf of their constituents "as a whole. If, however, the evidence of some "leading journalists, speaking for themselves individu-"ally, would be of any assistance, my Committee "would have much pleasure in suggesting a few names "so selected as to include the various opinions likely "to prevail upon this important subject." As a result of that I wrote on the 22nd December acknowledging the receipt of his letter, and stating that "I should be "glad to avail myself of your suggestion that you "would, if I so desire, send me the names of some "leading journalists, who would speak for themselves "individually." As a result of that I received a letter dated the 4th February containing the names of various persons, with whom I communicated, and some of them will be present before you. The other names in the letter—I do not know whether your Lordship would like me to give you the names of those suggested by the Newspaper Society?

37,213. You said some of them were coming here?—Yes.

37,214. The names do not matter. We shall see some of them. You communicated with the others, and they did not feel in a position to come. Is that so?—Yes.

37,215. Then you received a letter on the 9th May?—Yes, I received a letter on the 9th May from the Secretary of the Newspaper Society: "I have been "instructed by the President of the Newspaper Society "to forward to you, as Chairman of the Royal Com-"mission, on Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, the "following resolution, which was passed at the Annual "Meeting of the Society held in London on Wednes-"day last."

The resolution is as follows: "That this meeting, "while strongly in favour of a more stringent adminis-"tration, and, if necessary, of the strengthening of the "law against the publication of obscene matter, is "opposed to any restriction of the existing right of "reporting judicial proceedings of any kind." As a result of the receipt of that letter I wrote inquiring on the 10th May as follows: "From the fact that "such a resolution has been passed by your Society "it would appear that the Society is now in a "position to submit a definite proposal on behalf "of its members as a whole." (In the first letter they stated that they did not feel that they could do so.) "I should be glad to know whether your "Society desire that the President, or some other "person, should attend before the Commission on "its behalf. I think it would be very desirable that "someone on behalf of the Society should do so, "as very probably the Commissioners will desire "to ask questions with reference to the views of "your Society as expressed in the said resolution." Then I pointed out that there would be a very large number of witnesses, and that that would enable the Society to have an opportunity of considering the evidence which had already been given, and, if they so desired, they would be able to express any additional views on that evidence. In reply I received a letter on the 30th May.

37,216. There is a letter of the 11th May mentioned in your proof?—That is merely an acknowledgment saying it would be placed before the Council of the Society. On the 30th May I received a letter: "Dear Sir,—Your letter of May 10th, has been reported "to and considered by the Council of the Newspaper "Society, who note your suggestion that the President "or some other representative of this organisation "should attend before the Commission to give evidence "in regard to the reporting of divorce cases. My "Council desire me to point out that in the letter "which I addressed to you on December 21st they "explained that the diverse constitution of the Society "made it impossible for the Executive to speak on "on behalf of members as a whole; and the terms of "resolution which I have had the honour of forward-"ing to you are so explicit that, in the opinion of my "Council, no useful purpose would be served by the "adoption of the course which you suggest." That closes the correspondence with the Newspaper Society.

37,217. Are the names you have mentioned individual and not representative?—They are individual and not representative.

37,218. The next one is the Newspaper Proprietors' Association?—In reply to my formal letter I received on the 21st February a letter from the Secretary: "Sir,—I am instructed by the Council of this Associa-"tion to forward the enclosed statement, which "embodies the views of the whole of the members "on the question under investigation by the Royal "Commission."

This is the statement: "The Council of the News-"paper Proprietors' Association, which represents "the newspapers the names of which are stated "below,* are strongly of opinion that it is undesirable "in the interest of public morality that any change "should take place in the law regarding the re-"porting of cases in the Divorce Court. Attempts "are continually being made by the parties to such "cases to prevail upon newspaper proprietors to "refrain from reporting them; proposals are fre-"quently made to newspaper reporters in order to "secure their aid in keeping cases out of the Press, "and the Council are satisfied that publicity is a great "deterrent. In most instances the parties have not "so much objection to the publication of their names "as to the publication of the circumstances affecting "their misconduct. Numerous instances could be "furnished (in confidence), if desired, in proof of "these statements. Only those who are acquainted "with the inner working of the office of a morning, "evening, or weekly newspaper can appreciate the "great anxiety which is felt by the parties to divorce "proceedings to prevent the publication of reports in "the Press, and the great efforts which are made with "that object. This is particularly observable in the "provinces. The attention of the Commission is "directed to the following remarks in the issue of the "New York 'Editor and Publisher,' dated 13th No-"vember 1509, with which the Council of the News-"paper Proprietors' Association entirely concur!—

"Publicity of Testimony in Divorce Trials!

"New York newspapers this week have drawn the "attention of the public to the fact that wealthy men "and women in the metropolis seem to be able to get "divorces quickly and comfortably by a process of "secret court hearings and a sealing of the papers in the "case—all except the decree. The newspapers are "allowed to print the decree, but never a word about "the cause of the divorce. Ex-Justice Roger A. "Pryor, speaking about this matter to a reporter for "the 'New York Times' this week, related some "pertinent things which ought to be of interest in "every city of the country. He said:—'I am not "'opposed to divorce on the one ground on which it is "'obtainable in this State, but I am opposed to the "'granting of divorce in the numerous cases where

* These are the names of the newspapers: "Daily Chronicle," "Daily Express," "Daily Graphic," "Daily Mail," "Daily Mirror," "Daily News," "Daily Telegraph," "Evening News," "Evening Standard and St. James's Gazette," "Financial News," "Financial Times," "Lloyd's Weekly News," "Morning Advertiser," "Morning Leader," "Morning Post," "News of the World," "Sporting Life," "Standard," "Star," and "Weekly Dispatch."

" ' the parties to the suit are getting it solely to be " ' able to marry again as soon as free, and where the " ' opposing lawyers are in collusion to get the decree,
" ' the defence being nothing more than a farce, so " ' that the testimony may be heard in secret instead
" ' of in open court. I headed-off one such case not " ' long ago and drove it out of New York and out of " ' America. A rich woman wanted a divorce, so she " ' could marry an opera singer. The husband was " ' willing enough, but neither wanted the publicity,
" ' so his lawyer trumped up a defence and the Court
" ' appointed me referee. I was to hear the testimony
" ' in my office, and when the lawyers and the " ' witnesses, including the infatuated woman, as" ' sembled in my office on the day set there were " ' several reporters present. It was amusing to see
" ' the opposing lawyers acting together at every step,
" ' shaking their heads, and putting them together in " ' consultation. I knew what the trouble was, but " ' presently one of the lawyers said: ' Your Honour,
" ' there are reporters present. We would request
" ' you to have them excluded from the hearing.'
" ' Not so,' said I. ' I am sitting as a Court, and I " ' am going to hold open Court.' Immediately the " ' lawyers' heads went together again, and a few " ' moments later, when the woman had been
" ' questioned as to the date of her marriage, counsel
" ' asked for an adjournment. That was the last of " ' that case in this country. The suit, I believe, was " ' later renewed in Europe. But that divorce would " ' have been added to the records of this city if I " ' had not insisted on publicity. Modern clergymen
" ' and practical statesmen now agree in making the " ' public a material third party in every divorce.
" ' If a man or woman have much wealth and " ' respectability, he or she inheres to leadership in " ' the community. Therefore the public is vitally
" ' concerned in the divorce of such a man or woman.
" ' Very few orderly citizens deny this proposition.' "

" The reports of divorce cases are not calculated " to incite persons to wrongdoing, as the proceedings
" of the Divorce Court usually show that the way of " the transgressor is hard, and that the guilty party
" is usually very miserable. The Council desire to " point out that the law relating to the publication of " obscene matter is well defined and quite adequate for " the protection of the public. They also submit that " there is no reason for stating that the law is not
" observed in relation to the publication of Divorce
" Court proceedings. The Council desire to conclude " their statement by directing the attention of the " Commissioners to the following schedule, which is " taken from the Statistical Summary published by " the Census Office of the United States Government.
" From this it appears that there are fewer divorces
" in the United Kingdom than in almost any other " country, and although the grounds upon which
" divorces are granted in England are more restricted
" than is generally the case elsewhere, the conclusion
" to be drawn from the figures is that publicity does
" not increase the number of divorces." Then there is an extract from the Special Reports, which book has been placed before your Lordship. I do not know that I need specifically deal with those. That is the conclusion of that statement. Upon its receipt, I wrote a letter dated the 22nd February, in which I stated: " I should be glad to know whether your Asso" ciation desire that you or some other person
" should attend before the Commission. I think it " would probably be desirable that someone on " behalf of the Association should so attend,
" as no doubt the Commissioners will probably desire
" to ask some questions with reference to the state" ment, even if the representative of the Association
" has nothing which he desires to bring to the " attention of the Commissioners in addition to the " facts and opinions contained in the said statement."
In reply I received a letter of the 24th February, stating: " Your letter of the 22nd instant shall be laid " before the next meeting of our Council, but it was
" the intention of the Council at the time they drew " up the statement forwarded to you, not to submit
" any oral evidence." On the 2nd March I received this letter: " I brought your letter of the 22nd ultimo
" before the Council at their meeting yesterday, and,
" in reply, was instructed to inform you that they did " not propose to accept your invitation to offer any
" oral evidence." Then, as a result of correspondence with certain Sunday newspapers to which I will refer hereafter, I wrote a letter dated the 5th May in which I stated: " I have recently been in communication " with various Sunday papers in order to ascertain " whether the editors desire to give evidence on " behalf of their papers before this Commission, with " reference to the suggestion which has been made " during the course of this Inquiry by some of the " witnesses, that the reports on Divorce and Matri-
" monial Causes are given in greater detail than is " either necessary or desirable in Sunday papers.
" Certain of these papers replied to my letter that " most probably your Association would select
" delegates to offer evidence; that such delegates
" will represent them, and that they do not propose " to offer additional evidence. I shall be glad,
" therefore, to know whether your Association now
" propose to adopt the suggestion contained in my " letter of the 22nd February above referred to, that
" you, or some person or persons should attend before
" the Commission on behalf of the Association." I received in reply to that a letter of the 7th May: " I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the " 5th instant, which shall be laid before the next " meeting of the Council, the date of which has not " yet been fixed." I have received no further communication with regard thereto.

With regard to the Federation of Southern Newspaper Owners, in reply to my formal letter inviting them, I received a letter dated the 14th January: " Your letter to Mr. Parke of the 8th ultimo having " come under my notice as Assistant Secretary of the " Newspaper Proprietors' Association, I have men-
" tioned the matter at a meeting of this Federation,
" as I gathered from your letter that the views of " any representative body of newspaper proprietors
" on the subject would be acceptable to the Com" missioners. Consequently I am instructed to convey " to you the following resolution passed by the " Federation of Southern Newspaper Owners."

The resolution is in these terms: " Seeing that the " fear of publicity is a great deterrent to offenders,
" and bearing in mind that it is the general practice
" of all important provincial newspapers to suppress " undesirable evidence, the Federation of Southern " Newspaper Owners deems it unnecessary that any " alteration should be made in the existing law dealing " with the reporting of Divorce and Matrimonial
" Causes." In reply to that I wrote a letter of the 17th February asking whether the Federation desired to send a representative to deal with the point before the Commissioners, and that was acknowledged, but nothing further transpired, so on the 11th May I wrote substantially the letter which I had written to the Newspaper Association: I do not think I need take up the time of the Commission by reading it all. Substantially it was in the terms written to the Newspaper Proprietors' Association, asking whether they would send somebody to deal with the matter orally before this Commission, and pointing out the Commissioners might desire to ask questions connected with their resolution. I have received a letter of the 17th May stating that the matter will be laid before the Council at their next meeting. That terminates that correspondence: I have received no further communication with regard thereto.

With regard to the Federation of Northern Newspaper Owners, in reply to my formal letter I received this: " I am instructed to suggest respectfully to " the Commission that the Federation of Northern " Newspaper Owners, representing as it does very
" many of the chief newspapers in the Provinces,
" should have an opportunity of considering any
" policy which the Commission may have before
" them and of giving evidence thereon," and a list of the newspapers was appended. In reply to that I stated: " Dear Sir,—In reply to your letter of " yesterday's date, this Commission will certainly desire " to hear evidence from your Federation, and I should " be obliged if you will send me the name or names of " the person or persons selected to give evidence on " its behalf, together with a proof or proofs of the " evidence to be given." In reply to that I received this letter: "With reference to your letter of January " 28th re evidence to be offered by this Federation, I " have to inform you that at a general meeting of the " members held yesterday the following resolution was " passed."

The resolution is in these terms: "That this " Federation is against the use of the Divorce Court " for the provision of items of news for sensational " purposes, but that as many members of the " Federation are giving evidence in their individual " capacity as Newspaper Proprietors, the Federation, " as a body, does not propose to offer any evidence." The letter concludes, "Although not offering evidence, " the Federation are desirous of placing upon record " this expression of opinion." In reply to that I wrote: " I note that therein it is stated that, as many mem- " bers of the Federation are giving evidence in their " individual capacity as Newspaper Proprietors, the " Federation, as a body, does not propose to offer any " evidence. As at present advised, although I have " received names of various Newspaper Proprietors, I " am unaware that such have been put forward on " behalf of the said Federation." I subsequently received a letter giving the names of some of those who had been given by the Newspaper Society, and as a result of that you will have before you, I think to-day, Mr. Moberley Bell, Mr. Jeans, Mr. Russell Allen and Mr. Smith; but, as I understand, they attend in their individual capacity, and not as representing the Northern Newspaper Proprietors. Then I wrote a letter dated April 12th: "The Commission will no " doubt hear the evidence of those gentlemen in due " course in their individual capacity, as suggested in " your letter under reply. I take it, therefore, that " what you desire is that the resolution forwarded " previously should be put in on behalf of the Federa- " tion, and that no oral evidence shall be given as and " from the Federation in respect thereof," and I have received no further communication from that Federation.

With regard to the Institute of Journalists, I received in reply to my letter a letter dated the 13th December, which was merely acknowledging my formal letter, and on the 8th February 1910, I received this letter: "With further reference to " your letter of the 8th December, inquiring as to " whether the Institute would feel disposed to take " into consideration the question of the publica- " tion of reports of Divorce and Matrimonial Causes " and to depute a member to give evidence thereon " before the Royal Commission; the letter has been " considered by the Council of the Institute, with the " assistance of a Special Committee; and I am directed " to reply that the Council is unable to appoint any " witness to give evidence on behalf of the Institute, " but that inquiries have been made to ascertain if any " member of the Council wishes to give evidence on " the subject." On the 5th May I wrote a letter: " With further reference to my letter of December 8th, " in your reply thereto of February 8th you state that " you are directed to reply to that letter that your " Council is unable to appoint any witnesses to give " evidence on behalf of the Institute, but that inquiries " have been made to ascertain if any members of the " Council wish to give evidence on the subject. Perhaps " you would be good enough to inform me as to the " result of those inquiries, as in the event of any mem- " ber of the Council wishing to give evidence I should " desire to communicate with him with regard thereto." That terminates that correspondence. One of the names mentioned in the Newspaper Society's letter, above referred to, in which it was suggested that I should communicate with the various people, was that of Mr. Brewster, Manager of the Irish Independent Newspapers, Limited, to whom I wrote in consequence and from whom I received the following reply:— " Your favour of 14th instant came duly to hand, and " I have to apologise for delay in replying to same. " In my capacity as Manager of the 'Irish Independent' " and other papers published by my Company, I do not " think I could give any evidence that would be of " much assistance to the Commission. I am also, how- " ever, the Honorary Secretary of the Irish Newspaper " Society, an Association of Proprietors that includes " all the daily newspapers published in Ireland, and " the Society had the subject of the publication of " divorce reports before it at a general meeting held " in Cork last August. It arose through a memorial " presented to the Society by a number of religious " and temperance organisations of the City of Cork " —I may say the memorial was sent as an enclosure— " praying 'that the publication of proceedings in " 'Divorce Courts should be very much restricted,' " and after careful consideration, a reply was sent to " the memorialists that in the opinion of the Society " it is 'necessary not only that such cases should be " 'tried in public, but also that suitable reports should " 'appear in the Press.' As this correspondence repre- " sents, I believe, the general views of the Irish Press, " it may be of interest to the Commission, and I enclose " a copy of same herewith for their information." I have a copy of the memorial; I do not know whether you would like me to read it?

37,219. Will you read the substance of it?—It is signed by The Cork Women's Aid Association, the Cork Women's Christian Temperance Association, and other bodies of a similar character. It says: "It " seems to your memorialists that, whilst it may be " in the interests of justice that such cases should be " tried in public, yet we respectfully say that the ends " of justice do not require the publication of objection- " able details which are bound to have a disastrous " effect on the morals of the community, as the daily " newspapers find their way into tens of thousands of " homes in the United Kingdom. Your memorialists, " therefore, pray that the responsible representatives " of your Society be convened to consider this im- " portant matter with the view of taking such action " as would meet the desired end." The copy of the letter sent by the Irish Newspaper Society to those memorialists is as follows: "In reference to " your letter of 28th June last, enclosing a memorial " signed on behalf of a number of religious and tem- " perance societies of Cork, re the publication of " Divorce Court proceedings, I wish to inform you " that, in addition to supplying our members—includ- " ing all the daily papers published in Ireland—with a " copy of the memorial, I also brought it before the " half-yearly general meeting of our Society held in " Cork on Wednesday last, and I am requested to say " in reply that we believe it to be necessary, not only " that such cases should be tried in public, but also " that suitable reports should appear in the Press. At " the same time we fully sympathise with the desire of " your memorialists that objectionable details should not " be included in such reports, and we believe the same " may be said on behalf of the editors and conductors " of every respectable organ of public opinion in Great " Britain and Ireland, to whose grave sense of public re- " sponsibility we feel that the prayer of your memorialists " may now safely be left." Then I communicated to ascertain whether Mr. Brewster would attend before the Commission on behalf of the Irish Newspaper Society, and in reply to my letter, I received a letter stating: "Our annual meeting will take place on the " 12th inst. in Dublin, and if that is not too late, I am " willing to submit the matter then to the members." Having done so, Mr. Brewster states: "In reply to " your favour of 5th inst., I brought the matter before " our annual meeting, and it was felt that the com- " munications I had already made to you fully met the " case so far as we are concerned."

37,220. That letter of the 21st March is the last letter, and that closes that correspondence?—Yes.

37,221. Then you communicated with some others?—Yes. Owing to the statements which had been made in evidence, I communicated with certain Sunday papers, namely, "Lloyd's Weekly News," "The People," "The Weekly Despatch," "News of the World," Limited, The Umpire Publishing Company, Limited, and the "Sunday Chronicle."

From "Lloyd's Weekly News" I received a letter on the 24th March, in which the managing editor acknowledged the receipt of my letter, and stated he would be pleased to give evidence before the Commission and would prepare a précis. Subsequently, on the 19th April, I received a letter: "With reference to your letter of "the 15th, I find that the proprietors of the Sunday "newspapers have called a meeting to discuss the "subject of offering evidence on Friday next, and I will "communicate with you after I have attended that "meeting." On the 26th April he wrote this letter: "Dear Sir,—I attended a meeting of the proprietors of "London Sunday newspapers, to which I referred in "my last letter. It was decided that the memorandum "submitted to the Royal Commission on Divorce on "behalf of the Newspaper Proprietors' Association, "and signed by this journal among others, would not "be supplemented by the evidence of witnesses from "individual newspapers. In the matter of reporting "divorce proceedings, 'Lloyd's News' confines its "accounts to the barest outlines, omitting most of the "cross-examination of witnesses and all questionable "references. As a result, its reports—as a comparison "of different journals will show—are briefer than the "reports in any daily or evening newspapers. I enclose "a cutting from the 'Sunday School Chronicle,'" and he states they know nothing about the authorship of that article. I do not think I need read the article. Then, with regard to "The People," after receiving an acknowledgment of my letter, I received a letter on the 28th April from the managing proprietor: "Dear Sir,— "In further reply to your letters, the newspapers comprising the Newspaper Proprietors' Association "have decided to confine their evidence to the written "statement which has been forwarded to you by the "Secretary, and I am therefore unable to accept your "invitation, but in doing so have to state that in so "far as concerns the 'People,' there is no ground "whatever for the suggestion that divorce case are "reported in more detail in that journal than they are "in most of the London and provincial daily and "evening newspapers; our reports are supplied by the "same agencies, and are, in fact, abbreviated, although, "as we publish in our issue the whole of the week's "proceedings, our report of a particular case may to a "casual observer appear fuller and more detailed than "the reports published in the daily and evening "newspapers."

37,222. Where is the statement?—That is the one I have previously put in from the Newspaper Proprietors' Association.

Then from the "Weekly Despatch" I have a letter dated 20th April, in which the Editor states: "I intend during the next few days to read through "the evidence already given before the Commission "and consider whether I have any evidence to offer." On the 29th he writes: "In further reply to your "letters, the Newspaper Proprietors' Association, of "which the proprietors of the 'Weekly Despatch' are "members, have decided to confine their evidence "to the written statement which has been forwarded "to you by the Secretary, and I am therefore "unable to accept your information, but in doing so "have to state that in so far as concerns the 'Weekly "Despatch' there is no ground whatever for the "suggestion that divorce cases are reported in more "detail in that journal than they are in most of the "London and Provincial daily and evening papers: "our reports are supplied by the same agencies, and "are in fact abbreviated, although as we publish in our "issue the whole of the week's proceedings, our report "of a particular case may to a casual observer appear "fuller and more detailed than the reports published "in the daily and evening papers."

37,223. That seems to be a similar letter?—Yes. With regard to the correspondece with "The News of the World," my letter was acknowledged on the 14th April, and on the 26th April I received this letter: "In further reply to your letter of the 22nd inst., the "Newspaper Proprietors' Association"—that letter also is in substantially the same terms as the two other letters I have read. It is in exactly the same terms mutatis mutandis except there is a paragraph at the end: "The Biddulph suit which is now before the "Courts is a case in point. The morning and evening "papers have been giving from one to two columns per "day of this case, making about eight columns for the "week. Our report occupies less than half of this "space."

37,224. The other part of that letter is the same as the previous letters?—Yes.

Then with regard to the Umpire Publishing Company, Limited, I received this letter: "In reply to "yours of the 15th inst., we have received your "communication of the 22nd March respecting the "giving of evidence before the Royal Commission on "Divorce and Matrimonial Causes. Most probably "the Newspaper Proprietors' Association will select "delegates to offer evidence. In that case such "delegates would represent us. We would not propose to offer additional evidence." It was as a result of the statement in that letter, and of one from the "Sunday Chronicle"—which I shall come to shortly—that I communicated with the Newspaper Proprietors' Association in the letter which I have previously read to your Lordship. In reply to that letter I stated I proposed to write to the Association to ascertain whether they did intend to select delegates as as they had previously stated that they did not propose to do so. I received from the Umpire Publishing Company a letter of the 9th May: "In reply to your "letter of the 5th inst., perhaps we were in error in "saying that delegates from the Newspaper Proprietors' "Association would appear to offer evidence. We "should have said that it was proposed that a memorandum of their opinion be forwarded to you. We "think so far as we are informed that is the position. "If so, the memorandum so presented would represent "our views."

I do not think it is necessary for me to detail the correspondence with that paper, "The Sunday Chronicle," which is in exactly the same form.

37,225. The result is that you have certain witnesses, and that is all you can get?—Yes, my Lord.

37,226. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) In connection with this tabulated statement, would it not be fair to take into consideration that many of the newspapers give a greater number of columns than others to the general law reports?—I think that is so.

37,227. Take, for instance, the "Times" law reports: they give a considerable number every day of the general law reports?—Yes.

37,228. And also the "Daily Telegraph." They give a column to the County Courts as well as the High Court proceedings?—That is so.

37,229. Some of the other newspapers do not pay so much attention to the legal questions going on every day?—Yes, but, as you will appreciate, the only criterion one can take is the column.

37,230. I am not complaining that it is not proper to take it.

37,231. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) This is the question I wanted to put. I do not understand what is the unit of comparison. Take the first page: you say there are $82\frac{3}{4}$ something in the "Times" and $44\frac{1}{4}$ something in the "Daily News": are those columns?—Yes.

37,232. Of the respective papers?—Yes.

37,233. So that where the column differs in size the amount of space will differ?—Clearly.

37,234. (Chairman.) This is all based on columns?—On a column of the individual paper.

37,235. (Lord Guthrie.) Can you explain the discrepancy between the Hilary Sittings in 1909 and the Hiliary Sittings in 1910?—I think I can. Your Lordship may recollect that you were trying a case called the Stirling case, and that is what undoubtedly makes the difference. Perhaps it would interest your Lordship on that point if I pointed out the daily details or the monthly details on that. The monthly details for January of that Hilary Sittings of 1909 are: "The Times" $13\frac{1}{2}$ columns, the "Daily Telegraph" $38\frac{3}{4}$, "The Standard" $26\frac{3}{4}$. I could give you all the papers for that if you would like to have them.

37,236. Are you giving the details of the Sterling case?—No. I can give the details of the months.

37,237. If you compare the "Daily Telegraph" Hilary Sittings, it is 76¾ in 1909 and in 1910 only 16¾?—Yes.

37,238. Is the difference to be accounted for by the Stirling case having occurred in the first Sittings and nothing similar in the second?—I think so quite clearly, because, for instance, the Stirling case started on or about Tuesday the 19th. There were parapraphs which appeared then and it is clearly traceable, On Thursday the 22nd January you get in the "Daily Telegraph" 3¾ columns, Friday 4½, Saturday 5¾, Monday 4¼, Tuesday, 2¾, Wednesday 2¼, and so on down through that period; whereas I could give your Lordship the daily details for the next year of the same time: Thursday the 20th, ½: Friday 21st, ½: Saturday 22nd, ¼: Tuesday 25th, 1¼. That is the way the figures compare for the two years.

37,239. It is the same thing with the Sunday papers. Take the "Umpire." Do you find in the Hilary Sittings of 1909, 81¼, whereas in the Hilary Sittings of 1910 it is 38¾ only. Does the same explanation account for that?—Yes. I could give the details.

37,240. That is quite enough.

37,241. (The Archbishop of York.) To be clear in my own mind as to the facts you put before us, I gather you communicated with five general associations of newspaper proprietors, and that they have in all cases contented themselves with a memorandum, but have not desired anyone to give evidence on their behalf?—That is so.

37,242. You have communicated with the editors of six leading Sunday papers, and in no case are they willing to give evidence before us?—I am not quite sure I should accept the word "leading." It was the six which I apprehend one would indicate as most particularly dealt with by witnesses, for instance, like the Chief Constables' Association.

37,243. In no case are they willing to give evidence?—That is so.

37,244. (Sir George White.) Judge Tindal Atkinson put a question to you as to whether the difference between some of these papers was not to be accounted for by the fact that one made longer law reports than others. Is that quite so? Would you say that is the difference between the "Morning Post" and the "Times," for instance?—I do not know that I am in a position to say how much space the "Morning Post" devotes regularly to law reports. All I can say is that in answer to the question there are regular extensive law reports in the "Times." I have not specifically looked at the "Morning Post" apropos of that.

37,245. You would not suggest that is the difference between the Sunday papers, the "Umpire" and the "Sunday Chronicle"?—No. The difference between the Sunday papers and those who have specific columns for law reports—for instance, the "Times" and the "Daily Telegraph," which devote special colums to law reports—is this, that in the Sunday papers you will find the reports scattered all over the paper. It is difficult to check them.

37,246. As a rule the Sunday papers do not take the ordinary law reports, such as the "Times" reports at length?—I do not think so. I can produce a copy of the Sunday papers. We have them if you would like to see them.

37,247. (Mr. Spender.) These various associations do not profess to bind their members or to speak for them in these various communications they have made?—I think the resolutions are on behalf of the societies.

37,248. Is it suggested in any of the correspondence—I did not hear the whole of it—that they were unable to offer evidence in consequence of the diversity of views of their members?—That was so in the case of the Newspaper Society, but they did ultimately pass a resolution. They previously wrote saying they could not give collective evidence. I did read this:—"My "Committee find themselves powerless to formulate "any scheme," but they sent a resolution.

37,249. There is no phrase used in that correspondence which is incompatible with the complete liberty of the individual members of these associations to express opinions for themselves. That is the only point I wish to bring out?—The Newspaper Society's resolution was passed at the annual meeting of the Society. I do not think it would restrict any member from giving his opinion, but those are the views which the Society takes and adopts by its resolution.

37,250. These figures are strictly confined to divorce reports?—Divorce and matrimonial causes.

37,251. What does that include?—I would not like to say absolutely definitely, but so far as I can ascertain it does not include Separation Order cases even. It is confined to divorce. I do not say one or two cases have not got in. It is very difficult to check them in the Sunday newspapers. It is confined solely to divorce and matrimonial causes in the Hight Court itself.

37,252. It does not contain any summary of the numerous other reports which may raise the sexual issue in a different way?—No, it is confined to the Division. It has some Scotch and Irish cases. It practically includes all the reports of any Divorce Court in the British Isles.

37,253. Scotch and Irish matrimonial cases?—Yes.

37,254. (Chairman.) I believe your instructions to the gentleman nominated——?—He was not nominated; he was recommended.

37,255. ——were that he was to take only divorce and matrimonial cases?—Yes.

37,256. Whether they appeared in England, Scotland or Ireland, provided they appeared in these papers?—Yes.

37,257. The great bulk of the cases are English?—Yes. I could indicate on the returns where the Scotch and Irish are included quite easily.

37,258. (Chairman.) I do not think that is necessary; the point is publication. I should like you to put in the letters you have read, because your evidence on that matter is really contained in that correspondence.

Mr. Alexander Grigor Jeans called and examined.

37,259. (Chairman.) Will you tell us your connection with the press?—I am managing director of the "Liverpool Daily Post" and "Liverpool Mercury," which is one journal now, of the "Liverpool Echo," the "Liverpool Weekly Post," and the "Liverpool Weekly Mercury."

37,260. That is rather an extensive undertaking?—Yes, I have been so for over 30 years.

37,261. Always at Liverpool?—Yes.

37,262. You confine yourself to the question of reporting the details of divorce cases?—Yes.

37,263. That is a question which has occupied the attention of newspaper proprietors, especially in recent years?—For many years now.

37,264. Would you kindly read your proof?—"Though I believe that on the whole the reports have been given as inoffensively as possible by the more reputable journals, there is nevertheless a class of paper—chiefly, I think, the London weekly penny papers which have mainly a working-class circulation—which gives great prominence and pretty full details of such reports. The opinion very generally prevails that it is greatly to the advantage of newspapers in so far as circulation is concerned. I have been over 40 years connected with journalism, and for over 30 years have been responsible for a morning and evening and a weekly newspaper—all with very large circulations—and I say unhesitatiugly that so far as circulation is concerned none of these papers has ever derived any increase of circulation from the reporting in detail of such cases. There are only two cases in which, to my knowledge, the circulation of the newspapers (of course, I am speaking of the daily Press and of the better class of papers in this respect) has been influenced by such reports. One was the Dilke case, and the other the Parnell case, and even in these cases it was the prominent character of those concerned in the cases that led the public to take such an interest in them. I am very strongly of opinion that it would be to the advantage of newspapers if no details were given in the reports of such cases."

37,265. Will you explain the reason of that?—We hardly ever publish a report of a divorce case without receiving complaints from heads of families or ladies who say they cannot admit the newspapers to their drawing-room.

37,266. Do you mean it would be to the advantage of a good class paper?—Quite so.

37,267. If they are not required by competition to put it in?—Yes.

37,268. Then they would rely on no objection being taken to the paper?—Yes.

37,269. Have you received objections frequently?—Very frequently, almost in every case, certainly in every notorious case we have.

37,270. Against their being circulated so as to be found amongst the young people?—Quite so.

37,271. Why do you feel you could not leave it all out?—One paper cannot do it without another paper doing it. I mean to say this: if we were to reduce our reports to results or a brief report, there is no doubt there are a great many readers who would like to see the details, and would go to other newspapers, and we feel we cannot allow readers to be taken away in that way. It is simply a question of competition in these matters.

37,272. So that everybody must be on the same footing?—That is what I contend.

37,273. As far as the public are concerned, do you regard it as a mischief?—I think it is a mischief, certainly.

37,274. For the reasons you have indicated?—Yes. "I know that a very strong feeling exists, however, in newspaper men with very high ideals, that the publication of the full reports is the most serious punishment to the offenders; that is, it is the publicity they fear more than the publication of the result. Probably the publication of the bare names and addresses would not be quite sufficient, and I suggest that an alternative course would be not to permit newspapers to give the evidence in such cases, but simply the summing-up or judgment of the presiding judge, who would be aware that his remarks would be the only account of the case which would be published in the Press. This would at all events avoid the repetition of objectionable details, of which the judge would not give more than is necessary for the due consideration and explanation of the case, and would ensure quite as much publicity as is necessary to act as a deterrent."

37,275. Is it your view that this notion of a deterrent acts to prevent the commission of a wrongful act or the bringing of the case into court?—I think it does both. A great many people fear the publicity quite as much as the decision of the Court.

37,276. Is it the publicity they fear after the event?—After the event. "I know there are several of the better class papers—morning and evening—who would welcome a change of this kind, because at present they receive a good many complaints that unnecessary details are reported. At present individual newspapers do not feel themselves strong enough to pursue the ideal policy I have outlined, because though they do not gain directly by the reports, there are a good many cases which individuals are anxious to see for local and other reasons, and if one paper in a town omitted the reports its readers would probably be driven, for a time at least, to those rival journals who have no such scruples. I have said that although in my experience none of the more reputable journals gain by publishing details, it must nevertheless be admitted that those papers which habitually publish full details and have a reputation for so doing gain circulation chiefly amongst the working classes, but probably at the expense of the same type of journals which do not make a feature of such cases."

37,277. There is one thing I was very much struck by when I read your proof. Have you had an opportunity of looking at a very good article on this subject which appeared in the "Morning Post" in September last?—I am sorry to say I have not.

37,278. May I ask if you would agree with one or two of the passages? It is in the "Morning Post" of September 29th, 1910. It says this: "The right to "publish divorce proceedings in detail is being seriously "challenged, and when the Royal Commission on the "Marriage Laws re-assembles that right must be one "of the important points on which further evidence is "taken. The question will become even more acute "than it is at present if, as the result of the Com-"mission, any attempt is made to facilitate divorce, "whether by increasing the grounds that are accepted "as valid or by cheapening the proceedings and "giving jurisdiction to the inferior courts. However "distasteful such extended facilities may be, no one "can ignore the possibility that they may be granted, "and therefore every safeguard against a consequent "lowering of moral standards must be thought out in "advance. The publication of divorce cases has "hitherto been defended on two grounds: that the "shame of publicity is a part of the just penalty of "divorce, and further, that the right to report the pro-"ceedings in all law courts is a most important part of "the liberty of the Press on which the effective preser-"vation of individual liberties depends. No one "contends that detailed accounts of all the sordid facts "which come to light are in the least necessary to secure "either of these advantages; but it is in practice so "difficult to lay down any precise rule as to what "ought and ought not to be reported, or to impose "any restriction which is not in fact a censorship, that "the decision has been left to the editors of news-"papers. Until recently the duty thus entrusted "could be worthily fulfilled." It goes on to say: "With the growth, however, of a public whose "education has enabled them to read without teaching "them any regard for the necessary conventions and "restraints which civilisation imposes, the task of the "newspaper became more difficult"?—That is so.

37,279. "Just those parts of the evidence which are more wisely omitted as either irrelevant or undesirable were found to be most popular and a new method of reporting was demanded"?—I agree with that. That applies especially to weekly papers.

37,280. Later on it says: "But though no blame "attaches to journalists, who serve their clients to the "best of their ability, as do lawyers, or doctors, or any "other professional men, the fact remains that few "editors can any longer preserve the standard they "would desire, but are forced forward by a public "demand they can neither approve nor resist." I rather gather that is what you have said?—That is what I have said in a brief form.

37,281. "The question of allowing the publication of "divorce proceedings can no longer be discussed with "reference to plain and carefully edited reports, but "must be answered honestly with regard to descriptive "accounts deliberately written to excite and to "interest." It goes on further: "The method of "reporting approved and expected by the largest "section of the public aims at making them as vivid "and enthralling as a popular novel. To that end all "the resources of illustration, of personal anecdote, of "descriptive paragraph, and of arresting headline are "called into play. The question is not whether the "public shall know exactly what takes place in the "Courts of Justice, but whether during the course of "a sensational suit the whole attention of a large "majority of the public shall be concentrated upon "an ugly phase of life to the exclusion of other "interests"?—I agree with that, except I do not agree that the papers have taken the form of descriptive writing with regard to divorce cases. I have never seen that.

37,282. Do they take the arresting headline?—Yes; and also the evidence that is the most objectionable is often given in the utmost detail by some.

37,283. It goes on, "Many wise truisms can be "uttered upon the advantages of knowing the world "as it is and not cherishing attractive illusions. To "see life steady and to see it whole is no mean ideal, "but it is not achieved by giving to all that is sordid "and contemptible an entirely fictitious prominence. "The possible deterrent effect on the few becomes

" unimportant compared with the certain degrada-
" tion of the many. That a degradation is the result
" can hardly be questioned." I should like to ask your opinion upon that?—I think that is pretty much what I have said. I agree with that last paragraph entirely.

37,284. You will not mind my putting this. I was very much struck with this. I want to ask you whether it is in accordance with your views. There are one or two other portions it might be worth reading. "A proposal to enlarge a divorce court
" in order to accommodate a greater number of the " public would be instantly rejected with contempt,
" yet the encouragement given by the public to " elaborate descriptive reports is little different from a " desire to witness the trial. The healthy mind is that " which pays least attention to disease." And further on, " As familiarity with divorce increases, the instinc-
" tive dislike is weakened. The publication of the " names of those concerned, as is done in other " countries, and if necessary a summary of the charges
" proved would be a less dangerous deterrent than the " present wide publicity. It would also be infinitely
" more equitable, for at present the shame of the " publicity falls on guilty and innocent alike"?—I agree with that, but I prefer my own alternative, that the judge's summing up should be reported.

37,285. I was rather on the general effect. There is one more passage: "The public by refusing to " exercise restraint have allowed a liberty to degenerate
" into licence. The public will no longer permit
" the newspaper to preserve the reticence which is " expected in the pulpit or on a public platform, and
" therefore a special protection must be granted." And further: " But since they have refused the better " part of self-restraint, the time has come when the " law must interfere. It may be hoped that as a truer
" education spreads the full liberty may again be " granted with safety"?—That is substantially what I say. I would like to say with regard to the weekly papers the Education Act of 1870 brought an enormous number of readers of weekly papers into existence about 1890, and I think since then the reporting of divorce cases has very much increased.

The complete article from the " Morning Post " appears at the end of the witness's evidence.

37,286. (Mr. Spender.) You say you think the offence is chiefly committed by London weekly papers?—So far as I have seen.

37,287. There are also provincial weekly papers?—Yes, one or two.

37,288. Which have very large circulations?—Yes. There is only one that I know; I should not like to specify it.

37,289. I quite follow. Then you say so far as the circulation is concerned none of these papers—that is, papers you are connected with—have derived any increase of circulation from reporting in detail such cases?—Not so far as I have ever been able to tell, and I can generally tell.

37,290. To put it in another way, do you think, supposing the reports of such cases were dropped, even such reports as you give, you would lose circulation?—I do not think we would lose circulation if our contemporaries did the same. I explained that.

37,291. You say you do not gain circulation by giving reports in detail. It is not relevant to that whether other papers do the same, but the question is whether you would lose in circulation irrespective of them?—If all the papers dropped them we should not lose.

37,292. That is one point, but if you dropped them alone you would lose?—Yes.

37,293. In your last paragraph you say that the papers which habitually publish full details, and have a reputation for so doing, gain circulation chiefly amongst the working classes. Do you not think the practice of certain newspapers shows that there is a similar demand for extensive reports in certain newspapers amongst the middle classes?—I do not think so at all. I know I have a large weekly, and we have for some years now rather kept out the reports of divorce cases. We have given no prominence to them, and all our travellers going through the country have told me that the reason the London papers sell so much better in our neighbourhood is because they give such an enormous number of divorce cases and matrimonial cases of that description.

37,294. That was exactly the point I wanted to get at. It is reported to you that the London papers by reporting these cases fully do gain in circulation over papers which do not report then?—Yes.

37,295. That is not confined simply to the working class?—I know with regard to the weekly papers I talk of, my own weekly papers and weekly papers in London, 95 per cent. of the readers are readers belonging to the working class. They are the people who, as a rule, only buy one paper a week.

37,296. I merely asked the question because the presumption arises from the figures placed before us that the demand for reports of this kind is as great amongst the middle class as amongst the working class. It may be a mistake of newspaper proprietors and conductors, and I was anxious to get your opinion. Your opinion is, on the whole, that the demand is not so great among the middle class?—That is my opinion.

37,297. You would agree it would be very much more convenient for editors, especially of papers which we roughly call middle-class papers, to be relieved altogether of the responsibility of having to publish anything?—Yes.

37,298. It would be more convenient. The letters which every editor receives on the day after a divorce case, however discreetly you do it, from certain readers who say that it offends them and they will refuse to take your paper in future, are extremely disagreeable?—Yes.

37,299. You would also say there were a great many responsibilities which the editor of a newspaper has to undertake, which submit him to a great many disagreeable consequences?—I am aware of that.

37,300. It may be one which, in the public interest, a newspaper editor would be obliged to take?—I think I said so. Some people have very high ideals.

37,301. As to your specific proposal, it is that nothing should be published except the judge's summing up?—Yes.

37,302. Which at present, in many cases, is a very brief one?——

37,303. (Chairman.) In undefended cases it amounts simply to a decree. Where there is a contest it would be a judgment and not a summing up if the judge is sitting alone, but if there is a jury, it would be a summing up?—I meant that the judge would be aware that that was the only report which would appear, and he would state the facts of the case, as judges do in most written judgments.

37,304. (Mr. Spender.) In undefended cases as well. Does it occur to you as possible that an innocent party in a divorce suit might think it important to have a public cross-examination, especially if the fact that he was involved in the case had become notorious before the suit?—I have no doubt there are cases of that kind. There must be.

37,305. You would admit that is important?—I would admit that, and I think the judge would probably take the opportunity of mentioning it in reviewing the case.

37,306. Do you not think the case might be met by allowing in these particular cases the cross-examination of the party to be public?—I do not see how you are to discriminate in these things.

37,307. You do not think it would be sufficient if one of the parties to the suit said he or she thought it very important for their character that the case should be heard openly?—I think in that case most of the witnesses would insist, either on one side or the other, on having the evidence reported.

37,308. Having the evidence in public?—Yes.

37,309. I put that case to a well-known solicitor who has conducted a great many of these cases, and he gave the opposite answer. He said that in the vast number of cases all parties would desire to have it in private, but I agree that is not a point which concerns the newspapers specifically. Have you considered—perhaps the Chairman will allow us to extend the consideration of this matter a little—whether anything could be done to regulate publication by amending the law in regard to decency. It has been brought before us. The Lord Chief Justice, who gave evidence, said that the law with regard to decency would not apply to any ordinary report of a divorce case in effect, however indecent it might be?—I am not a lawyer.

37,310. I am asking from the point of view of newspapers, not the point of view of law.

(Chairman.) I do not think you have stated that quite right. The Lord Chief Justice had put to him by me the section of the Act, and that is the only law there is. My recollection of it is, speaking without looking at it at the moment, that reports of newspapers of hearings in the Court are practically privileged unless they contain anything that is indecent.

(Mr. Spender.) That is the point. I did not make myself clear. He said that the law as it stood could not convict a newspaper of indecency for publishing any ordinary report of a divorce case.

(Chairman.) If it was indecent it could.

(Mr. Spender.) The point was, as I understood it, that you could not convict for indecency. I think I have a note of it somewhere that you could not convict for indecency, obscenity, the report of the ordinary incidents given in the newspapers in any divorce case, on the ground that it would be obscene.

(Chairman.) If they are obscene, indecent.

(Mr. Spender.) I think we are at one.

(Chairman.) Although that took place in court, it cannot be reported without penalties.

37,311. (Mr. Spender.) That is true. It was only a question whether there was any possible amendment of that law which would make it apply to an excess in the reporting of divorce cases?—I think it would be very difficult.

37,312. You think it would be extremely difficult?—Yes.

37,313. Supposing a newspaper were notoriously and persistently trading in indecent reports, not only in divorce cases, but indecent reports from the criminal courts, and doing it obviously for profit and not in the public interest, you cannot imagine a possible remedy which would throw upon the newspaper the necessity of saying that was done in the public interest, just as we do now in the case of the law of libel?—I think it would be so very difficult to prove.

37,314. In a particular case I agree; but supposing you had the career of the newspaper before you, so to speak, a large number of copies showing persistently an immense excess of these reports, not dealing with the cases in the locality, but from all over the country?—I would just put this case. I think the "Times," which reports in a very unobjectionable way, has probably in the course of the year longer reports than any other paper. How do you distinguish?

37,315. I do not think that is so, as a matter of fact?—I do not know the figures, but judging from the reports I read, I think, taking it all round, they give as long reports of the London cases at all events.

37,316. You would draw a very clear distinction between the proportion of space which the "Times," in relation to the whole of what it publishes, gives to these cases, and the proportion of space which appears in certain weekly papers?—Yes.

37,317. You would be able to say in your own mind, whereas the reporting in one case was kept within bounds and there was an attempt to report with legal decency by experts, the other was obviously an appeal at very great length, in much greater disproportion to the possible prurient instincts of the reader?—Yes.

37,318. And a jury would have no difficulty practically in deciding whether the one or the other was in the public interest. I am merely throwing that out, I am not asking you on the spot?—I think a jury would have very great difficulty in agreeing on a question of that sort.

37,319. I merely suggest to you that most people watch these newspapers, and most Pressmen would have no difficulty in their own mind in drawing a distinction between the two things?—I admit that.

37,320. You do not think a jury would be able to draw a similar distinction?—I think it would be impracticable.

37,321. To draw a distinction between those two things?—The distinction is so subtle and so nice, I do not know where you would stop. The "Times" gives fairly full details. The others put them, perhaps, in a more flaming headline, but I do not think they give more objectionable details, and yet I would never complain of the "Times" reports, and I am sure a jury would not.

37,322. That is the point I want to suggest. I do not think any reasonable man would complain of reporting in that way, but it is very much the issue that we have in libel cases?—You know the trouble we have with the public interest in libel cases.

37,323. It is a very clear principle understood by newspapers?—If it could be done I daresay it would be an advantage, and better than the present system.

37,324. It would cover more than the divorce cases, which are only one class?—Yes.

37,325. (Sir George White.) As I understand, whilst you admit that some of the papers in question publish these reports in great detail, you do not think that there are any coloured pictorial descriptions drawn from imagination in these newspapers, that we consider most guilty?—I have not seen descriptive reporting extended to divorce cases to any great extent.

37,326. It is confined to what actually takes place?—Yes, in the court, although in detail.

37,327. I did not gather in the respectable papers you represent that you do report in detail at all?—We do.

37,328. Therefore you are not able to carry out your own ideal because of the effect of competition?—Quite so.

37,329. You think it would be an advantage if the law assisted you to carry out that ideal?—Yes.

37,330. You suggest that should be done by publishing the summing up of the judge. Do you consider, if it were confined to the summing up simply, that that would still act as a deterrent in a way you suggest publication now does?—I think so, because I think the judge should have in view that his remarks were the only remarks to be published, and if anything was desirable for the public to know, he would include it in his judgment.

37,331. Owing to the state of the law, he would feel bound to cover ground he does not now in his summing up?—Yes.

37,332. (Mr. Burt.) I want to be clear on one point. I understand you to express the opinion that publication acts as a deterrent in these cases?—Yes, I do.

37,333. But I further gather from what you said that you do not think that the publication of these offensive and objectionable details is necessary in order to effect that object?—No, I do not think it is necessary, if the alternative I have suggested is carried out or some alternative in that form.

37,334. (The Archbishop of York.) I want to be clear about one point which Mr. Spender asked you upon. You said in your opinion it was very rarely that the circulation of a good newspaper was increased through the reports of divorce proceedings except where persons of a public character were concerned?—Yes.

37,335. You also said, I think, that the circulation even of these good newspapers might be diminished if it did not report divorce proceedings?—If the other papers in the same town did.

37,336. I find it difficult to reconcile the two positions. If the regular readers of a good newspaper are not greatly increased by reason of divorce proceedings, would they be diminished because there were no divorce proceedings published?—It operates in this way. I will take a local divorce case, for instance. If we simply gave the names and our contemporary gave a full report, there are a good many people perhaps who knew the parties who are interested, who would be obliged to go to that newspaper.

37,337. That would not affect the permanent circulation of the newspaper?—We always feel if readers leave us they may not come back; that is so with most papers.

37,338. Even with good class daily newspapers?—Yes, I should think so.

37,339. You also said you felt that editors were influenced by the protests which they sometimes receive from their readers?—They are influenced in some respects, that is with regard to certain details. It is very difficult to draw the line as to what you shall and shall not give, and some readers think we give more than we ought to.

37,340. Do you not think the few who are led away to lower class journals would be balanced by those who prefer to stay with a newspaper because it is high-toned?—They would gain something in tone and respectability. I admit, but they do not like to face the losing of any such circulation.

37,341. Do I gather you are in the habit of receiving pretty constant communications from readers about the character of reports?—Very constant.

37,342. I was much interested by what you said as to the fact that the circulation of these newspapers which gave great fulness to divorce proceedings may be due to the effects of the Education Act?—That is so. I mean to say the weekly papers especially, beginning about 1890 or 1888—the Education Act was introduced in 1870, I think, in about 15 years after that an enormous number of new readers came into existence, and nearly all these new readers were readers of penny weekly papers or halfpenny evening papers.

37,343. Perhaps it is hardly a fair question to ask, but do you know whether the efforts of good weekly newspapers to meet this new demand have been hindered by the class of newspapers which give in great details these matrimonial cases?—I think so, most decidedly. I think that the penny weekly papers of the respectable class have been very much crushed out of the market by the London weeklies.

37,344. Do you think if the law in any way restrained the publication of excessive details, there would be a better chance for good weekly journals meeting this demand created by the Education Act?—Most decidedly.

37,345. You spoke just now about local divorce proceedings. Would it be your opinion that if divorce proceedings were to take place in local courts there would be a great increase in the reporting of such matters in the local Press?—I do not think the reporting would be any more than it is now. We report all local divorce cases in London.

37,346. In London they are some distance away. I speak with some ignorance, but I should have thought the expense would be greater of reporting a case in London than it would be in Liverpool?—It is rather greater, but every big newspaper has its own private wire, and we are almost in direct communication with the Law Courts, and the reports are as fully given from London as Liverpool.

37,347. You do not think if the case were tried in Liverpool it would create a greater local interest and demand for details, and for the newspapers which furnished these details?—I do not think so.

37,348. In regard to the proposed reforms which you suggest, the publication of the names and the result, or the judgment or summing-up of the judge, you admitted, I think, that they might bear hardly on a few individual cases?—Where they wanted to give evidence?

37,349. Yes?—Probably it would.

37,350. Your view would be that these cases of individual hardship were outweighed by the advantage to the whole community in their general good?—Yes.

37,351. Is it your opinion that the fact that newspapers are now largely controlled by syndicates diminishes the sense of editorial responsibility?—I think it does, certainly.

37,352. A newspaper which is controlled by a syndicate is less likely to consider anything but its circulation?—Yes, I think so. I think when a newspaper is controlled by an individual that individual has a direct responsibility not only to the public, but to all his friends and his associates.

37,353. You would ascribe the extent to which these proceedings are reported in large sections of the Press, at any rate to some extent, to the fact that newspapers are now conducted simply and solely as commercial transactions by syndicate companies?—I think it has some effect.

37,354. Will you tell us from your experience how far the editor of a newspaper is really able to supervise the details which appear which are furnished to him by his reporters?—That depends upon the arrangements in each office. In some offices the editor does superintend these matters, but in these cases he very often does not undertake any writing. In most cases the editor has an assistant who knows the editor's mind, and he supervises the reports to be published next morning. It is impossible with such large papers nowadays for one man to read everything.

37,355. In cases where newspapers are governed by a company it would be more difficult for the editor or the assistant editor to act upon his own responsibility?—I do not think so. I think the manager or the editor or assistant editor has full responsibility and must act on his own responsibility at the last moment.

37,356. If he knows the circulation of the newspaper will probably diminish if he acts on his own responsibility in the way of keeping out these objectionable details, does it not affect him from the shareholders' point of view?—That would certainly operate in that case.

37,357. (Lady Frances Balfour.) I understand that you have had complaints about things which ought not to be put in the paper, and people say they would rather not take the paper if that is in?—Yes.

37,358. Have you ever had complaints that there is not enough indecency in the paper?—No, I have never known a complaint in 30 years. We have had complaints that certain cases have not been reported, but not with regard to details.

37,359. In putting in these details you are catering for a public you think will leave off reading your paper if they are not in?—To a certain extent only.

37,360. Is it not possible that those who object to the details might increase the sale of the paper by taking it in? Would you not sometimes cater for a a higher standard as well as a lower?—As respectable papers we have all those people already.

37,361. How do you define a respectable paper?—I take a paper like the "Manchester Guardian" as a respectable paper, and the "Yorkshire Post."

37,362. You avoid details there?—They report the cases fully, but they do not give anything like the objectionable details that are given in other papers.

37,363. Would you call the "Liverpool Daily Post" a respectable paper?—I think I would; I am its manager.

37,364. My attention has been drawn to a report there of a case which does not exactly come under divorce, and which I presume was extracted from the Police courts. It is headed, "An Oriental Engineer. Shocking Charges by a Scotch Girl." There was a criminal prosecution of a man where most loathesome details are given?—I am quite aware of it.

37,365. Was that for the purpose of selling the paper?—With regard to that case I was very much annoyed. I was away at Llandrindod Wells, and I was annoyed it did appear. It is one of those cases which get in occasionally without proper supervision.

37,366. It had a most prominent and long place in the paper?—Yes.

37,367. You admit it is far worse for public morals than anything that could appear in the Divorce Court?—Yes.

37,368. You disclaim all responsibility for it?—Yes. I wrote a letter complaining of it at once.

37,369. Do you think the sale of that paper was enormously increased?—I should not, at all.

37,370. (Mrs. Tennant.) There was a remand in that case. Have you given instructions that the proceedings under the remand are not to be published?—Yes.

37,371. (Lord Guthrie.) Of course in your evidence you are only referring to ordinary newspapers, and do not have any reference to legal journals?—That is so. I know nothing about legal journals.

37,372. Who report for you? Are they barristers or not?—The reporting in London is done by the news agencies. I do not know whether barristers are engaged in the news agencies or not. I think they are done by journalists.

37,373. On special occasions are special instructions given for reporting a particular case?—No. There may be in certain cases, but our instructions are to send full reports of all local cases in the law courts, whether divorce cases or other cases. We get full reports of all local cases.

37,374. Take, for instance, the Stirling case I tried in Edinburgh. There was a large number of special reporters who came from England to hear that case. Did you send one?—No. We contented ourselves with the report of the news agencies.

37,375. I notice that in the Hilary Sittings of 1909 in the "Liverpool Daily Post" the space stated is 34½ as against a space of 1¾ in the Hilary Sittings of 1910?—Quite so.

37,376. The Secretary has said that, roughly speaking, is accounted for by the occurrence of the Stirling case in the one sittings and nothing corresponding in the other?—I should think that is so.

37,377. What considerations led to your having 34 times the amount of space in the one period compared with the other, devoted to divorce matters in connection with the Stirling case?—The same consideration I have mentioned in other cases. All the newspapers reported that case very fully.

37,378. It was not that it had any legal importance?—No.

37,379. You know it was of the most sordid and unromantic kind?—Yes.

37,380. Why do you think that the papers generally throughout the country took the action they did in reference to that contemptible case?—I suppose they find they have readers for it. I do not remember how long the case lasted.

37,381. Fifteen days?—I think we gave an average of about one to two columns a day.

37,382. You think that was not proper in the interest of public morals?—I think not. I think it would have been better if we had not done it.

37,383. You have in view not the interests of grown-up people merely, but the interests of families?—Yes. I am speaking because of the many complaints I have had from heads of families and from ladies.

37,384. You agree, I suppose, that it would be a very unfortunate position of matters if the head of the house should have to go down early in the morning and read the paper to see whether it was fit for the family to see it?—I have known some heads of houses to tell me so.

37,385. That is the position at the present moment?—That is only in exceptional cases.

37,386. But nobody knows when the exceptional case will happen?—No.

37,387. Do you think that is a position of matters that ought to be brought to an end in a civilised country?—I think I have said so.

37,388. You see no middle course?—I do not think it would be possible to have any middle course.

37,389. The practical difficulties being in your view unsurmountable?—Yes.

37,390. You suggested that the summing-up of the judge might be sufficient—that, of course, is where there is a jury?—Yes.

37,391. Is not the difficulty there that a judge's summing-up does not, or ought not to, indicate any opinion and cannot clear the innocent, as he can in a judgment when there is no jury?—I suppose that would be a difficulty, unless he were to extend his summing-up to a summary of the evidence.

37,392. He cannot express an opinion, and in the case of an innocent decent man being charged he cannot clear him as an innocent man is entitled to have himself cleared?

37,393. (Chairman.) The verdict does that?—I see there is great force in that objection.

37,394. (Lord Guthrie.) Supposing a case where two men are charged, and with regard to one the case is not proved against him, but not only is it not proved, but the case against him has no foundation whatever. That man is entitled to something more than the verdict?—Would not the judge say so?

37,395. At the present moment he says he has the evidence reported. If that were stopped you need to have something in the place of that. If the judge expressed an opinion upon it you think that sufficient?—He would say the innocent man was not a party.

37,396. In regard to what you have said about circulation, that necessarily raises the question of advertisements, by which a paper largely lives; one thing depends on the other?—Yes, partly.

37,397. Very largely?—Certain papers with smaller circulations get more advertisements than others.

37,398. You said complaints had reached you of cases not being reported?—Yes.

37,399. Were those divorce cases?—I have had one or two cases in my career, but not very often. Sometimes we have been obliged to curtail from motives of want of space. Some years ago, a case was curtailed, I cannot remember it exactly, but I know I had a complaint asking whether there was any object in our keeping out this particular case.

37,400. Keeping it out altogether?—No, but giving only a few lines.

37,401. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I suppose the effect on circulation of excluding particular news from a paper is a matter only gained by experience?—Yes.

37,402. Would you agree to this principle that where a man looks for news in one paper, and does not find it, and does find it in another paper, that is bad for the circulation of the paper that has not the news?—Generally speaking that is so. He would go to the other paper again probably.

37,403. It applies not only to divorce but many other things, such as sporting news?—Yes.

37,404. You are in favour of a restriction of the present law of publication of reports of divorce cases, but are you also of opinion—I gather you are—that any rule that is adopted must be a very simple one, one that can be easily applied?—Such as I suggest.

37,405. I suppose, in the hurry of newspaper editing and reporting, a very complicated rule such as taking down one witness and not another would be impossible practically?—I think so.

37,406. It has been suggested that it might be sufficiently met by the law as to indecent publications, but the difficulty is not one of theory but a practical difficulty of saying that in a particular case a thing is so indecent that it becomes criminal?—I should say so. I do not think there has been a prosecution.

37,407. The reports that you object to, I suppose, are not always indecent in any technical sense at all, but are a perfectly truthful narration of evidence necessary to be given in the court, and exceedingly undesirable to be read by the public?—Yes. The class of evidence I object to is the evidence of chambermaids and housemaids, and that sort of thing, absolutely necessary to be given in the court but not in the paper, and which would not be given in an objectionable form in the judge's summing-up or judgment.

37,408. Most divorce cases are not heard by a jury but before the judge?—Yes.

37,409. Whether the judge is summing up or giving judgment, he must deal with the evidence?—Yes.

37,410. If the evidence is unsavoury and that is essential to the decision of the case, he must deal with that unsavoury evidence?—He need not repeat the details.

37,411. Is that not rather a matter of the circumstances in the particular case? Can you predicate that the judge will always be able to leave out of his judgment matter which you would recognise should not appear in the newspapers?—I could not say in all cases, but I should say so in the majority of cases, and therefore you would gain something by adopting my suggestion.

37,412. Would you add to your suggestion: do you think it wise that in any particular case the judge might himself refuse to allow the judgment to be reported? He might at the beginning of the judgment say "This case is not to be reported"?—I have not thought over that. I think that would be a very difficult principle to work upon.

37,413. It would be simple in this way: it would be in the hands of the judge simply. On the other hand, I suggest to you there is a great practical difficulty, if you want to make the reports clean and fit for publication, to say that everything a judge says may be published?—You might have cases of people in very high life, and a judge might have great pressure brought to bear upon him to ask that to be kept out.

37,414. You think there would be a risk of improper suppression of the facts?—Quite so.

37,415. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) You see some considerable advantages in publication?—Certainly.

37,416. The greatest advantage is the deterrent effect arising from publication?—Yes.

37,417. Do you agree with the statement that was read to us this morning, that if you practically had no publication you would have many cases of divorce by arrangement?—I think certainly the number of cases would be increased very largely. I know from experience that in reporting those cases the number of applications we have to keep them out of the newspapers shows that the people fear it very acutely, and feel the publication a great deal more than the actual judgment.

37,418. You say not only does publication deter people from committing immoral offences, but from taking proceedings. Do you think that would apply to the innocent party who has to obtain a divorce for the conduct of the respondent? Do they fear publication?—Certainly not.

37,419. Supposing you gave simply the names of the parties and the result, would not that be very much like a "Gazette" notice of a bankruptcy?—Yes.

37,420. And the public would take no interest in it?—I quite agree.

37,421. Might not the difficulty be got over by every newspaper that reported proceedings in the divorce court being required to obtain a licence before they could report in that court, and that if they offended they would know that the licence would be taken from them?—I have not thought of that suggestion. There are so many hundreds of newspapers and the reporting is done for, I should think, three-fourths of them by one agency. Would you propose to deprive that agency of the reporter offended of its right to write for all those papers?

37,422. Yes?—That would be a great injustice to three-fourths of the newspapers.

37,423. You do not think that could be worked at all?—No.

37,424. (Mr. Brierley.) As a matter of fact the news agency would provide a verbatim report, and leave it to the editors of the respective newspapers to insert what they pleased?—If asked to do so they will.

37,425. That would be the usual course in a trial that excited any public interest?—Yes. In the ordinary trials they supply simply a condensed report.

37,426. Any newspaper receiving its report from that agency would use its discretion?—Yes.

37,427. You think the only feasible method of dealing with this matter is to have a hard and fast line drawn, beyond which newspaper editors are not allowed to pass?—It would be very difficult to make any other distinction.

37,428. Anything which is left to discretion would not work?—It is so difficult to fix. The discretion of one man is different from the discretion of another.

37,429. So that the line may be drawn in the way you suggest, or otherwise; that is the only feasible way of dealing with the matter?—I think so.

37,430. (Chairman.) Your evidence is given individually?—Yes; I do not represent the Northern Federation.

37,431. As a matter of fact I think I am right in this, that your name was supplied to the Secretary by the Newspaper Society, and also by the Federation of Northern Newspaper Owners?—That is so, I believe.

37,432. Are you yourself a newspaper proprietor?—Yes.

37,433. As well as managing director?—Yes.

37,434. Looking at the Press on these questions broadly, would you think it right that a proposition should be complied with which suggested that the true Press attitude should be not to write that which the people were simply interested in, but that which was in their best interests?—It is very good in theory, but I do not think it would work out in practice.

37,435. I have heard that suggested as a proposition. I ought to thank you very much indeed for your attendance. I am sure we all feel your evidence will be of very great value to us?—May I make one remark about the question put to me by Lady Frances Balfour? I explained I was away, and that case got into the paper by inadvertence. These things do happen in newspapers. A London weekly paper detected that, and, knowing perhaps that I was going to give this evidence here, called my attention and that of probably some members of the Commission to it. I only want to say that in my own defence.

37,436. I understand you entirely disclaim responsibility for it?—Yes.

37,437. And gave notice of that fact at the time?—Both Sir Edward Russell and myself were very much annoyed about it.

Article from the "MORNING POST" of September 29th, 1910.

"The right to publish divorce proceedings in detail is being seriously challenged, and when the Royal Commission on the Marriage Laws reassembles that right must be one of the important points on which further evidence is taken. The question will become even more acute than it is at present if, as the result of the Commission, any attempt is made to facilitate divorce either by increasing the grounds that are accepted as valid, or by cheapening the proceedings and giving jurisdiction to the inferior Courts. However distasteful such extended facilities may be, no one can ignore the possibility that they may be granted, and therefore every safeguard against a consequent lowering of moral standards must be thought out in advance. The publication of divorce cases has hitherto been defended on two grounds: that the shame of publicity is a part of the just penalty of divorce, and, further, that the right to report the proceedings in all Law Courts is a most important part of the liberty of the Press, on which the effective preservation of individual liberties depends. No one contends that detailed accounts of all the sordid facts which come to light are in the least necessary to secure either of these advantages; but it is in practice so difficult to lay down any precise rule as to what ought and ought not to be reported, or to impose any restriction which is not in fact a censorship, that the decision has been left to the editors of newspapers. Until recently the duty thus entrusted could be worthily fulfilled. The accounts given were straightforward and simple reports of the proceedings, in which the reticence usual in decent society was strictly observed. The effect on the public was certainly useful. The publicity added not a little to the reluctance which restrains even the least modest from invoking the law in private distress. While it increased the penalty imposed on those who wished to break the marriage tie, the simple account did nothing to excite the public interest excessively or to give undue prominence to the seamy side of life. The readers of newspapers respected reticence and made the editorial censorship an effective safeguard to morality. With the growth, however, of a public whose education has enabled them to read without teaching them any regard for the necessary conventions and restraints which civilisation imposes, the task of the newspaper became more difficult. Just those parts of the evidence which are more wisely omitted as either irrelevant or undesirable were found to be most popular, and a new method of reporting was demanded. Those who put the blame upon the newspapers are ignorant of the facts which modern journalism has to face. Just as every nation gets the priests it deserves, so every public gets the paper it wants. If the demand for a certain class of news is large and persistent, newspapers have no choice save to supply it or cease catering for the general public. Considering the success which attends sensational journalism and the eager demand which exists for news about the private life of other people, the wonder is that the standard of reticence remains on the whole so high.

"But though no blame attaches to journalists, who serve their clients to the best of their ability as do lawyers, or doctors, or any other professional men, the fact remains that few editors can any longer preserve the standard they would desire, but are forced forward by a public demand they can neither approve nor resist. The question of allowing the publication of divorce proceedings can no longer be discussed with reference to plain and carefully edited reports, but must be answered honestly with regard to descriptive accounts deliberately written to excite and to interest. The method of reporting approved and expected by the largest section of the public aims at making them as vivid and enthralling as a popular novel. To that end all the resources of illustration, of personal anecdote, of descriptive paragraph, and of arresting headline are called into play. The question is not whether the public shall know exactly what takes place in the Courts of Justice, but whether during the course of a sensational suit the whole attention of a large majority of the public shall be concentrated upon an ugly phase of life to the exclusion of other interests. Many wise truisms can be uttered upon the advantages of knowing the world as it is and not cherishing attractive illusions. To see life steady and to see it whole is no mean ideal, but it is not achieved by giving to all that is sordid and contemptible an entirely fictitious prominence. The possible deterrent effect on the few becomes unimportant compared with the certain degradation of the many. That a degradation is the result can hardly be questioned. No preacher encourages his congregation to talk as much as possible about sin, far less deliberately interests them in the lives and deeds of sinners, for every sane moralist knows that an interest in things unseemly as often fascinates as repels. A proposal to enlarge a divorce court in order to accommodate a greater number of the public would be instantly rejected with contempt, yet the encouragement given by the public to elaborate descriptive reports is little different from a desire to witness the trial. The healthy mind is that which pays least attention to disease.

"Injurious to public morality, the unfettered reporting of divorce cases will also, we believe, finally lessen the penalty that at present is inflicted on the parties. The real penalty for divorce, apart altogether from the religious disqualifications which ought to attach to it, is not the gossiping comment of millions of unimportant persons, but the subsequent exclusion of the guilty parties from the society to which they are accustomed. The standard of conduct is determined, not by the law, but by public opinion expressed in the intimate judgments of friends. As familiarity with divorce increases, the instinctive dislike is weakened. The publication of the names of those concerned, as is done in other countries, and if necessary a summary of the charges proved would be a less dangerous deterrent than the present wide publicity. It would also be infinitely more equitable, for at present the shame of publicity falls on guilty and innocent alike. Such restriction, however, is unquestionably an infringement of the liberties of the Press, a beginning of that censorship which Englishmen by long tradition have learned to hate. The supremacy of the Law Courts and the publicity of their proceedings are equally important safeguards of the liberty of the individual. But every right entails a duty, and in this case the right of the public to know what happens in the Law Courts carries with it the duty of restraint. The public, by refusing to exercise restraint, have allowed a liberty to degenerate into licence. The public will no longer permit the newspaper to preserve the reticence which is expected in the pulpit or on a public platform, and therefore a special protection must be granted. It would be infinitely preferable if the public could be trusted not to concern themselves with personal details and with private matters that have no importance, but since they have refused the better part of self-restraint the time has come when the law must interfere. It may be hoped that as a truer education spreads the full liberty may again be granted with safety."

Mr. Russell Allen called and examined.

37,438. (Chairman.) You are the proprietor of the "Manchester Evening News"?—Yes.

37,439. And any other paper?—No.

37,440. Your name was supplied by the Newspaper Society?—That was not with my knowledge. I am here entirely on my own authority. I represent nobody except myself.

37,441. I was not going to suggest you represented anybody, but I think I am right in saying your name was among the list of names suggested by one of the Societies?—I think they may have sent my name, but it was after I sent it.

37,442. At any rate, you are here in your own individual responsible capacity?—Yes.

37,443. You have given us a neat and short proof. Will you read it?—I am the proprietor of the "Manchester Evening News," and in considering the question of publication in the Press of reports of divorce and matrimonial cases, it seems to me the two main points to be dealt with are :—

"The effect of reports on the parties to the action.

"The effect on the public.

1st. The Effect of Reports on the Parties to the Action.

(a) The dread of publicity probably acts as a deterrent in some cases where any other consideration would be disregarded.

(b) The publication of a report in the public press is in many cases the only punishment the guilty parties receive, or perhaps it would be more correct to say, the only punishment they care about.

(c) The innocent party in many, perhaps most, cases welcomes publication in order that his or her character may be cleared.

(d) It is useful to divorced people that the fact should be known, as they thus avoid painful questions from outsiders and friends.

"I have in mind a case in which the very greatest pressure was brought to bear on me by the respondents to keep the report of a certain case out of my paper, whereas the plaintiff was most anxious that a report should appear.

"On general lines it is almost always better that a true and accurate account should appear in the press about any matter of public interest, rather than that the public should be left to gather their information from rumours and gossip."

37,444. Do you mean by a deterrent a deterrent against the commission of an immoral act, or, when it has been committed, deterring people from bringing it out in public? Those are different things: the word may be used for either one or the other. It has been suggested in the course of the evidence that publication is no deterrent against the commission of the act, but the deterrent is bringing it out in public?—I think the deterrent is before that.

37,445. Have you had any experience to make that a definite view?—No, except that one could hardly sit in a newspaper office without realising that in almost all matters of wrong-doing the Press acts as a great deterrent. We constantly have all sorts of people who have committed small misdemeanours and crimes begging that their name shall not be in the paper, quite apart from divorce. I think the Press has enormous powers as a deterrent.

37,446. The next part of your proof deals with the effect on the public?—Yes. "This, in my opinion, is by far the most important question in connection with the matter. It is to be feared that the majority of people do not read these reports as items of news at all. They are read because it is expected they will contain details of an objectionable and suggestive nature, and I am inclined to think they would be equally sought after if they only contained fictitious names. It is regrettable, but I am afraid true, that this class of reading attracts many people of both sexes, and a huge circulation can be obtained by publishing full reports of the class of cases in question. I myself have often been asked to give fuller reports of certain unsavoury cases, in order that my paper might extend its circulation and hold its own with its competitors. It is well known that certain newspapers live on this kind of matter and create large circulations in consequence. These circulations are then boomed, and used as a bait for advertisers. Your Commission will readily understand how difficult the position of a newspaper management is when faced with competition of this sort. There is no class of business in which it is more difficult to maintain a high standard than the newspaper business, and I should like to point out to the Commission that it is not the slightest use, in these days, to trust in the smallest degree to the good taste of some newspapers. Journalism is now so much in the hands of money-making syndicates that any features, however questionable, are used for the purpose of increasing business, and thereby dividends. Racing, football, and guessing competitions, although repeatedly condemned by the courts as being grossly immoral, are illustrations of the determination on the part of many newspaper managers to avail themselves of any means of making money. I have no hesitation in saying that proprietors of newspapers who have a proper sense of their responsibilities, would welcome regulations which would keep the reports of divorce cases within such limits as to be harmless to the public, without shielding the guilty parties from the publicity they deserve."

37,447. That is extremely carefully stated. I would like to ask you whether you have formulated any practical mode of dealing by the court or by legislation, with matters so as to comply with your last paragraph, proper regulations?—I rather expected that question, and I think it is the most difficult question I shall be asked. The only scheme I have been able to think of is that there should be some official reporter connected with the Divorce Court—how he would be paid I do not know, unless by the newspaper proprietors who took his services—who would be responsible individually, who knew exactly what sort of evidence might be given and would only give such evidence as it was proper to give. By that means you would avoid what is the root of the whole business in this Divorce Court reporting, the competition between the various papers.

37,448. You would have one individual to whom they should all apply after the case was over for such a report as he thought fit to publish?—Yes. He would be almost in the same position as the reporter of the Press Association, but he would be an official of the court and a trained man, and know exactly what evidence it was right to publish.

37,449. Suppose a case lasted a week, that report should not be dealt with until after the whole trial?—I do not think that necessarily follows. I had not thought of it from that point of view. The idea of the official is that decent reports would be issued which would be full enough to meet the ends of justice and both sides to the action, and would keep the Press from engaging in any sort of competition in the way of their reports. That is the only solution I can think of.

37,450. Do you agree in substance with what Mr. Jeans said?—I think so. The point of view of the deterrent may be overdone, I think, because I should like to know how the cases are chosen for the reports. It is perfectly clear all cases are not reported. One is inclined to ask why should some people be deterred and not others.

37,451. He was inclined to agree, I think he did agree, with one passage especially I read from that article in the "Morning Post": "The possible deterrent effect on the few becomes unimportant compared with the certain degradation of the many." Is that matter in accordance with your view?—I do not follow that.

37,452. It means you may possibly deter a small number of people from committing wrong, but that the publication would be a great degradation to the many?—I think the publication as it exists to-day cannot be upheld for a moment. The deterrent might in occasional cases act the other way. Take a nervous and highly-strung woman who might be suffering gross injustice: the fear of publication might prevent her taking any action.

37,453. An innocent woman?—Yes, because she would rather suffer anything than have the publication.

37,454. Did you feel forced by the tenor of publication, as it were, to go along with it?—Yes. I think every newspaper must feel that. It is extremely hard to stand alone, especially now-a-days.

37,455. Have you had any complaints yourself, such as Mr. Jeans mentioned, of people objecting to reports which might come to their children at the table, and so on?—No, I cannot say I have had any definite reports, but I think there must be a feeling of that sort, because one has it one's self.

37,456. I think we have exhausted your proof?—The fact of outside proceedings has been referred to. I do not know whether you would allow me to say anything on that.

37,457. Yes?—Even supposing the door of the Divorce Court were closed altogether and there was no reporting, that would not by any means prevent objectionable matter from appearing in the paper, and in my opinion it is sometimes impossible to avoid it.

37,458. It would be contempt of court, I think, probably?—I do not mean Divorce Court matter: I mean other matter. Somebody referred to police court cases, and I thought it might be helpful to the Commission if I referred to two cases to show the difficulty papers are in sometimes in dealing with these things.

37,459. I thought you said supposing it were heard in private it would still get in the papers?—No; I said if the Divorce Court was closed altogther there would be no reports in the Divore Court, but that would not prevent other objectionable matter from other courts getting into the paper, and sometimes I maintain that may be justified. I wonder whether you would like me to state two cases where I think it may be.

37,460. If you think it will assist us, by all means?—There was a case in Manchester some few years ago which you may remember by name; it was in connection with the Comedy Theatre, in which evidence was produced which was quite as bad and very much of the same sort in a way as the evidence you get in the Divorce Court. It was a most important case, because it involved an action for libel by the manager of the theatre against a member of the Manchester Town Council. I should like to read a few lines which appeared in the "Manchester Guardian" at that time, because the "Guardian" is as jealous as any paper in England with regard to what appears in its columns. It referred to that case, and this is its comment: "In view of the fact that the action against "Mr. Holt has been undisguisedly an attempt to "impeach the police, the Watch Committee, and the "City Council for wrong-doing in the discharge of "their official duty, we have unwillingly departed "from our practice of excluding from these columns "all such reports of evidence as the majority of "healthy-minded persons find repulsive. In this "case the government of the city has been on its "trial, and every citizen of Manchester, since that "government is of our own making and every member "of it chosen by ourselves, has been on his trial with "it. It was necessary, therefore, that every citizen "should be enabled to inform himself on the issues "involved upon which he might at any time be required "to pass his own judgment at the polling booth. We "sincerely hope that the impression left upon respon-"sible public opinion by the issue of this trial may be "deep enough to do more than make amends, by its "reaction on the city's public life, for such a public "misfortune as the necessity that the details of such "a case should be reported."

37,461. That was a matter of great public interest?—Yes. My only point is that if no divorce matter is published at all, that there still will be, and must be, if this is allowed, objectionable matter in the newspapers from time to time.

37,462. That is possible where you get matters of great public interest, but what public interest is there whether A. has committed adultery with B., or the offence of C.?—None whatever.

37,463. Except, as you have indicated in your proof, people will read that for the purpose of reading objectional details?—That is so. The other was a case tried very recently, known as the Palatine Hotel case. My editor sent for me and said, "There is a very nasty "case coming on at the police court; what are we to "do?" I said, "Cannot you leave it out?" He said, "I am afraid we cannot, because it involves a "member of the City Council and is a very important "public matter." The case was reported very fully, the matter was most objectionable, and the Bishop of Manchester thought it wise to refer to it at the opening of a social club for young people, and also in a sermon he preached at the Manchester Cathedral. So that in those cases you get very much the same class of evidence as you get in the Divorce Court.

37,464. Those are public matters, and do not occur every day?—No, I agree.

37,465. You will not get 300 or 400 columns a year out of those cases?—Personally, I should not mind if the divorce reporting was stopped altogether, but I do not know that I should like to say I think that would be a wise thing.

37,466. (Mr. Brierley.) Those are rather exceptional cases?—Yes. I want to point out you cannot always overlook them because they are of public interest.

37,467. The last case was of very justifiable public interest?—Yes.

37,468. If you absolutely prohibited the reports of divorce cases, I suppose there would be exceptional cases where it would be of public importance that the facts should be known?—One can imagine so.

37,469. Cases have occurred, without referring to them, three or four perhaps in a century?—Some great public person, where the public would not consent to his downfall without knowing some of the details.

37,470. Do you not think, those cases being so few, that the disadvantages that follow from their suppression would be outweighed by the advantage gained from the suppression of these extremely numerous reports?—Yes, I think so. I do not think the reports ought to be stopped altogether, but they ought to be in such a form, as I say in my proof, that the parties to the action would have such publicity as is necessary, and without any damage to the public.

37,471. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) You were asked whether publication would operate as a deterrent to people from being guilty of immorality. Take a class of society such as professional men, doctors, solicitors; they would be ruined if they were made co-respondents?—Yes.

37,472. Does not the effect of publication upon that class operate as a powerful deterrent?—I should think it would.

37,473. That is, from actually committing immorality?—Yes, and to some women too, the fear of disclosure.

37,474. I suppose this reporter you speak of would be the same as the reporters in the court now, but under the control of the court?—Yes.

37,475. And would report the cases in the same way day after day, but he would be checked if he were doing that which was wrong, or exceeding the line the court thought fit to draw?—Yes.

37,476. You think that would meet the difficulties of the case?—I think we must have one rule for everybody in the newspaper world with regard to that class of reporting. I do not believe in that strengthening of the law against publication of indecent matter. We should get into the same hopeless muddle as with the lottery laws. Nobody knows where they are.

37,477. Do you agree the mere publication of the name and the decree would be of very little use?—I do not think that is going far enough. One might go further than that without the slightest damage to the public.

37,478. Would it be of any use?—I do not think anybody would put it in.

37,479. (Lord Guthrie.) You referred to the people's fear of their name appearing?—Yes.

37,480. Is not that really what people are afraid of, they want their name kept out altogether? It is not a question of details or no details, but they do not want it to be known that they are charged with a certain offence?—Yes, in some cases that is true, but I can imagine people who would not mind the mere insertion of their name, which they would hope and which might very easily be missed, when they would object to a fuller account of their misconduct.

37,481. I can imagine such people, but have you not found, as I found as a counsel in old days, that people want to have their names kept out?—Yes, there is no doubt about that. Wrong-doers of all sorts, I said to commence with, come in shoals to get their names kept out of the paper.

37,482. In addition to that, do you think it would be right that a certain amount should appear, such as would be, for instance, in the Judge's summing-up?—My only difficulty is what cases are to appear? It does not seem fair to me to pillory and penalise one set of people and leave other people out.

37,483. You meet that suggestion by an authorised reporter who would proceed on rules laid down by the judge, and on a uniform system?—That would not ensure that what he sent would be put in the papers.

37,484. You think the papers would cease to publish it?—I think to a very large extent. Nobody can deny, if they are honest, that the cases that are chiefly reported now are the sensational cases. Therefore, the people who are engaged in the sensational cases get the punishment that the people who are in non-sensational cases do not get.

31,485. Do you suggest there are a certain number of cases in the Divorce Court in London that are not mentioned in any paper?—I cannot say that. I should think it is extremely likely.

37,486. One would like to know that?—I cannot tell you that. The rule most papers go on would be to publish cases which have a local interest, or sensational cases. Therefore, we might publish a Manchester case which would not appear in a Plymouth paper; but the Plymouth paper might publish a Plymouth case which would not appear in the Manchester paper.

37,487. The London papers would be able to tell us whether there are a certain number of undefended cases that never appear at all?—There must be hundreds.

37,488. We will hear that from the London people. That is a very important matter indeed. You say in your précis that it is always better that a true and accurate account should appear in the Press about any matter of public interest. How far do you carry that? Suppose a case of rape, and it is heard within closed doors; is it not desirable, as a matter of public policy, that the present system should go on?—The rule we go on with regard to attempts on girls and women is to give the name of the man but not the girl.

37,489. Such cases are heard with closed doors and not reported at all?—That was more a general statement. I think I had inquests more in my mind. We often get people who want inquests kept out of the paper.

37,490. (Mr. Brierley.) The cases Lord Guthrie mentions are not heard with closed doors in England?—We never give the name of the girl or woman.

37,491. (Lord Guthrie.) What is your view about divorce cases being heard with closed doors?—I may be old-fashioned, but I do not like the idea of an English Court of Justice being shut up altogether.

37,492. Of any kind?—No.

37,493. Where do you get your reports?—I think we get them from the Press Association and Central News.

37,494. What happens when a report comes? Is it always edited for your paper by your people?—Yes. My brother, who used to be in our editorial department, was only saying last night there were huge lumps cut out. We do not put in anything like what is sent. To begin with, the reporter does not send all that happens, and we do not put in all that is sent, but I do not claim any special virtues for my paper. I think details appear there which ought not to appear, just as in other papers.

37,495. Is there any general principle which determines whether you shall put a case in at all? Secondly, if it is put in, whether it shall be reported at length or with the bare names?—I think there is no good blinking the fact that sensational cases are reported more fully than others: everybody knows that.

37,496. (Mrs. Tennant.) You say in your proof you have often been asked to give fuller reports of certain unsavoury cases. From whom has a request of that kind come?—From news-agents, and people of that sort. We have travellers going round calling on news-agents, to find out how the paper is doing and they bring back word that last night some other paper sold better because they had three columns of a certain case we had not, and unless we report this case more fully we cannot keep up the sale.

37,497. Have you shareholders, or are you the sole proprietor?—No, I am sole proprietor.

37,498. So that it is not from anybody interested in the paper except in the capacity of an agents.

37,499. (Archbishop of York.) There is one question arising out of your evidence which I should like to put. You may not be able to answer it, perhaps someone else can. At any rate, I should like to have it put down. Do you know any instance of any newspaper having been prosecuted under the laws of indecency for anything that appeared in divorce reports?—No, I do not remember one.

37,500. I gather that practically it has never happened?—So far as I know.

37,501. So far as regards restraint of this class of publication, the present law is inoperative?—I should not like to say that. Indecency to some extent is so much a matter of taste. It is extremely difficult to make a law. It would land everybody in a sort of muddle of uncertainty. You would never quite know where you were.

37,502. That bears on what I should like to ask you about, your interesting suggestion of the official reporter. Do you consider that the reporter should be left to his own discretion, controlled only by what is expected of him by the Court, or should he submit his report to the Judge or anyone appointed by the Judge?—I do not think so. I think he would have certain rules to go by, and a general idea of what was allowable and what was not, and he would soon learn by experience what he might issue. I do not know whether the Judge would care to undertake it. I do not agree with Mr. Jeans. I do not suppose the Judge would care to have his summing up used as a newpaper report, but I suppose the Judge could occasionally, if any very bad evidence was being given, turn to the reporters and say, "That evidence is not to appear."

37,503. The control of an official reporter of that kind is very possible with the law as it at present stands in which the cases are heard in the High Court, but how would it bear if suggestions which have been made to us were carried out and there were a large number of courts with jurisdiction in matrimonial causes all up and down the country? In each case there would be an official reporter in each court? I am not asking your opinion on that matter. I want to know whether, in that case, you would have an official reporter attached to each court?—That is a complication I had not thought of.

37,504. In that case there would be a large number of persons in the country who were censors of what was or was not desirable for the public to read?—Yes. That is a serious complication, no doubt.

37,505. That would bring in the element of obscurity which you desire to avoid?—I am afraid it would.

37,506. With regard to the other alternative, you thought that if the record for publication were confined to the names of the parties and possibly the result, many newspapers would hardly think it worth while to publish the names at all?—They might for local people. It is a question whether the public are not entitled to know to some extent the amount of guilt or innocence of people.

37,507. Do you think the newspapers would publish them?—I think they would, if local people, probably.

37,508. Otherwise, unless they were well-known people or local people, there would be a chance of not being published or the names published in an obscure position in the paper?—I do not think that would matter, because at present I presume the rules newspapers go on are to take local cases and sensational cases.

37,509. You think there ought to be, in the interest of the public and the parties, something more than the mere publication of names and result?—Yes, providing it does not go too far.

37,510. That being so, supposing for a moment your suggestion about an official reporter had difficulties of its own, what would be your opinion about the suggestion that the judge should make any comments of his own in addition to the actual judgment he thought necessary in the interest of justice to any of the parties?—I do not see any objection to that, if the judges would undertake it, but it seems to me it is throwing rather a heavy duty on the judge to ask him to do a newspaper report as well as a summing-up.

37,511. I am not suggesting that the judge's summing-up or judgment should be furnished to the reporters for the newspapers, but in cases where the judge thought the mere record of the result might be unfair to one of the parties, he should make any comment in addition to the actual judgment, for reporting with the judgment?—I see what you mean. That would do. That would not be very full.

37,512. (Sir George White.) I understand you put forward the idea of an official reporter as a better means of dealing with the question of reporting than the reporting of the mere summing-up of the judge?—Yes, I think so. I think it would. I have here some of the advantages of this official reporter. It would settle the idea of regulation, it would be fair all round, it would make for purity, and abolish competition, and would ensure all the publicity which is really necessary. It would lead to the appointment of responsible, trustworthy, impartial, and independent persons for a class of work which experience has proved cannot be safely left to the ordinary reporters influenced by many considerations to behave recklessly.

37,513. In view of the question put to you by His Grace as to the possibility of an extension of Courts, do you still hold the view that an official reporter is the better way of dealing with it, in view of the number of official reporters that must be appointed?—I am afraid that I cannot answer that question now. I should have to think more about it. When the other Courts are formed—they are quite in the air at present, we do not know even if they are coming—if they are formed, we should have to see how many there were and what could be done in the same line.

37,514. Your experience is based on the existing Courts which deal with these cases?—Yes.

37,515. I suppose you gave the case of the Comedy Theatre and the Palatine Hotel, Manchester, case as evidence of the undesirability of closing reports altogether, or minimising them, as a rule, but there must be exceptions in the public interest?—Yes. A good deal has been said about the effect of reading these reports on young people, but I think it is fair to remember that newspapers are not primarily written for young people, and occasionally if the public interest is to be served things must appear which perhaps are not very suitable for young people. I wanted to quote those cases as examples of what I meant.

37,516. With regard to the deterrent influence of these reports, having in view the nature and circumstances of these illicit alliances, is it a fact that parties who enter into them imagine that the thing is likely to be published, and, therefore, they refrain from it lest it should come to the public ear and be published in the newspaper? Is that a fact in daily life?—I think with some natures it would be. It is not with everybody, or else there would be no divorce proceedings.

37,517. Do they anticipate the possibilty of such a thing?—I think so. There is an extract here from a speech made by Lord Lyndhurst in 1856 with regard to the original divorce laws, in which he says: "If we "add the obvious interest in almost every instance "which the woman has to remain in her home, and "the horror most women must feel at the idea of the "public exposure and discussion of such wrongs, it is "evidence they would not be so very eager to avail "themselves, in usual cases, of the extreme remedy."

37,518. In your opinion, it does act as a deterrent to prevent these things occurring sometimes?—Yes. I am certain of that in some cases.

37,519. (Mr. Spender.) Your view, roughly speaking, is that first of all the reporting of these cases is on the whole a deterrent?—I do not even say "on the whole." I have modified that first sentence a little bit. In some natures it would be a deterrent. These cases involve the strongest passions of human nature, and in many cases I think it is not a deterrent, and the divorce proceedings show that it is not.

37,520. Might not one say that it belongs to the lower conception of marriage, to regard it as a private matter between the parties, either marriage or divorce, and that it is in the consciousness of the people, perhaps vaguely, but in a very real sense, that the breaking of the marriage vow and the consequences are to be borne in mind, and it is something more than a mere private matter?—Yes.

37,521. That is the only point I wish to make. With reference to an answer you gave to the Chairman, you said there was no public interest in a divorce case. You do not mean us to infer from that that a divorce, such as one frequently hears of in France, is a private matter between the parties?—I meant that there are interests in divorce, if you know anything about the people, even if only acquaintances or people living in the same neighbourhood, and it is right, I think, that a certain amount of report of those cases should appear; but what might be right and proper reporting in the public interest in the neighbourhood of Manchester on a Manchester case would simply be read as a sensational case in such a place as Exeter or Plymouth.

37,522. I meant broadly there is a public aspect of marriage and divorce which makes a certain measure of publicity a natural concomitant of divorce?—Yes. That is surely purely statistical.

37,523. I am taking it as a point of principle. In a country like France, for instance, it is natural there should be no reporting of divorce cases in the papers. If you talk to French people about them, they will say it is purely a private matter which does not concern the public. Our conception of marriage and divorce is one which does contain a public aspect. We cannot take it merely on newspaper grounds, but publicity is in a certain sense the natural result of our whole idea of marriage?—I said I agreed a certain amount of publicity was good.

37,524. I only ask this question in reference to the answer that there was no public interest in a divorce case. "Interest" was used in a double sense there, I think?—Yes.

37,525. With regard to the question Lord Guthrie asked, perhaps we might get at the general practice of the London and Provincial papers with regard to the reporting of these cases. In regard to the London papers, would it be true to say that the reports are mainly confined to sensational cases, or cases affecting well-known people?—I do not know that I can answer that question with any certainty, because I do not say I do not read divorce cases, because I have read divorce cases, but I can confidently say I do not remember the name of a single person who appeared in them at present, and I do not think other people do for long. They simply read them. I think, because they are divorce cases.

37,526. In choosing from among the cases a London paper would report, there would have either to be some incident in it which the editor or sub-editor would imagine would take the people's fancy or interest, or it would have to affect some well-known name?—Yes.

37,527. Supposing there was a Manchester person who was not well-known, and there was no particular incident in the divorce case, there would be no report of that in a London paper, in all probability?—That is so. That fact alone rather leads to wrong conclusions, because the papers choose these sensational divorce cases, and these cases of what you call well-known or society people, and it leads the bulk of the public to believe that there is more immorality in that particular class than there is in other classes, which I do not for a moment believe. I believe it is pretty much the same in every class. It is the fact of these cases of a particular class being put in the paper that gives the impression they are more immoral than anybody else.

37,528. If we go from the London Press to the Provincial Press, it would be true to say that all those cases, the sensational cases and the cases affecting well-known people, would be reported in a provincial paper, and there would be added the cases not reported in a London paper affecting local people?—Yes, I think that is fair.

37,529. The ordinary practice of a provincial paper is to instruct the News Agency to keep watch for any case in the courts affecting local people, and telegraph or send?—They do that, naturally.

37,530. That is the general instruction?—Yes.

37,531. May we get to the suggestion of the official reporter. I call him the "official reporter" because, I think, that was your word?—That is the only name I can call him by.

37,532. Do you contemplate his being appointed by the newspapers or the Court?—I have not worked out the details. There is the question of his payment Whether he would be an official of the Court and paid by the papers, or a man approved by the Court and paid by the papers, I do not know. It is simply the idea of having a report which will be full enough and yet absolutely inoffensive, and which will put all the newspapers on the same footing with regard to reporting these cases.

37,533. It is a very interesting suggestion, but I want to see exactly how it might work, and who would be his master. He would give this official report, subject, I understand you to say, to the correction of the Judge. I think you said, in answer to various Commissioners, that if he exceeded he would be liable to have his licence revoked by the Judge?—That would keep the papers right. If he sent out a report that was not proper, the papers would be in a position to say: "We have not done anything we should not do; "we have simply taken the official report," in other words, making somebody else resposible and not us.

37,534. That would save editors trouble, but the question is whether it would meet the public case and would be workable from the Judge's point of view. It would make the Judge practically into an editor of the official report?—I do not see that.

37,535. Shall we say, the censor of the official report?—I do not know that he need censor. I should be against putting it any further. I think the Judge ought to be absolutely free from any outside duty of that sort.

37,536. You said if the reporter offeuded, the Judge or the Court would have the power of revoking the licence, which would be controlled by the Court otherwise?—He would not interfere with the report at the time beyond perhaps an occasional remark that certain evidence was not to appear.

37,537. The Judge's business would be to revoke the licence?—If the man continually sent out reports that were objectionable and were not the sort of reports he was put there to do, he would have to be got rid of and somebody else appointed.

37,538. I am not saying it is a wrong suggestion. I want to get at who you think would discharge that duty?—I cannot say at the moment who would do it. There are plenty of men who could be got to do it. There are official shorthand-writers in the Court now.

37,539. It is not who would discharge the duty of official reporter, but the duty of censor to the official reporter, because the point of the suggestion is that the official reporter should be kept within bounds and subject to some restraint on the part of the Court—is not that it?—I can only say, speaking off-hand, that the President of the Divorce Court would have the power to dismiss or censure the man who gave the reports, but he would not do it in Court. He would do it if he objected to the reports he saw. In a very short time the man would learn what the President would allow and not allow, and the kind of evidence he would give, and would send out quite fair reports.

37,540. I am not saying it would be objectionable, but practically the rule of reporting under that condition would be what the President would or would not allow?—You must not take it that is necessarily how it would work out. I have given the suggestion of an official reporter without having worked out the details, which can be done better by somebody else. It may be somebody else could be chosen instead of the President of the Divorce Court to look after this reporting.

37,541. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) In local cases that are tried in the London Court, is it the invariable rule that those cases are reported in the local newspapers?—I should not say it is the invariable custom, and that is what I think is rather an injustice, because it seems to me that certain people get punished——

37,542. I am not talking about divorce proceedings, but generally. Supposing there is a case of interest at Manchester tried in the London Courts, would you expect to find a full report of that in the Manchester papers?—Yes, if it was a local case.

37,543. That is the rule?—Yes.

37,544. Sometimes you will find the report more fully in the local paper than in the London paper?—Yes, if a local case.

37,545. (Chairman.) To explain what you said about an official reporter, I suppose if he was a salaried official, it would not be very much to his interest to expand his reports?—No.

37,546. And secondly, it would prevent competition between one paper and another to expand reports. Those two things would come in to make the report, even if there was no control, a more curtailed and more uniform report?—Yes, it would put all the papers—this is the point I want to urge more than anything—if any regulations are made they must be made in such a way that all the papers are on the same line.

37,547. You are not in favour of closing courts. You are aware in certain special classes of cases where it is offensive matter, incest cases, nullity cases, and the cases that are all held with closed doors, no harm appears to result?—Yes, I know it does not, but I have my ideas about closing the Court except for these extreme cases.

37,548. Why should not the ordinary divorce case come within the same category? It is a matter which is of no real public interest in the case of hundreds of these people, these undefended cases?—I think probably my objection is more a sentimental one than anything else.

37,549. That led me to ask you. In whose interest do you think the official reporter would be acting? What benefit or interest would the public get from reading reports of that kind?—I do not know that they would get any particular benefit, but it is news, and it is interesting news to people who know the parties to the action.

37,550. They must know without any reporting at all?—If they know them intimately.

37,551. I want to thank you very much for your evidence. I see you not only have been good enough to present your case, but you have carefully studied the matter in order to do so?—I have read the subject a good deal.

Mr. John Thomas Smith called and examined.

37,552. (Chairman.) You are Chairman of the Central London Branch of the National Union of Journalists?—Yes.

37,553. That Union has about 2,000 members?—Yes.

37,554. You have presented in your memorandum the results of your consideration of this matter, and I will take you through it as it stands. You say "The exclusion of the Press would not result in the attainment of the desired end, i.e., the prevention of all objectionable reports. Such reports are far more frequent in other cases than those heard in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty division." What are the other cases to which you refer?—Police court cases, certain cases at the Central Criminal Court. I make more particular reference to bastardy cases and indecent cases, which in provincial papers are reported at nauseous length.

37,555. They have not the continuity of the Divorce Court sitting every day?—They are very frequent, and there are remands which are reported, and the Quarter Sessions or Assizes, to which they go locally, where they are again brought into publicity.

37,556. If it is an evil to report any of them, it does not improve matters by allowing the whole to be reported; if it is an evil to report two things it would be an improvement if one was cut out and one left?—Yes. I was going to submit it would be unfair to a portion of the Press which uses the Divorce Court to shut them out of that court and allow entry in other courts in which more objectionable things transpire.

37,557. Except that two wrongs would not make it a right, if it were a wrong?—That is so.

37,558. You say such exclusion would result in many evils, far greater in total than those which now exist, and that the present practice is a safeguard against bribery and blackmail. Will you explain what is meant there?—It is a very large question. In the first place, everyone who knows anything about reporting in London knows that reporters are very frequently offered money to keep things out of the papers, and that money is just as frequently refused. In my experience, which runs into 18 years, in Fleet Street. I have known one case only in which a reporter accepted a monetary consideration. That was a very large monetary consideration to keep a case out of the papers. Although it did not occur in the Divorce Court, it bears on what I say, that publicity in any court of justice is a safeguard against bribery. You are aware that a coroner has great freedom in the exercise of his duties: he can hold his court when and where he chooses, and exclude or let in the public as he wishes. The result is in a great many coroner's courts one never knows the hour at which they will sit, and frequently no one, excepting the coroner and his officer and the jury and the witnesses, know where to go. In this case a coroner held a court, very few people were there except the persons taking part, and there was only one accredited representative of the Press and he was a very young man indeed. I should say the person on whom the inquest was being held was a woman in some way connected with a member of a very wealthy family then resident in London,

37,559. I see your point?—I will not say that representative was a man of this kind, but at any rate a solicitor there was able, by the offer of a considerable sum to this young man, to induce him to suppress the report of that inquest. That report was suppressed for three or four weeks, and then, by some means, it became known in America, from which country the wealthy man came, that an inquest had been held on this lady who had had some relations with him. Investigations, in which I took a small part, showed that there was no doubt the young man had received money for not reporting the inquest, and some very scathing comments were passed on English courts and methods in the American press, one or two New York papers going so far as to say that the suppression of such an inquest by such a means would have been impossible in the United States.

37,560. The point I was upon was rather this, that fear of publicity had not deterred the parties from committing the act of which they were ashamed. I want to see whether you appreciate the distinction between a deterrent which prevents the act which is wrong, and the publicity which makes people desire that that act should be kept out of court. The only thing we are concerned with here is whether it is a deterrent on the commission of wrong?—Yes, I venture with great respect to think it has that effect. To give perhaps a somewhat trite case, take that of a man who is afraid of getting drunk publicly in London because he knows he will be fined at the Police court the next day.

37,561. Do you think prohibiting publication, if the only consideration were the prevention of some acts of wrong, or the great mass of reports with which the world is flooded, is the greater evil?—In the sum total I think the evils which would result from the complete closing of the courts are the greater. I was going, with your Lordship's permission, to talk about blackmail.

37,562. That is in your paper?—Yes.

37,563. You say the existing law, if efficiently administered, would put a stop to present abuses. Perhaps you would kindly read on from there?—I go on to say the present practice is a safeguard against bribery and blackmail. Bribery would operate with a view to the official reporters keeping the case out of the papers. Blackmail would be administered by the unscrupulous publisher to interested parties with the threat of publication if they did not pay. If the Divorce Court were completely closed to the Press—and there are those in our Union who think with me—I am afraid that evil would begin to be felt.

37,564. Not if not allowed to publish evidence?—There are so many persons present in the Divorce Court that it would be very difficult absolutely to prevent every person present in the course of the hearing of a case from giving his version of it to some interested party outside.

37,565. That would be contempt of Court and would be stopped?—Then we come to the other point. It would pay people to get outside of the jurisdiction of the English contempt of Court and publish just across the Channel.

37,566. It would make no difference if prohibited from selling here?—I know the jurisdiction is universal, but the fact that these reports did come into the country——

37,567. They could not, if they were not allowed to be sold?—They would be conveyed here. Later on I point out the difficulties you would be under if you endeavoured to make a law which had that effect.

37,568. You think they might be imported?—Yes.

37,569. It is no good importing if they are not allowed to sell them. You are confining your attention to the actual publication by the publisher. Any prohibition would extend to prohibit the exhibition for sale?—Your difficulties would be as great as they are now, because you have the right now to prevent the publication or selling of any indecent report.

37,570. Assuming they are not indecent, but yet objectionable. I do not see the difficulty which I have read in the rest of the proof about publishing in the Isle of Man and bringing it into this country. I am afraid you omitted to notice that you could prohibit the sale and distribution just as well as publication?—You could prohibit it, but there are many things brought into the country now: for instance, lottery circulars are strictly prohibited, but they are dealt in. You find prosecutions for them every now and then, and for one case there are numbers of others.

37,571. That is dealt with in your next paragraph. Will you continue reading?—Further, it would prevent a public record of many cases which a respondent or co-respondent defends with the object of vindicating his or her innocence. "I want my character cleared!" is what such persons practically say, and in most cases they attain their wish under present conditions. Again, if there were no reportors present, a number of valuable comments by the judge, and many a useful summing-up, would be lost to the public. All degrees of guilt would be as one—there would be no record as to whether the jury retired for two hours or gave a verdict without leaving the box: there would be no explanation as to reasons for decision in cross-petitions. Recent legislation has been in the direction of enlarging the privileges of the Press: e.g., admitting them expressly of legal right to the meetings of local authorities, and to children's courts even when the public are excluded; to exclude them from an important division of the Supreme Court would be a reversal of this tendency. Unless the Press is excluded, too, from the Police court in separation cases you will have poor folks' matrimonial troubles reported at length, especially in the provinces, while persons who can afford to use the Divorce Court will go free—which amounts to one law for the rich and another law for the poor. Indecent reports are far more frequent in connection with other courts than with the Divorce Court. One or two weekly journals which must be known to the Commissioners simply reek of such stuff. I was proposing to hand in a cutting from one Sunday newspaper which I do not desire to name because I do not wish to make that journal appear worse than others. I do not wish to make any invidious distinction.

37,572. We have plenty of copies of the papers ourselves?—Similar reports, though not conveying such bad moral effect, could be found weekly. Most of the Commissioners have country residences, and will be aware how fully bastardy cases, indecent assaults, and the like are reported in local sheets. Divorce reports are purity itself compared with the adjoining columns of paternity cases. The exclusion of the Press from the Divorce Court cannot prevent these; the present law can, if properly used. There are other aspects of the matter. Every journalist is familiar with the fact that money is frequently offered to the Press and as frequently refused. The members of the Union are absolutely unanimous in thinking that closed courts would lead to a great influx of cases. Only recently a member of the Union was offered 200*l.* to keep a case out of the newspapers. The offer was of course declined, and when the case was called on counsel announced that the parties had come to terms. Would they have come to terms if they could have kept the case out of the papers? Members of the Union have overheard counsel advising parties to settle on the grounds that they would thus avoid publicity. It is the rarest thing in the world for a London reporter to be bribed. But the moment the proceedings approach to a private sitting, bribery seems to become possible: for instance, the case in the Coroners' courts I mentioned just now. Publication inculcates fear: any editor will agree to that. One of the most painful experiences one can have is that of the penitent wife begging one to keep her name out of the papers. To do away with publicity would be to lose a valuable moral sanction.

37,573. That is the difficulty I feel. You are dealing with a case in which publicity is allowed as it stands, and it has not prevented the penitent wife from committing the wrong she has done. At present it does not prevent it?—I submit it may have prevented other women from doing that wrong, knowing they would have to go to the Divorce Court and face consequent publicity. The suggestion that newspapers should be provided with the results only, or with a précis of the case by the judge, is, I respectfully submit, impracticable. Newspapers would not publish results. They would convey nothing to their readers; and space is so valuable in the modern daily papers that such a course would be out of the question. And what editor would publish a judge's précis unless he had some guarantee or indemnity that no libel action should follow? Reporting cases takes years of practice; and there are pitfalls well known to the journalist which the judge would not trouble about. Parties to the actions would, rightly, strongly object to this form of report. A further point we submit is, why should this additional duty be placed upon the judge, who, in taking charge of a case in this particular court has quite enough on his hands without having to act as quasi editor or reporter? Again, supposing the jury disagree, and no report is supplied, in what sort of position is the co-respondent?

In the case of Fowler v. Fowler and Esson, a cross-petition in which judgment was given on the 18th March 1910, both petitions were dismissed. I prepared this evidence some months ago for the earlier sitting of the Commission, but you were not able to hear me. That will account for the date being March Of what use would be just the names and result in a case of this sort? Nothing would be conveyed to the public as to whether both were guilty or innocent. The President of the Commission has doubtless been the judge in cases where counsel in cross-examination has discovered that an important witness has been obtained solely because he has read the case in the papers and at once communicated with the solicitors for one side or the other. Members of the Union know cases in which co-respondents have come to the Press box and asked if the cases which they are defending are going to be reported. It is well known in the districts in which they live that they have been cited as co-respondents and they naturally wish their denials to be reported whether they lose or win the case. A person may suffer a very grave injustice in a small town where he or she is well known. With secret courts, his or her side of the case would never be known, except perhaps that he or she has been found guilty. There would be no statement to the effect that the jury took two or three hours to consider the verdict—a most important item in a strongly contested case, as showing that even the jury were in doubt. To a person who had been defending a case this would be most important, but nothing would be heard of it in closed courts. On the 11th April of this year a case came before Mr. Justice Bargrave Deane, Browne v. Browne, which shows the value of publicity. Perhaps I may read an extract. "Mr. "J. Harvey Murphy, for the petitioner, stated that "some evidence of the value of reporting these cases "was to be found in the fact that after the reports of "the proceedings for restitution of conjugal rights, "petitioner received an anonymous letter stating that "respondent had stayed with another woman at an "hotel at Tonbridge. Inquiries showed this to have "been true. Petitioner gave evidence in support of "her case, and his lordship pronounced a decree nisi "with costs." That extract is taken from the "Daily Telegraph" of Tuesday, April 12th, 1910. The second category to be found in my evidence relates to the exclusion of the Press, which we think would result in many evils. These would be principally bribery not to insert a case, and blackmail by unscrupulous journals, levied under threat of publishing a case. This is the actual condition of things in the financial world. The present practice is a safeguard against both. The present law, properly enforced, is sufficient to abolish all the evils complained of. But it is suggested with great respect that in order to obtain the best results in suppressing objectionable reports which appear in a minute portion of the Press, the Press itself should be consulted. As journalists, we could provide a workable scheme.

37,574. What is that?—It would take a good deal of time if I were to elaborate that.

37,575. Take the leading features?—In the first place the editor of a paper is a very human person, and if you can convince him his extensive publication of divorce cases was against public morality he would be prepared to listen to such representations, and I have no doubt if The Newspaper Society were appealed to and other organisations of proprietors, they would do all they could to put an end to it so far as their members were concerned.

37,576. That does not agree with the evidence we have had, that the pressure on the individual by other papers is so great he cannot carry out the standard he would like to act upon?—You could not carry it out by an individual newspaper, but by the Societies of Newspapers, such as the Newspaper Society, and any Federation of Newspaper Proprietors.

37,577. The tendency since the Act of 1870 to develop a lower class of readers has been the opposite way?—I do not know that the Act has developed a lower class of reader. It has made reading more general.

37,578. That means a man who did not read before does read now. The tendency, we are told, is to produce a craving for a sensational highly descriptive account amongst a very large circle of readers which apparently the Union of the Press Associations is not able to cope with?—One might reply that they have not been asked. These Societies have great influence.

37,579. If the evidence we have had is correct, they have been asked by the complaints made, that the papers are not such as they would like to see on their table?—My experience is that complaints of that sort are not so frequent as you may gather from the evidence this morning. I am speaking as a London journalist. We have heard a gentleman from Liverpool and one from Manchester, who are very competent to judge of what happens in those towns, but speaking of London, I should not say there are many of those complaints.

37,580. You seem to look at the thing rather from the point of view of the parties concerned in the litigation, and you do not seem to take any general view as to the effect on the nation of literature of this character, to the extent the statistics we have had show, I do not see any notice of its effect upon the general public of readers?—First, the matter of the actual publication of news is one which rests finally with the proprietors of the paper. I have the honour here to represent to-day working journalists. I am prepared to make suggestions about the publication of evidence, but that would not be strictly within my province as representing the working journalists.

37,581. Will you give your own view?—My own view is that which I have just put before you briefly. If the societies of newspaper owners and the various kindred organisations throughout the country are appealed to they could do something to stop the publication of extremely offensive details. It is only a minute portion of the Press in which these details appear. It is true you had a set of figures this morning which I have not had the advantage of perusing, which tend to show a great deal of space is taken up with Divorce Court reports, but that is not the same as saying those columns contain matter which is nauseous. The papers which habitually print such matter could be counted almost on the fingers of one hand in London, and there is no doubt that the moral pressure of the rest could affect them.

37,582. I do not think it is suggested any of the reports in the papers are what you would call indecent or nauseous. The point is, continually calling attention, through the reports of these cases, to the sexual question, which is naturally one that appeals to young people. However, I have finished your paper, and I will leave other members of the Commission to take it up.

37,583. (Mr. Spender.) You say in your proof that the exclusion of the Press would result in bribery and blackmail by unscrupulous journals, levied under a threat of publishing a case. You said something about that being the practice in some other department?—In the financial world.

37,584. I do not see what is common between the cases?—Take a concrete example. The chairman of a public company has a meeting at which something untoward is likely to happen. An unscrupulous financial paper hears of this and brings pressure to bear upon that particular chairman, telling him if he does not agree to pay them a certain sum—it may be by way of advertisement, it may be by way of actual handing over of cash—they will report his meeting in full. That is one concrete case. That is always happening.

37,585. Those two cases would not be parallel, because in the financial case it would be within the power of the newspaper to publish the facts if it chose, subject to the law of libel, and if it was true the law of libel would have no terror for him; but in the supposed case of the Divorce Court, if publicity were prevented there could be no possibility of publication except on pain of coming under the jurisdiction of the Court immediately. In one case you would be trying to blackmail on the threat you would do something illegal, which would not have any terrors, and in the other case you could blackmail on the possibility of doing something which is quite legal?—I submit that the result would be very much the same. If the man paid the money he would not understand the conditions as well as you do, and even if the Court were a closed Court, interested parties could be obtained.

37,586. It is not a question of closed Courts here. It is a question of the publication of reports being rendered illegal, as you say in a previous part of your proof. If publication were rendered illegal you would not suggest any unscrupulous journalist could blackmail on a threat to bring himself under the pains and penalties of the law by publishing it?—I should not be surprised if such a thing happened. I think it is very likely indeed.

37,587. It is rather remote?—No, I do not think it is remote.

37,588. You suggest a kind of voluntary pressure undertaken by the various organisations?—That is only part of my suggestion.

37,589. May I follow that part. Do you think any of those organisations would be willing to undertake it? Have you any evidence?—I have no evidence that they would not be willing. I should think, rather than run the risk of legislation excluding the Press from the Court, they would be willing to take some action of that sort.

37,590. We have had some evidence put before us of their reluctance to have any change?—Only resolutions they have passed. You have had no evidence put before you to show they would not be willing to modify their reports of divorce cases. You have had evidence to show they do not want the right of the Press to enter into the Courts modified.

37,591. Do you not think they would say, "It is all "very well for us to make a rule, but that will only "lead to newspapers starting outside and running in "competition with the papers owned by our mem-"bers"?—There is that possibility.

37,592. I submit it is rather an important possibility. Your view is mainly on behalf of the working journalists. You have given some evidence that the pressure which is brought to bear, which I think every editor who has come here has said has been brought on him, is brought to bear on the reporter as well as on the newspaper itself?—Pressure to keep the case from being published?

37,593. Yes?—Yes. The pressure occurs in two places: one is in the Divorce Court itself.

37,594. Actually in the Court itself?—Yes, and the other is at the office of the newspaper. With the latter I am more familiar than the former.

37,595. You were speaking of the former?—Yes.

37,596. Is it your view that that pressure is often applied in the Divorce Court?—It is often attempted to be applied by the parties.

37,597. Or their representatives?—Yes.

37,598. And money offered?—Attempted; it is never applied. Members of the Union have been offered money, and I quoted a case of a man being offered 200*l.* to keep a case out of the paper.

37,599. Is the case reported to your Union, as a rule? Have you any means of dealing with that?—We never notice that.

37,600. (The Archbishop of York.) You suggest if appeals were made to newspaper societies there might be some diminution of the amount of space given to divorce proceedings or the character of the reports, It is difficult for the general public to know who these associations of newspapers are?—I was not thinking so much of appeals by the general public as of appeals from authoritative sources, for instance, the Treasury or the Home Office, who undertake a prosecution for an indecent postcard or book. In the same way they might write a letter to these gentlemen pointing out that certain reports in certain papers were somewhat objectionable, and asking if they could bring their own personal influence to bear.

37,601. That would be very like having a censor of the Press installed in the Home Office and the Treasury?—I think it would avoid the censorship, because you make the papers censor themselves.

37,602. It means somebody whose business it was to read the reports in the newspapers?—That is so.

37,603. I suggest anything approaching a censorship of the press in this country would not be regarded favourably?—You have that official already in the case of indecent books and pictures, and so forth. There is an official.

37,604. I want to get at the source from which you wanted the pressure to come?—I would like these men to act as their own censors, and be told that "This is objectionable: cannot you put a stop to it?"

37,605. That means somebody whose business it is to read the reports to see if they are objectionable. Supposing such appeals made from any public quarter, either official or unofficial, succeeded, and the clients of any newspaper society agreed to limit the amount of space allotted, or change the character of their divorce proceedings, would not that only be increasing the circulation of the less desirable type of journals?—Nearly every journal belongs to one or other of these societies. There is practically no journal of any repute or large circulation outside all of them.

37,606. I speak in ignorance of these matters, but if that were so, are the particular newspapers we have had so much evidence about under the control of some general board or body?—No. Most newspapers belong to one society or another. The Newspaper Society is a Society of Proprietors of Newspapers. There is the Northern Federation of Owners and the Southern Federation of Owners.

37,607. The class we have had mainly before us of weekly and Sunday papers, without any hesitation, as I understand, deliberately furnish materials for this public appetite. Is not their motive quite frankly to secure the money value of a large circulation?—I would rather leave the proprietor himself to answer that, but I will go so far as to say there is no doubt a demand among a certain class of the public for that particular style of reporting.

37,608. I am sorry to be obliged to ask you that question. Perhaps you can help me and some of the other Commissioners by explaining why it is, when this is a matter of such wide public importance, the proprietors or representatives of these different associations have not come to give us the benefit of asking them questions?—I am afraid I cannot reply with any definite knowledge as to that.

37,609. It puts us in some difficulty. We should like to ask what the attitude of associations of newspaper proprietors would be on these matters, but with the exception of one or two individuals they have not enabled us to ask them questions. You must forgive my putting it to you?—I should be only too happy to enlighten you on any point on which I have knowledge.

37,610. That being so, we cannot get much further with the suggestion that possibly appeals to these gentlemen might result in some change being made without the necessity of changing the law?—I was going to add to that suggestion that a similar suggestion might be made to large wholesale publishing houses, some controlled by men of high personal character: for instance, W. H. Smith & Son, and Horace Marshall. If similar pressure could be brought to bear on them to that which could be brought on owners, some useful purpose could be served.

37,611. I should like to have the opportunity of asking some of the proprietors. I do not press that further. With regard to the point you make in your précis about the reporting of separation cases in the police court, are they largely reported now?—They are only reported to a moderate extent in London, but in the provinces they are reported at great length. A separation case, after all, has a very human interest, just as a divorce case has.

37,612. Your point is that if matrimonial cases in the High Court or in any Divorce Court were forbidden, it would be necessary to forbid also the reporting of separation cases in police courts?—Yes.

37,613. You say also you think that newspapers would not publish the names and the results if that were all?—As a general rule that would be so.

37,614. Why, is it not a matter of public interest?—No, except in very few cases. Unless the parties were known there would be no meaning in that.

37,615. That implies the only reason why anything more is published is not because of the public interest but merely because of the details?—There can be public interest in the hearing of a case, but not public interest in merely the names.

37,616. Is not that very much the same thing? What the public wants are details, and are not the least interested in the names of the parties?—In some cases that would be so. There may be a very striking divorce case in which some remarkable evidence is given. In that case the interest would not lie in the names of the parties. On the other hand, there may be a divorce case of an every-day character in which well known persons are concerned. In that case the interest would lie more in the names of the persons than the details of the evidence.

37,617. If that would be the course newspapers would adopt, would not that be practically this, that the papers were not concerned to give the public news of public interest, but simply to give details of a certain class of case which suited a certain public appetite?—That is so with regard to a small number of papers.

37,618. Surely the better class papers would as a matter of course publish the names and the results of matrimonial actions as a matter of genuine public interest?—I submit there would be no public interest in them. You will find the better class papers—I have not seen your statistics, so that I am giving my opinion, which may be checked or contradicted by that—give a great many columns every day to Divorce Court cases, in comparison with some papers not quite so good.

37,619. I want to know why papers would not publish a record of divorce proceedings unaccompanied by details?—I believe in the Divorce Court, sometimes they run to 15 or 20 cases a day. Perhaps not one has any real public interest. It would serve no good purpose and only take up space in a first class paper to publish three lines giving the names and the result. It would be most uninteresting to the ordinary public.

37,620. I am afraid we use the word "interest" in a different way?—The way in which I use the word "interest" would be whether it is readable matter for the every-day sane healthy-minded citizen, whether it is interesting news to the every-day sane healthy-minded citizen.

37,621. (Lord Guthrie.) Is your Union confined to English journals, or does it include Scotch and Irish?—It includes both Scotch and Irish. We have a number of branches in Scotland and two or three in Ireland.

37,622. Does it include those who are connected with the Sunday papers in London?—Yes, it includes a number of man who are connected with the Sunday papers in London.

37,623. Is there any corresponding institution for the proprietors of newspapers?—Yes, several. There is the Newspaper Society, and there are various societies in the provinces, The Northern Federation of Newspaper Proprietors, and The Southern Federation of Newspaper Proprietors.

37,624. Do the Sunday paper proprietors belong to any federation?—Yes, I know they do, but I could not charge my memory at this moment with stating whether they are members of the Newspaper Society, or whether they have a small society of their own? I know they are in a society.

37,625. Is it the case that the ordinary undefended case in the Divorce Court is not reported anywhere at all?—As a rule not anywhere at all, except that if it is a local undefended case it is reported in the papers in that locality. If the parties come from Manchester there will be a few lines in the Manchester papers about it.

37,626. Take a London undefended case, where the parties are not well known, and there are no spicy details; that is not reported at all?—As a rule it is not.

37,627. So that the present system, if there is any deterrent in reporting, does not supply that deterrent except in the case of probably a minority of cases?—That is so, in the defended cases.

37,628. Do you admit that there is any abuse at the prcsent moment in the publication of divorce cases?—It is a very difficult matter for one individual journalist to say. I am quite willing to add to that, I think there is abuse to a very slight extent.

37,629. That is to say, matter which is unfit for young people to read?—There is a moderate amount of that matter in a certain section only of the Press.

37,630. Is it your view that in the leading London papers—put aside the Sunday papers altogether—there is appearing from time to time matter in connection with divorce cases totally unfit for young people to read?—A very small amount of such matter.

37,631. But there is some, even in the best papers, where the parties are eminent or the details remarkable?—Yes, there must be a certain modicum of such matter if you are to give a fair report of a case.

37,632. So that if such matter is to be excluded. do you see any other way than by prohibiting the publication of the details of divorce cases?—Yes, the present law against the publication of obscene matter would affect the publication of some of these cases if it were put into operation.

37,633. Take, for instance, the letters that appear in such cases, and which are printed in the best papers: do you see any interest to be served by the publication of such letters, which may not be absolutely obscene but which are offensively suggestive? What do you say to letters being published, not incidents, but letters?—If you will forgive me, I would rather not generalise, but certainly in particular cases such letters should not be published.

37,634. Supposing that the law were that there should be no publication of divorce cases until a month had elapsed after the case had been tried, what effect would that have? Would most of them be published at all?—They would not be news then. A newspaper exists for news, and when tidings are a month old they lose almost all their value as news.

37,635. You referred to a case where 200*l.* had been offered to keep a case out of the papers, and a member of the Union reported that. Was the offer made to a working journalist?—Yes.

37,636. In the Court?—Yes.

37,637. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I do not think you quite made your point in answer to His Grace, the point I think you meant to make. Your view is that if merely the names of the parties in a divorce suit were published it would have no market value, as news it would not be published?—That is so.

37,638. It might be published in the "Times" or a semi-official paper, but the ordinary papers would not publish it?—Yes.

37,639. Are you confirmed in that view by the fact that long strings of undefended cases to-day are not published?—The names do not appear in the papers?—I believe that is so.

37,640. On the other hand, it is suggested that it is the undesirable part of the reports that makes them marketable and makes papers publish them. That is not necessarily so at all. What makes the newspapers publish the report of any other case, say a libel case, something where there is no prurient interest of any kind? What is it that makes it good news?—It is what we call its news value. It is a thing that is understood, if I may say so, perfectly well by journalists, but it is its interest as news.

37,641. It is a story with a human interest in it?—Everything has a certain news value. An experienced journalist can tell at once. He tries to fill his paper, regardless of anything else, with material of news value. He knows how to make it interesting to his reader the next morning.

37,642. Without any reference to sexual matters?—Exactly. As a journalist of considerable experience I have been in entire charge of a daily paper in London for brief periods, and second in command for very long periods, I should like to say this. The public has no conception of the amount of offensive matter jettisoned every night in a daily newspaper. You may see a few lines in a whole issue which may offend your taste, but that is nothing in comparison with the enormous amount thrown away every night. We—I say "we" because I regard myself as an average journalist with average views on this matter—we go on the basis of making the paper as interesting as possible, but only on condition that we do not offend the public morals and taste. I have thrown away many an excellent thing because there is some little flaw in it, something which might offend the public, which has led to its doom, whereas another paper would have given it. We generally find the journalist act on that principle, to give as interesting a paper as he can without offending the public taste.

37,643. Your view, I take it, is that the reason it pays to report any case, divorce, libel or ejectment, is that there is a story with human interest in it which the public will read?—Yes.

37,644. That element would be lost if you only published the names of the parties and the result?—You have put it most excellently.

37,645. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) Following up that, of course there are many interests which all classes have in common, with the particular details of particular cases?—Yes.

37,646. Lord Guthrie put to you a question that as there are several undefended cases not reported it may be that the reports do not have any deterrent effect, but may I suggest to you that people do not know what cases are going to be reported, and they do not know whether that particular case will be reported or not?—That is so, but their legal advisers know that an undefended case runs very small risk of being reported, and it is conceivable that the Solicitor or Counsel may advise his client not to defend the case knowing that not defending the action will probably result in non-appearance of the case in print.

37,647. Do you agree with the last two witnesses that the non-publication of reports in the Divorce Court may lead to many divorces by arrangement if the parties can carry them through in private?—I have no doubt at all about that.

37,648. You said if you suppressed the publication of the divorce cases, the reports might be taken over the water and sent back again in the shape of publication here?—Yes.

37,649. The Chairman suggested there would be a difficulty in doing that because the newspapers that published it might be liable for contempt of court; but supposing that the paper was published in Paris and simply sent over here for distribution in that way, they might evade the law which prohibited the publication?—Speaking as a journalist, I should not say that was an evasion of the law. I was rather thinking if you succeed by that method in preventing the publication of news, it would be a much more cumbrous method than the present method. As a matter of fact it does not prevent the publication of such news. Take the case the reverse way round. In Paris some years ago, there was a divorce in which an Irish lady and gentleman were concerned. I do not think I need mention names. It was of some interest to both French and English readers. In France, as the Commissioners are well aware, especially since the information read out this morning, the publication of divorce reports is forbidden, but not only did the details of that case become known, but they were published over here in the English Press, in spite of the ban which the French law puts on the publication of reports, and to my knowledge papers containing this information were sent back to France.

37,650. (Chairman.) I suppose there was no law in France to stop them being sent back?—But there is a law to stop publication altogether.

37,651. That is publication in France.

37,652. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) Publication and selling are two different things. You might have a paper published and printed in France and sent over to the newsagent here and sold?—That is so.

37,653. I rather gather that is what you meant in your proof. The reports could be got here in that way.

(Chairman.) There is nothing to stop you selling it here at present, but there might be something to stop publication, or to stop posting. It is all a question of form.

37,654. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) Is this question of suppressing the publication of divorce cases only part of a very much larger question? If you suppress the divorce proceedings, must you not suppress penny novelettes which may do as much mischief as any publication of divorce cases?—That is a very interesting question. I should like to answer it, but I have no personal knowledge or right to speak about the effects of the penny novelette. I could speak with some knowledge of the effects of newspapers, but I am afraid it would take me beyond my range.

37,655. It would involve the question of suppressing reports in every Court in which there may be cases the reports of which may lead people into mischief by perusing the reports?—That is so. One of the points I endeavoured to make in my evidence was that it would be most unfair to shut one little branch of the Courts in the country, and say because some objectionable reports emanate from this Court therefore this particular Court should be shut up, allowing the huge percentage of Police Courts, Quarter Sessions, Assizes, the Central Criminal Court and others, to be open to the Press in the ordinary way, in which there are details as nauseous and more in quantity to be found than in the Divorce Court.

37,656. You think the question should be considered as a whole, and not piecemeal merely by dealing with the divorce law?—That is so.

37,657. (Mr. Brierley.) Why should it be considered unjust to close one particular class of Court if that particular class of Court is found to be the one which does most harm?—I am not prepared to admit it does most harm.

37,658. Supposing it was thought that there was a very much larger amount of publication of proceedings in that Court than any other which did harm, why should it be unjust to attack that particular class of publication?—It would be singling out one class of offender from all the others, and making an invidious distinction.

37,659. The public benefit would be a real matter to be considered. Is not this the important question: supposing you closed the newspapers to the publication of details of any divorce cases, do you think it would lead to the publication of more cases of the other kind you mention?—I am afraid it would have that tendency.

37,660. You would fear that result would follow?—Yes.

37,661. These papers would devote more of their space to the publication of other unpleasant cases?—I am afraid that would be the result.

37,662. (Chairman.) With regard to your suggestion that it singles out one set of people, you are aware that is done in several kinds of cases at present?—They are very exceptional cases. You are alluding to nullity suits and incest cases?

37,663. They are not so exceptional we have heard from one of the witnesses lately, nor are nullity cases either. On what principle do you gather that they are excluded from the public?—I do not know what principle those who exclude them had in mind, but the principle that occurs to my mind is that there cannot be any possible public interest in a nullity case.

37,664. Why not, just as much as in a divorce case?—I should have imagined such a case would be very exceptional if it had any public interest whatever.

37,665. (Chairman.) It may be divorce cases have no public interest. I ought to thank you very much indeed for your evidence, which has evidently been fully thought out, and I am much obliged to you for attending?—It has been a great pleasure to me.

Mr. CHARLES MOBERLY BELL called and examined.

37,666. (Chairman.) You are managing director of "The Times"?—Yes.

37,667. Just to get it on the notes, how long have you had journalistic experience?—Forty-five years.

37,668. You begin your proof by saying that the question as to the advisability of restrictions on the publication of proceedings in the Divorce Court presents itself to you in two aspects, first, with regard to the interests of "The Times" alone without regard to the interests of the public, and secondly with regard to the interests of the public without regard to the interests of "The Times"?—Yes.

37,669. Will you elaborate that in your own way, or would you prefer to read it from your proof?—I do not know that I can state it more clearly than it is put here. I should like to say I think that the interests of the public ought clearly, in a case of this sort, to come before the interests of a private individual or a newspaper. So far as our interests are concerned, I have no hesitation in saying that if the publication of all reports of divorce proceedings and of many others of a similar unsavoury nature could be absolutely prohibited by legislation, "The Times," and I think every other respectable paper, would welcome it. This is not on the ground of expense, which is immaterial, but because while we dislike being the intermediary by which such details are published, we cannot, so long as it is permitted, altogether neglect reports which are of legal and public interest. That is the view if you look at "The Times" interest alone. I would go further—I happened to be driving home with the editor last night—he had read my memorandum—and he said he agreed with it on the one side and on the other—and he expressed it more strongly. He said "There is "nothing I should welcome more than to be forbidden "to print anything, but it must be universal."

37,670. Will you give us the ground upon which you and he think you would like it to be forbidden, if it was universal?—Mainly on the ground that it would give us more space. The great difficulty we have every day is to get the news into the paper, and we should be delighted if any one thing could be ruled out.

37,671. That is what you call the purely selfish aspect of the paper?—Yes. And also we do not like the responsibility of saying, "This is a matter of such "public importance that, although it is disagreeable "to report, we think we ought to report it," or, on the other hand, the responsibility of cutting out a thing when there may be something to be said in favour of reporting it. We should relieve ourselves of responsibility and give ourselves a great increase of space which we are always crying for.

37,672. Then will you deal with it from the other point of view, that is, the public point of view?—On the other side we feel this. The editor said it was his own view that the deterrent effect of publication was enormous. Twenty years ago when I first came to London as manager, hardly a day passed when the Courts were sitting that we were not pestered to keep things out, not always divorce cases, but mainly divorce, and we adopted the rule, about the year 1891, that if anyone applied to us or to our reporters to keep things out of the paper, then we would report it whether it was worth reporting or not, and the result of that is, it has been rather checked. But even now scarcely a week passes without our being directly or indirectly asked to keep a thing out. On one occasion, a very painful one, about 18 years ago, I believe it was solely owing to our refusing to guarantee, which we could not guarantee, that it would not appear in the Press, a case was stopped altogether.

37,673. That leads me to ask you this, whether when you speak of publication being deterrent you are speaking of it as being deterrent to the commission of the wrong or a deterrent to its being published afterwards, because this deterrent effect has not stopped divorce cases?—In that particular case it was not; the evil had been done, and it was the publicity that was not desired.

37,674. Is not that what is meant by most people when they speak of it as a deterrent?—I think not. Any person who went through the Parnell divorce case—I take that case because it was so notorious, and as the man is dead it will do no harm—would for some years be very careful that he did not put himself in the same position.

37,675. No man in his position who did such an act should fail to realise if it came out that it would be published throughout the world, but yet he was not deterred?—You must not say that because it did not deter one man it has no deterrent effect. In a large number of cases it must have a deterrent effect.

37,676. But possibly not in others?—No. The penalty of death does not deter Crippens, but it is a deterrent to many people against murder, and I believe the other is.

37,677. Except that you cannot commit a murder without it being necessarily published. It must be published afterwards. Adultery, as a rule, is not published?—I am speaking of the penalty of death as a deterrent in the same way as ridicule and contempt are deterrents in divorce.

37,678. If they think they are likely to run any risk of it coming out?—One has that risk before one always.

37,679. Assume there is some deterrent, on the other side, is not there a great public evil in scattering round the country the continued reporting of divorce cases? We have had a lot of evidence about that, and I should like to have your opinion upon it?—It is perfectly true, but it is rather a difficult question to answer. As a rule no harm is done, I think, by the sort of report that we publish. I think you can have a report that acts as a deterrent and does not act as a provocative. On the other hand, you can have reports that act more as a provocative than as a deterrent.

37,680. You said "we publish." Do you apply that to publications all over the country?—I am speaking of "The Times." I cannot speak for anyone else. I have seen reports in English papers which I think are very deplorable.

37,681. We have had some very strong evidence about it. For instance, I might recall at the moment one witness who was representative of 98 places. The witness was one of the chief constables who collected opinions as to the shocking effect on young people who read these cases. I want to know whether you think the public evil is outweighed by the more private point of a deterrent?—I should say the effect of reporting a murder case is infinitely greater and worse than reporting a divorce case. It is a known and admitted fact that publication of the details of a murder case has a very evil effect on small boys.

37,682. There is a tendency to follow the example?—Yes. There was a case the other day of a poor child who was strangled by another school boy pretending he was Crippen. That was a case that was in the paper the other day. If you can stop the publicity of all trials—if the public would allow that—there might be something for it. I think that a murder case does more harm than a divorce case.

37,683. The number of murder cases must be infinitesimal in proportion to the number of divorce cases?—Not only murder; there are other crimes.

37,684. That argument does lead one to follow out the idea that the publicity of divorce cases would have an effect in the same way?—I think to a certain extent it is true, and if there was no alternative between the horrible publication of divorce cases, which occurs sometimes in a very few papers, and absolute suppression, there might be a great deal to be said for absolute suppression. I do not see there is any need so long as you can control, as I believe you may, the methods of reporting.

37,685. That leads me to pass to the next paragraph of your proof, which deals with the suggestion of more effective control?—"A censorship on independent reports furnished to newspapers is impracticable. Conditions of time would not allow of its being performed before publication, and after it was published it would be useless. Moreover, it is open to to all the objections that have been brought against censorship of plays. But it would be possible for the Divorce Court to exercise an indirect, but I think effective, control over reports if the publication of any such report were forbidden unless signed by one of a corps of reporters licensed by the Divorce Court to report. Our own reports are all by barristers, and it would be advisable that the majority if not all of such reporters should be barristers, but exceptions might be made in favour of journalists of known repute. The Judges of the Divorce Court would have power to revoke the licence and the threat would tend to secure the propriety of the reports." I remember suggesting this to your predecessor, and he said he thought if anything were necessary that it was a good thing, but he was strongly of opinion that there was no necessity for any alteration.

37,686. Will you just finish the proof?—Yes. "This suggestion applies to the existing practice whereby these proceedings are limited to one court. If jurisdiction in divorce cases were given to County Court or other Judges the question of reports would of course become more difficult, and from this point of view—upon which alone I am called to express an opinion—would be very unfortunate. The papers published in large towns have a surplus of matter to publish, and divorce proceedings only are reported by respectable papers when their importance or interest justifies their claim on the small space at the disposal of the editor. But in some country towns there are papers which devote themselves mainly to local matters, and which must sometimes find it difficult to fill their columns. The report of proceedings in a divorce court concerning people in the neighbourhood would be a dangerous temptation, and I fear that such cases would be far more fully reported in the country than at present in London."

37,687. (Mr. Spender.) Your practical suggestion would transfer the responsibility from the editor to the Court?—Not entirely. The editor would always keep his responsibility in regard to the paper. The Court might even sanction the thing and say: "We have no "objection to it being published," and the editor might say, "I have no space for it," or "I do not think it of sufficient importance." The only check would be that you would have a certain body of men over whom the Judge of the Court would have a certain amount of control. If they found a man reporting a case too fully they would send for him and say to him: "Take care "or you will get your licence revoked."

37,688. A previous witness suggested one official reporter to serve all the papers. Would that appeal to you?—No.

37,689. You believe in a variety of reports?—You get a more certain impartiality if you have a variety of reports.

37,690. No one would say that the reporter was being controlled by the parties or by the Court?—Precisely.

37,691. That would not meet that case which has been frequently suggested to us as one of the difficulties, There would be no equality between the various newspapers. The competition between some papers wanting to give a longer report than others would go on?—It might go on, but there is no objection to the length of the report as long as it is inoffensive. Except in a very exceptional case like the Parnell case, or where a public man is concerned, we deal with it almost solely from the point of view of whether it is one of legal interest.

37,692. Frequently it has been suggested to us by witnesses that all the evidence you can give of a divorce case has a certain impropriety without being indecent, and that the cumulative effect of many columns of this added together in the weekly papers, which are alleged to be the worst offenders, has that result whether it is censored or not?—I agree.

37,693. So long as you have what the reporters call a story which you can give, or the materials for a story, this cumulative mass of reports will still go on, and that is alleged to be a great evil?—I see that and I think it is true, but if you had barristers as reporters, and you found a paper reporting week after week full details of divorce proceedings, you would send for that man and say to him, "You must not give this at that full length, "it is not a matter of sufficient importance"; the man would be amenable and would not do it.

37,694. When you say "you," whom do you mean?—The Judge.

37,695. You put it into the hands of the Judge?—I would leave it in the hands of the Judge or anyone else to call attention to it. I do not say that he should act from his own motive, but anyone who feels it is carried to too great an extent would report it to the Judge, and the Judge would send for the man and say to him, "You are giving details there is no necessity to give," and you would kill it in time.

37,696. Would you carry that a step further; in case of the newspaper resisting, would you provide any penalty?—Yes, I would provide some penalty for any paper that published a report which was not signed by a barrister. With a barrister you have a penalty if he disobeys the order of the Court, he will be summoned before his benchers.

37,697. You would be inclined to apply a penalty for continued excess of that kind?—Yes. A warning first, and after a time you would have to increase the penalty so as to make it prohibitive.

37,698. You would have a warning first and a penalty for continued excess, which you think would enable you to deal with the paper that inflicted this on its readers as a public nuisance?—It would not be often enforced, because it would begin to tell against the paper. Once it was known persons would hesitate to buy it. They would want to buy it but would not like to; they would not think it respectable.

37,699. Would you be willing to carry it as far as to allow a public department, the Public Prosecutor possibly, or the Judge, to have the right of warning newspapers which were notorious offenders?—Certainly in a case of that sort.

37,700. And in case the warning was disregarded, would you allow the law of indecency to be so extended that they could be brought before a jury for it and compelled to answer for it?—I should say it could be met by a fine for contempt of court, but I am not sufficient of a lawyer to know how that is.

37,701. Do you not think it would be more satisfactory to journalists if there were ultimately a jury trial, so that the jury can decide, as it does in libel actions, what is or what is not of public interest?—No, I do not think a jury, as a rule, are the persons to decide a thing of that sort.

37,702. You would not object to procedure of that kind?—You would have further publicity on the whole subject. I should rely on a certain esprit de corps among reporters if you do licence reporters. Take war correspondents, you have the same thing when you have them licensed. They behave better than when you have them cadging about on their own. The reporter, at least, would want to try and get a reputation for respectability, and his reports would be clean.

37,703. We agreed just now that it would not meet the case of a great mass of these reports appearing together in these weekly papers, which are supposed to be the most notorious offenders. They are not obscene now, but they could get the story out of these reports as well as out of any other, and they would add them together. The point in regard to these weekly papers is this. I am not assuming anything about them except what is put in evidence. I am only suggesting if, in spite of these precautions, they used these reports to excess, and printed this quantity of highly corrupting matter, you would be willing to treat them as a nuisance—to be warned and prosecuted if necessary?—Yes, first of all you would get rid of those reporters who reported in that way, till that newspaper would find no one who would report for them.

37,704. May I suggest that privacy naturally follows, as in France, with a general disposition to condone the offence and treat it as a matter of no concern to anyone but the parties. The publicity of the Divorce Court in this country rather lends itself to the view that the public is a third party?—I do not see your point, I am afraid I did not follow what you said at the beginning of your question.

37,705. In France you have it commonly said it is nobody's business except that of the parties, and that goes with the view of matrimony?—Except that of the parties?

37,706. That it is merely a private concern of two people whether they are married or not married, or the marriage is dissolved. In this country we act on the principle that the public is a third party to a marriage; it is a public thing, and therefore publicity in the press, in a sense, follows on that view of marriage, and the closing of the courts would go with the other view of marriage?—I think we have the general idea that proceedings in camera are liable to be unjust to one party or the other. It is the desire to do everything coram populo.

37,707. (The Archbishop of York.) You said with regard to "The Times," that you and the editor would be willing that all these matters should be forbidden, but if so, this must be universal. I did not gather whether you meant by universal to cover all newspapers?—Yes.

37,708. That was your meaning?—Yes.

37,709. You did not mean in that sentence to use "universal" in the sense that it must cover all reports?—No, the more it will cover the better we shall be pleased. I meant by "universal" that it must be obligatory on all newspapers.

37,710. In spite of what you said, if I may say so with truth, about the evils resulting from other kinds of reports, you adhere to what you said at the beginning, that if publication could be forbidden all round, the newspapers, as respectable newspapers, would welcome it?—Yes, from our selfish point of view.

37,711. With regard to the point of the general public, you spoke of the effect on public morality of certain other kinds of reporting; but does it follow because other kinds of reporting do evil, that therefore it is useless to touch this particular kind of reporting?—Not at all. I am using it as an argument. When you say this particular kind of reporting does evil, therefore it must be suppressed, the same thing would logically lead you to prevent the reporting of a murder trial.

37,712. A man would prefer to have a complete sanitary system in his house, but if he could stop one drain, even if a good many others were left open, he would do it without waiting for the complete system?—Possibly, but if you tell that man. We are going to try and save your life by stopping one drain and we are not going to try and do the others ——

37,713. It does tend to the promotion of your health at least to have this drain stopped. It is worth doing it?—It may be.

37,714. Your remarks do not mean that it is useless to stop one source of public corruption because there are others still left open?—No, if there is no alternative between the reports that are published in some papers and absolute prohibition, I do not know that there is not a great deal to be said for absolute prohibition, but it seems useless to do it when there is an alternative.

37,715. Coming to the alternative, there is this point about it, and I should like to have your opinion upon it. The result would be, if you had these licensed reporters, that practically, if not always really, the reports that were published would have the sanction of the Judge?—No, not quite that. After they were published, if the Judge did not reprimand, or if nobody reprimanded the reporter, then they would tacitly be sanctioned.

37,716. In so far as licences were given by the Judge and were liable to be withheld by the Judge, whatever reporting took place in the Court would be necessarily regarded by the public as licensed reporting?—Not entirely so. A clergyman may be licensed by his bishop, but the bishop is not responsible for every act of the clergyman.

37,717. Fortunately not; but at the same time the tendency would be to look upon whatever was published under these circumstances as on the whole good?—As a decent report, but of course the man might err on the Friday, make an improper report, and he would be called up by the Judge on the Saturday.

37,718. I only ask you because I want your own opinion upon it. Is not that to be a very great additional responsibility on the Judge?—I do not think so. In fact, speaking subject to correction, I think if the President of the Divorce Court now saw in "The Times" a thing which he thought ought not to have been reported, he would tell us, at least I am certain someone would. I say that because I frequently discussed the subject with the late Lord St. Helier, and he told me that he once or twice had occasion to speak to a newspaper about a report. He said: "I have "always found them greatly amenable to any sugges- "tion," and that was his reason for opposing any legislation on the subject. He said, "I have found I "can manage the papers perfectly well and on the "whole they were very just."

37,719. Do you think Lord St. Helier had his attention called very much to the reports in the kind of newspapers which have been most in evidence before us?—I do not know. I am bound to say until the question arose I did not know myself, nor do I know now, except from hearsay, the fact that these reports are sometimes of a very objectionable character.

37,720. I have frequently bought these newspapers in which practically divorce and crime are the main items of information?—I have heard that is the case.

37,721. Do you think it is likely that newspapers of that kind will be as amenable as other newspapers?—I do not suppose they would have been to a private suggestion, but I think once you have licensed reporters, you would get over that, because you would find persons would not report for that paper or those papers.

37,722. You have said some reporters would acquire a reputation for respectability?—Yes.

37,723. But the evidence we have had rather suggested that respectability does not pay?—Precisely. That is true, but if you refuse to license those men who send that sort of report or withdraw a licence, a man would not be able to get employment anywhere else. He could no longer get employment in that way if he did that.

37,724. Do you not think that there would be temptation on the part of the newspapers run by powerful financial interests, knowing the great circulation that would be got for any journal that was a little more spicy than the others were, to run these risks?—I do not think so, because I think you could make the fine prohibitive for one thing, and for another thing I am certain of this. We will say there is a paper called anything you like, bought very largely now and to a great extent bought by the people who want it precisely for these spicy reports. If that paper gets that reputation, half its clientèle will go; half of the people who buy it do not buy it for that, the other half do.

37,725. If it is plain that week after week what is purveyed is precisely this stuff, that seems to indicate that is what the great majority of its clients want?—Probably a majority, possibly half or more than half, but there will always be a certain number of people who do not buy it for that purpose. I know of a paper which I have not the least idea ever went in for that sort of thing and I know people who take it, and I know that they do not take it for that reason. If a paper gets branded with the name of impropriety, it will lose its circulation.

37,726. Is it not often the case, one of the reasons persons hesitate to brand a particular novel or illustrated paper is, that the branding will give it an advertisement that is worth a great deal to the novel or illustrated paper?—You fail to make a distinction. It is true as regards novels, it is untrue as regards newspapers. A large sale for a novel is 10,000. You may, by proclaiming its indecency, perhaps secure it that sale from a certain prurient class. A newspaper appeals to a much larger public, and a reputation for indecency, while it might add some purchasers, would drive off others.

37,727. That is your opinion at all events. I will not press it further now. Believing that, do you contemplate licensed reporters publishing fairly full reports of the proceedings, even although having regard to their licence they avoid anything that can be called indecent or obscene?—I think I should.

37,728. Is not the difficulty this, not so much that anything indecent or obscene is published, because most respectable papers now keep them out, but that what is undesirable is the purveying in respectable households of an immense amount of sordid sexual detail?—Excuse me, I should call that precisely as you do, indecent and improper. The style of report I should allow would be the style of report you will find in any number of the "Times,"—I am sorry to have to say the "Times," but I cannot put it in any other way because they are reports I know. I think we have had in the case of one or two cases probably three columns, and I should see no objection to other papers doing it.

37,729. I think if I may say so, very young persons are not likely to read the "Times"?—No, but I should not object to those three columns going into any paper, if they will report them.

37,730. Even so, speaking as I do with great respect to the "Times," I would suggest that a great many of the details that are published there are of the kind which are perpetually keeping the mind of the person who reads them upon the undesirable side of the sexual question, and if you have any reports that are at all full, that element is bound to come in. You do not object to that?—I am afraid that is a necessary evil and I see it. I think it is a lesser evil than the idea of doing away with them altogether.

37,731. To come to my last point, you think that the real value of the reports is the deterrent effect, and the deterrent effect is so powerful, that, for the sake of it, you are prepared to run the risk attending even a licensed system of reporting?—Yes, because I think the risks of a licensed system of reporting are extremely small, and I think the deterrent effect is extraordinary. I do not think anyone outside of a newspaper office can realise what the deterrent effect of divorce reports is.

37,732. Would you say there is a large number of persons who take the view I have heard expressed, that the only thing that matters is that nothing comes out?—Certainly; being found out is the danger and is what a great many fear. I do not say that it tends to make for morality, it does not, but it tends to prevent immorality very frequently.

37,733. (Lord Guthrie.) Your suggestion against the present system is in favour of having persons who would be subject to the Judge acting as reporters?—Yes. I do not want to lay much stress on "subject to the Judge." I think it would be sufficient if you had them all barristers, and I am certain that the Chairman would not say barristers were "subject to the Judge," but yet they are in the sense I mean. If you had them all barristers, you would be all right and there would be certain men of sufficient respectability who would be allowed to come in also.

37,734. Would that be good enough? You attach value to the deterrent effect?—Yes.

37,735. We are told out of 716 divorces last year that 554 were undefended. We are also told that undefended cases are scarcely ever reported?—Yes.

37,736. What becomes of the deterrent under the present system?—The deterrent acts upon the others.

37,737. Less than a quarter of the whole number?—You cannot speak of a report of a case acting as a deterrent on the parties to that case because the case is finished and over. It is the number of persons who have not come into the divorce court, who have been deterred.

37,738. Suppose you had a system under which people knew they would be reported if they came to the divorce court, would not that be a better plan from the point of view of a deterrent? All cases in Scotland defended or undefended are reported. From the point of view of a deterrent it is a better system, is it not?—Certainly it is an extended report.

37,739. Would it be in accordance with your view that cases that were not reported by the papers should be published in the interest of the State?—Yes, I do not see any harm in it. You mean that some official publication should publish those which are not reported by the public press.

37,740. Yes?—If you once do that, why should not the official publication publish them all and relieve us from it.

37,741. Supposing that is not done. All your cases are reported by barristers. Are their reports edited when they come into the office, or are they published as they come in?—They are edited.

37,742. By whom?—By the editor and his assistants, by one of three or four men.

37,743. Does it fall within your view to say that they are substantially edited?—Yes, certainly. You must remember we will perhaps get every night sufficient to fill 12 columns of law reports. We seldom publish more than six, consequently there is a process of selection in which there is a desire to cut down every one that we can, and if we can find an excuse for keeping it out saying, "Really this is a horribly trivial "case, it is only a case about a butcher and his wife" and so forth, we throw it out and are glad to because we always have that pressure for space.

37,744. May I take it you do that not only with a view to gaining space, but also from the moral point of view?—If they saw anything doubtful in that sense, they would take it to the editor.

37,745. Even though the barrister had reported it?—Yes.

37,746. You said except in a case like Mr. Parnell's, for instance, that of a well-known public man, that no cases were reported unless they had a legal interest. Roughly that was the principle?—Yes.

37,747. Is that so?—That is so, I think on the whole, except, of course, sometimes there may be given a case where there is a very strong human interest, or a case with regard to a person of great notoriety.

37,748. I notice in the Hilary sittings 1909 the "Times" had 32½ columns and in the Hilary sittings of 1910 they had only 10¾ columns, and we are told that was due to the fact that in one sittings the Stirling case in Scotland appeared and in the other sittings there was nothing similar. Into what category, of public interest, or of eminent persons, or of legal importance, do you bring the Stirling case?—I am afraid I do not remember it at all, it is Greek to me, I do not know what it was. I should be glad to give you any information I can afterwards upon inquiring into it.

37,749. It was the case of a Scotch lord and an American actress. That was no legitimate public interest whatever. There was no romance and no legal point arose in it?—I should like to put it to my reporters, I could not answer myself.

37,750. Does it not come to this, that there is another category?—What category would that be?

37,751. Of cases with no legitimate interest whatever, but concerning well-known persons, actresses, or officers, or gentry, or otherwise?—I said notorious persons.

37,752. Do you defend that?—Was this actress a notorious person?

37,753. Yes. Do you defend the practice of bringing cases of that kind under the public eye involving sexual matters, cases which are full of suggestive matter although not obscene, where there is no public character to be defended or condemned like the Parnell case, and where there is no legal point?—I should not like to answer that question without reading the case and knowing something about it, because I have frequently turned out a thing as having no legal interest and have been spoken to in strong language by my reporters afterwards, saying, that I did not know what legal interest was, and I was wrong and they were right. Can you tell me the date of the Stirling case?

37,754. Hilary sittings, 1909?

(Lady Frances Balfour.) It is reported in the "Times" of February 13th, 1909.

37,755. (Lord Guthrie.) It went on for 15 days, and you will find it reported. You might also inquire whether the "Times" did not send a special reporter to Edinburgh the whole time. I do not expect you would know that?—I think I can answer that at once; we did not.

37,756. Subject to ascertaining about it?—I will find out. What was the name of the case?

37,757. Stirling v. Stirling?—They were counter cases, husband against wife, and wife against husband.

37,758. (Lady Frances Balfour.) We have had witnesses this morning who draw a distinction between respectable papers and those that were not. I suppose you would put the "Times" amongst the respectable papers?—I think so.

37,759. Perhaps you would put it higher than respectable, and you would say that it was a leading journal?—Yes, I would even go so far as that.

37,760. Supposing the "Times" led the way by dropping the reporting of divorce cases, would it drop in circulation largely?—No, not largely.

37,761. We have been favoured with a large numbe of extracts from the "Times," of things which are not altogether pleasant reading, from the Divorce Court reports over a great number of years. Those are inserted, I suppose, because a certain number of persons like the indecent details which even the "Times" gives?—I do not think we give indecent details, at least I should like to see them first.

37,762. I think we have all noticed things bordering on that in any account of divorce cases?—It is very difficult to draw a line. Some persons would call a thing indecent and some would not. You might, of course, say that of any case; you might say it of the recent case of Crippen because Crippen and Miss Le Neve were not married and lived together. Is that a thing to be slurred over?

37,763. That hardly comes under the head of indecent?—I do not know. I know persons who would consider that indecent, the mere mention of the fact that they lived together, I cannot say until I have the cases before me of the alleged indecencies, what reason there was for publishing them. I am certain there was a reason.

37,764. That is a statement of fact, not a detail about the results of the fact?—Can you give me the reference to the papers which contain these cases?

37,765. The papers or "The Times"?—"The Times" I mean.

37,766. You referred to "The Times" a little while ago that reported perfectly properly everything?—Can you tell me instances? If you will give me a note I will have them looked up, and I will tell you something about them.

37,767. Of course any detailed account must be indecent?—May I have the dates of the improper reports in "The Times," because this is a statement which will probably be published? There are reporters present. You said that "The Times" has published indecent reports, and I want to know what they are.

37,768. There are certain passages in every report of a divorce case which might come under that head?—I deny that altogether. Have you a copy of the paper of to-day? I will show you a case there.

37,769. (Chairman.) May I say that someone has sent us, as a great many people send, all sorts of things, and amongst them, I understand, there are some extracts from "The Times," which they comment upon. Perhaps you would like to see them. I do not want to call special attention to them?—I should like to see them.

37,770. I will give them to you, and you can see if they are correct.

37,771. (Lady Frances Balfour.) They are put together over a great number of years, and give a stronger impression than if taken separately?—Of course they came out at different times. We had as reporter at the Divorce Court for a great number of years a gentleman who is well-known to Lord Gorell, a certain Mr. Murphy, and Mr. Murphy was so very particular that he would not use either the words adultery or seduction, but called everything misconduct. He had that one word misconduct, which went through and through and covered every sort of wrong.

37,772. I did not want to press this, it was simply upon the point of reporting these subjects in detail?—I do not think we do report them in detail. That is where I differ from you.

37,773. There are certain details reported. We can read them in any paper?—Sometimes a question of detail is necessary on one particular point.

37,774. My question was whether, if "The Times" led the way by dropping these reports of detail, it would lose its circulation?—No, I do not think it would lose anything in circulation.

37,775. (Chairman.) Will you look at these extracts afterwards and see if they are correct?—I cannot say whether they are correct from this. May I take these away?

(Chairman.) Will you ask one of your staff to see if they are correct. They are simply sent to us like many other things. I do not know what it is because I have not studied it.

37,776. (Mrs. Tennant.) You suggested that if an offence were committed by the holder of a licence either a fine might be imposed or the licence withdrawn?—Yes.

37,777. Would you have any objection to making both the imposition of a fine and the withdrawal of the licence run together?—No, I should leave the punishment in the hands of the Court. A man should be warned. In any such new process it would take some time for the reporters to get accustomed to what the Court did and did not permit, and there should be leniency during the first few months, but a man warned once or twice should be dealt with severely, fined perhaps the first time, and then his licence withdrawn altogether.

37,778. I ask that question in pursuance of some questions which have been put, as to whether it is possible for a certain class of papers to have a fine that would be prohibitive. They depend very much on a circulation helped by that class of information. It would depend on the consequent advertisement they received, would it not?—Really, it would be very hard to fix a sum which would not help them, because in a sense the larger the sum the larger would be the advertisement. I think not. I think that can be met.

37,779. By withdrawing the license?—Yes.

37,780. I am pressing it because we have heard this morning that newspaper proprietors are urged by agents to develop that line of news; and provincial papers complain that London weekly papers push their papers out, because the London weekly papers publish this information?—I think it would prove to be efficient having only a system of licensed reporters, but if it did not prove efficient, I think then you have a remedy against the papers that absolutely resist what would be a reasonable provision.

37,781. At any rate you think it would be fair, after a warning, to withdraw the license?—Altogether, and you would have one means which would prove very efficacious, to refuse to allow a paper to publish reports. You would not only withdraw a license from the reporter, but from the paper publishing it.

37,782. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) You agree that the publication of divorce cases is a deterrent against immorality itself in some cases?—It is a disagreeable question to discuss, but I think that any man or woman is liable to think, "Well, there are very serious "consequences that must follow on this; over and "above the ordinary serious consequences there is "another one, and that is publicity." Then there is the effect on the children. In the case I mentioned I had a lady in my office begging and praying and weeping, saying that she wanted to bring a divorce case and asking if it could not be kept out of the paper. I said, "No," and she said that she would rather sacrifice her life than allow the children to know.

37,783. That may influence a large class of people who would be ruined if co-respondents?—I think it would more frequently influence the woman, but it would influence the man also. The man probably has himself a wife.

37,784. You have a passage here about the difficulty of licensed reporters if jurisdiction were given to the county court?—I think there would be a great difficulty.

37,785. I suppose you could leave that in the hands of the county court judge?—Yes.

37,786. Because they must know, I daresay you will admit, the class of reporters they have in the different courts and those that they can trust, Why should there be any difficulty in a county court judge knowing his reporters and being able to licence men in whom he had confidence?—I do not know much about the Press in the provinces, but I imagine that there are not many reporters. I am speaking of very small towns. I should think it might be very much more difficult to work; I do not say that it would be impossible, You cannot, for instance, say that reporters must be barristers as you could here.

37,787. I will give you my experience as a county court judge. A great number of the reporters that come to the smaller towns, come from the larger ones, but not a great distance off; and the reporters in the larger towns are perfectly respectable and would be well under the control of the judge if he was to license them. If that could be done, that gets rid of your difficulty?—That gets rid of my difficulty, certainly.

37,788. (The Archbishop of York.) There is one question I omitted to ask you upon the question his Honour has just been raising. Would there not be this difficulty in this system of licensed reporters? Supposing that the number of courts were greatly increased and divorce courts established in the provinces, the reporters might be competent reporters, but would there not be a danger of different standards as to what it was permissible for the public to read, according to the views of the different judges?—That is true.

37,789. And that therefore the newspapers in one part of the country might have a license allowed to them which a newspaper in another part of the country might not?—I agree. The more you increase the number of persons who have the settlement as to what is or what is not permissible, the more difficulty must occur.

37,790. Your suggestion of licensed reporting would be much more difficult in the case of a large number of courts?—Undoubtedly.

37,791. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) Upon that may I ask this. Do you not suppose that the county court judges are fitted to be entrusted with the question of what is indecent and improper?—I have only the honour of knowing a few. With regard to those I do know, I should certainly think they were; but, then every man's opinion of what is proper or improper differs, and what his Grace says is perfectly true that you might in York have one opinion and you might in Warwick have a totally different opinion as to what was proper or improper. You would have a different sort of legislation.

37,792. As a rule are not you safe in leaving these questions in the hands of persons in the position of High Court or County Court judges? The same difficulty would occur if you gave the jurisdiction to assizes, and you had eight or nine judges travelling round from the High Court. They would all have different standards?—It only amounts to this, that the more persons who have to decide on a very difficult question, the more difficulties are likely to occur between the interpretations that one and the other are likely to give. If you can limit it to one autocrat at the head of the Divorce Court, it would be better than if you had fifty people all over the country. That does not say that the whole fifty were not equally as capable as the one, but an autocrat is better than a divided rule.

37,793. Supposing it became necessary in the interest of the public to establish local courts to bring divorce within reach of the poorer classes of the public, do you suppose it would be advisable not to allow the cases to be published in the local courts: that is to say, the cases could be only published when tried in London?—You could not make a distinction of that sort.

37,794. (Chairman.) You rather suggest that the licensing authority would be the President of the Divorce Court?—Or an official delegated.

37,795. Would not that involve this, if there are a number of licensed reporters, that whoever had the licensing would have to look over the reports to see how they were going on, from time to time?—I think not.

37,796. You instanced a case heard on a Friday and the Judge would have to look at it the same day so that it could appear on the Saturday, but no judge could do it?—No, I mean this. The cases would be reported and if anybody complained to the President of the Divorce Court of such a paper or such a reporter, he would give the name of the reporter say Mr. So. and So., barrister, reported in the "Sphinx" the case of Jones v. Smith, with an amount of indecent detail which we think was unnecessary. The President would have the report looked at, or whoever looks at it, and would say, "I think this is rubbish," and would put it aside; or he would say, "I think that man is right. Send for the man who reported it," and he would say to him, "There is that thing, take care it does not happen again, I rather agree with it."

37,797. Do you think it advisable to trust the bench with this discretionary jurisdiction?—I think it is the discretion the judge exercises over all barristers at present. If anybody brought to your notice any impropriety on the part of a barrister practising in your court, you would deal with it?

37,798. That would go to his own tribunal, the Inns of Court. The judge would deal with nothing except what happened in front of him?—I meant that.

37,799. Then he stops it at once. Ex post facto matters are dealt with by the Benchers of the Inn?—The Benchers of the Inn might be well used. Once you have barristers there is no necessity for a license. The license would only come in for the people who are not barristers.

37,800. May I suggest a difficulty. If you had courts in different parts of the country, would it not be difficult to find a barrister who would be willing to take such small cases in the country. It is quite intelligible in the town court?—That gets over the difficulty I think suggested by the judge. If you made a rule that it should only be reported by barristers, the result would be that the county court cases would not be reported.

37,801. I am afraid I suggest the question from practical experience. It would be difficult for a judge to supervise reports?—I do not mean supervise any more than he supervises barristers.

37,802. How would it affect the news agencies; one man writes many reports?—They would be in the same position. Instead of employing a man who is not a barrister, they would have to employ a barrister or a person who, after a long experience, might be licensed by the Court.

37,803. I want to ask you one question with regard to what Mr. Spender was putting about the law of France. Were you here when I went through the list of laws in other countries?—I was here a part of the time this morning.

37,804. In this part of legal work in foreign countries there exists absolute prohibition. There is power to hear in camera and there is absolute power in the judge to close the court or prevent publication. It looks to me as if England was not up to those other countries and was rather making a fetish of publication, which is not made in other countries?—In England generally we have a great deal more publicity than on the Continent, and, on the whole, I think it is for good.

37,805. Every civilised country seems to be drifting in the direction of the exclusion of divorce reports?—Is it not rather the other way?

37,806. All this legislation is fairly recent on the Continent, certainly in Germany; and I think France, Switzerland, Norway and Sweden have all moved in that direction within recent times, although I have not the exact dates?—I should have thought that the old system was that the courts were like Star Chambers with no publicity, and that gradually the publicity has been growing and had grown more in England than elsewhere; but, of course, if you say by recent legislation they have closed the courts, that is a different thing.

37,807. It strikes me as remarkable that all the world seems moving in that direction in this particular class of case, and other indecent forms which have been mentioned, bastardy, and so on?—On the whole is morality better in those countries than in ours?

37,808. That is too large a question to ask you?—What is the rule in South America?

37,809. I think they have not divorce there, but still they have separation only. At any rate we have not got them. With regard to the case of the lady you mentioned as an illustration, I want to ask you about it. I gather she was a petitioner?—I really forget whether she was petitioner or respondent, but I came to the conclusion that it was a case of six to one and half a dozen to the other.

37,810. She was wishing to make a claim, I gather, but was daunted by publicity even against bringing it?—Yes.

37,811. Do you think that prevails to a certain extent, because we have had it said that publicity, although it may act as a deterrent on the wrong-doer, has also a great deterrent effect on the person, who is innocent, bringing his or her case, because of the unpleasant time they have in court, especially in the case of a woman?—I agree it would be a deterrent in that way also.

37,812. Do you think it would be right to give a judge the power to close a court if he thought a witness was hampered in the giving of evidence?—Yes, I suppose so. It must be left very much to the discretion of a judge.

37,813. At any rate it is an open question whether that could be done. Lord St. Helier thought it could. Assuming it cannot, it seems that the administration of justice should be assisted by the power to close the court in such cases?—Yes.

37,814. You would not be opposed to that?—No. If you closed your courts altogether against the Press I should be delighted, personally.

37,815. Speaking from my own experience, I am satisfied that there are many cases where not only was it difficult for witnesses to give evidence, but difficult for counsel to put the questions because of the presence of the Press and the public. Cases like those would come under the principle I have suggested. I ought to thank you very much for your evidence and for your attendance, especially as you are such a busy person?—It is a busy day with me.

37,816. (Chairman.) We are not responsible for those extracts, but if you would like to look through them and send word whether they are correct we should like to know. I do not want them to be published at all?—I will do so.

Adjourned.

Winchester House, St. James's Square, London, S.W.

FORTY-THIRD DAY.

Wednesday, 16th, November 1910.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HON. LORD GORELL (Chairman).

His Grace the LORD ARCHBISHOP OF YORK.
The LADY FRANCES BALFOUR.
The Right Hon. THOMAS BURT, M.P.
The Hon. LORD GUTHRIE.
Sir WILLIAM ANSON, Bt., M.P.
Sir FREDERICK TREVES, Bart., G.C.V.O., C.B., LL.D., F.R.C.S.
Sir LEWIS DIBDIN, D.C.L.
Sir GEORGE WHITE, M.P.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.
EDGAR BRIERLEY, Esq.
J. A. SPENDER, Esq.

The Hon. HENRY GORELL BARNES (Secretary).
J. E. G. DE MONTMORENCY, Esq. (Assistant Secretary)

Mr. HOWELL ARTHUR GWYNNE called and examined.

37,817. (Chairman.) You are the Editor of the "Standard" newspaper?—Yes.

37,818. I daresay, to-day, you are under pressure, and would be glad to get away?—Yes.

37,819. You have prepared a short memorandum on the question of publication of divorce proceedings in the Press. In order to facilitate matters, I think I had better ask you to read it?—In offering evidence on the subject of the publication of divorce proceedings in the public Press, I would ask the Commission to make a note of a sentiment which I think is shared by the greater number of journalists, that they do not approve of legislation in matters which concern the conduct of their paper. I think the Commission will find, on inquiry, that there is a strong feeling throughout the Press that those who conduct the newspapers rather resent outside interference, and, if I may be allowed to say so, this resentment is not altogether without a good foundation. With those people who would like to see the Press clear of anything which might offend the jeune fille, or which might be subversive of good morals, I have, as I am sure my colleagues have, the greatest sympathy; but, when it comes to legislation on the subject, I think the difficulties are so enormous as to render it almost impossible. I would point out that divorce proceedings are not the only thing in a newspaper which might give offence to the moral susceptibilities of the public. There are also the police reports, some of which are infinitely more sordid than a great number of divorce cases. Nearly every day in the police courts of the kingdom cases of rape, abduction, and such-like offences are dealt with, which are more filthy than the great majority of divorce cases. Legislation, therefore, if it is to have any effect, must include all these categories of crime. To deal with a portion only would be a mistake.

37,820. Would that be sound, because there are certain classes of cases which are absolutely excluded at present under recent legislation. There are the incest cases, and in the Divorce Court there are already the nullity cases. I do not see that there is any principle which necessarily excludes a certain class of case, which in a strict sense is private between the parties and in which there is no public interest?—Surely there are cases of abduction, abortion, and rape?

37,821. Does it justify the publishing of one because others are published? It does not necessarily. It might be a good thing to exclude them all?—Yes. I understood this Commission only had to do with the publication of divorce proceedings.

37,822. That is true, but the fact that other things are published which are objectionable does not necessarily lead to the conclusion that you might not make an exception of one?—It is within the purview of the Commission then to recommend the other.

37,823. No, it does not logically follow because certain things—I assume that for the moment—are published that therefore you should not touch any one?—I see your point.

37,824. Incest cases lately by statute are specially exempted from publication, so are the children's cases, and the cases for nullity, therefore the principle of absolute right of publication is gone?—You advocate that the prevention of a portion is better than nothing at all,

37,825. It does not follow that you must include all these categories of crime if you are dealing with one specific subject?—I will put it in another way. If legislation is going to be effective, I am afraid if you exclude one portion such as divorce you rather drive those papers that go in for cases of this kind to the police court, if I may say so.

37,826. Not necessarily, because it might be provided by legislation that offensive cases should be heard with closed doors. I do not know whether you have looked through the evidence—it would practically give a discretion to close the doors in some cases, you might almost say those cases which are of a sexually offensive character. Legislation, to have any effect, must include those, you think?—I am afraid it would make things worse unless it includes those things, because it will drive those papers to worse cases.

37,827. Do you see any objection to the court closing the doors in any case of offence of a sexual character?—Not at all.

37,828. Perhaps you will proceed with your proof?—I have spoken of the difficulty of legislation because I think I may say without fear of contradiction that the great majority of editors are quite as alive to the evil of unrestricted publication of sordid and filthy cases as anybody else, but we have to remember that we are purveyors of news and that we owe a duty to the public to give as complete a picture as we can of the day's doings. If we were compelled by law to omit certain portions of this news, it is possible that the effect might be to relieve editors of a sense of responsibility which they now feel most keenly, and I am not sure that this would be a good thing for the English Press as a whole, for I think that the high standard which it has attained is due to the great sense of responsibility which has animated journalists in the conduct of their newspaper. The second phase that has to be considered is the fulfilment of the avowed purpose of a newspaper, which is to give the news of the day as correctly and as accurately and as quickly as possible, irrespective of the views and prejudices of those who are in charge of the Press; and I would here say that the majority of papers would soon lose circulation if they did not exercise a very severe censorship over those portions of their pages which deal with cases of the kind which the Commission is discussing. It may be true that a certain section of the Press panders to the taste for exciting and immoral news, but the vast majority are very particular as to what they admit into their columns. I have been at some pains to inquire among my colleagues and friends on the Press what rules govern their conduct in this matter, and I find that they are all practically unanimous in keeping out anything of a sordid and filthy nature. In my own particular case the instructions that are given in the office are to keep out everything which would be offensive in a paper which circulates throughout a family from the parents down to the jeunes filles. There is another aspect, however, which seems to me to be of no slight importance. Publicity of some sort is to my mind absolutely necessary if we are to achieve a deterrent effect on wrong-doers. How far this effect could be retained without full publicity I am not prepared to say. A suggestion which I have seen put forward, that papers should be restricted to the publication of the judge's summing up in divorce cases is worthy of consideration by the Commission.

37,829. Do you think that would meet most of the difficulties of the case?—Of divorce cases I think it would.

37,830. There is one thing I may suggest in looking through your paper. There are a great many outside interests to consider in these divorce cases, but I do not find any reference to the pain and misery which it may inflict on children of the marriage if they have their parents' detailed life dragged out in public. I do not think that has been mentioned in any of the papers we have had from the Press, if I recollect rightly. May I suggest there is a peculiarity in divorce cases in that class of interest. Possibly it may be the reason why many of the foreign codes give this power of exclusion?—As a rule it is true when they are of young age the children are kept in ignorance for some time. The papers would be kept away.

37,831. In many cases they are not quite so young as not to appreciate it. Statistics show that a large majority of divorce cases take place after a good many years of life together. Have you given that consideration at all?—I have not thought of that aspect of the case, and it is a very serious one, undoubtedly.

37,832. To what extent do you think it is in the public interest that the private life of people in these cases should be handed out to the public?—It is a somewhat difficult question to answer. There is this deterrent aspect, which is a very important one. If you are not going to report divorce cases you lose that effect to a great extent.

37,833. Do you think it operates now?—I think so, certainly. Every editor is flooded every day with applications from people who expect to be involved in divorce cases, to keep it out of the papers.

37,834. I appreciate that, but that does not prevent the wrong; that is to keep it dark when committed?—You mean the wrong to the people whose lives are discussed in the courts.

37,835. No; I meant the immoral act has been committed before they come to the question of keeping things out of the paper?—I think it acts not as a deterrent on them, because the crime has been committed, but on others. I am sure it is a very strong deterrent. At the same time, I think the Commission should bear in mind that even this moderate attempt to direct by legislation what should and what should not go into a paper is likely to be resented by the Press. I am afraid that what I have said is open to the objection that if disease there be, I have not put forward a remedy. I fear that the remedy which I propose is one which is not easy of quick attainment, but must be gradually evolved. I am an optimist in this respect; that I believe the moral tone of the country is rising every day, for it is possible to point with some pride to the fact that there is no print that could be described as obscene or dirty which has any circulation in England. I remember a prominent French statesman telling me once that he considered the miracle of modern life was the cleanliness of the English cheaper Press, which was established after the Education Act of 1870 to meet the growing demand for newspaper reading which was brought about as a result of this and similar Acts, and I am inclined to think that progress since then has been steady. It is, I think, on the lines of education that progress towards the elimination of obscene, filthy and suggestive matter in the Press will be best and more thoroughly attained.

37,836. Do you think that last paragraph as to progress meets the case of the immense development of Sunday literature we have had put before us, in which many columns are devoted not to an obscene or filthy description of these cases, but merely to the cases themselves which call attention to the sexual aspect of life? Do you think that paragraph quite meets that?—By "obscene and filthy" I meant publications that are simply published for the purpose of giving obscene and filthy sexual things.

37,837. I think you may take it the suggestion has not been made that what appears would come within those words, but the harping on the sexual side of life by repeated publication is a bad thing?—I think so, too.

37,838. Would you say in what respect there was progress?—Taking the Sunday papers as an example.

37,839. I am only using them as an example, because a large quantity appears in every paper?—What I had in my mind was this, after the Education Act we had papers like "Tit Bits," "Answers," and those weekly papers, with enormous circulations, and this M. Bourgeois told me that he read this literature and contrasted it with French literature of the same type; it was so clean he called it one of the miracles of modern life.

37,840. That is hardly on the point I am putting?—That is what I had in my mind when I wrote that paragraph.

37,841. (Mr. Brierley.) Supposing that restrictions were placed upon the reports of divorce proceedings, would you anticipate that there would be more reporting of these cases in the police courts that you have described as being more sordid?—I am afraid it would be like an india-rubber ball; where you squeeze it in on one side it goes out on the other.

37,842. That would not be so with a high-class paper?—I do not like to make a distinction between higher-class journalism and lower-class journalism. It might be resented, and fairly resented.

37,843. I notice the report of a conference in which the Dean of Manchester said he had made an analysis of one of the Sunday papers, and there were 6 columns of murders, 12 columns of divorce cases profusely illustrated, 2 scandals, 2 matrimonial cases, one of crime and one a painful case. I do not know what the last two refer to. Supposing that those 12 columns of divorce cases were restricted or prohibited entirely, would you anticipate that their place would be filled with other unpleasant matter?—No. If you left divorce out I do not know how you could.

37,844. You would not replace those columns by reporting more filthy cases?—No; but it is a matter to take into consideration whether they might not be replaced by serials of a kind that would be almost as bad. Apparently a certain portion of the Press wish to meet this desire for the sordid and filthy.

37,845. You think they would provide the columns with something similar?—I should not like to say I think there is a possibility of it. I was making a remark about drawing a distinction between the high-class Press and the other Press. Speaking individually for the "Standard," this does not affect me. I have no objection.

37,846. As a matter of fact, I do not wish to be personal, but the number of columns devoted to divorce cases in the "Standard" and the "Evening Standard" during the last year and a half has been a rather considerable number?—I distinguish police cases which are perfectly clean, a man destitute, found with no bread and nothing to eat, and his wife and children starving; it is a good human story of which we use a tremendous lot, but we do not go out for divorce.

37,847. Whether you go out for it or not, the number of columns is rather large?—In the "Standard"? I have not worked it out myself.

37,848. We had it in evidence yesterday that during the sittings of 1909 and the first two sittings of 1910 the number of columns in the "Evening Standard" was 171?—It is a bigger paper than the others?

37,849. At any rate it is a large proportion?—May I suggest that is the wrong way to put it? It ought to be the proportion of the whole printed paper devoted to that, because one paper would have 12 or 14 pages, while the "Evening Standard" very often has 24 pages, so that you have to take the proportion. Where a case is let run, it is not for its intrinsic value, but because they have the space for it.

37,850. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) The "Standard" gives considerable prominence to legal reports altogether?—Yes.

37,851. Any fair comparison with other papers as to the amount given to divorce ought to contain in it as a factor the amount given to law reports altogether?—Quite so.

37,852. It is a proportional matter rather than a specific abstract matter?—Yes. We give a lot of legal reports; we give about 3½ to 4 columns every day.

37,853. Do you give instructions to give special prominence to divorce cases?—No. On the contrary, if there is a divorce case which we as a newspaper have to give, my instructions are to keep it down to the lowest and keep out of it expressions likely to offend people.

37,854. In the statistics to which Mr. Brierley has referred, the amount of space given in different papers is measured by the column?—Yes.

37,855. The column varies a good deal in different newspapers?—Yes.

37,856. For instance, a column in the "Evening Standard" and a column in the "Globe" are of very different lengths?—Yes.

37,857. Therefore three columns in the "Evening Standard" is not really equal to three columns in the "Globe"?—I do not think so. The front page of the "Globe" has a broader column.

37,858. I give that as an illustration; but the columns in the different papers vary as to the amount of print they contain?—Yes. The right way is to see what proportion of the rest of their pages they give to divorce. The "Standard" is a 14-page paper, the "Evening Standard" 24; the "Globe" and the "Pall Mall" 16 and sometimes 12. Obviously, if they wanted to give at great length any particular subject, the right way to look at it is the proportion these cases bear to the rest of the paper. That column of statistics is not quite a good criterion.

37,859. (Lady Frances Balfour.) Do you mean in proportion as you decrease the reports of divorce cases so you increase the reports upon the revision of the Prayer Book, or some kindred subject? Do you try to balance it, because we have for the "Standard" in 1909 88 columns, and to the end of the Easter sittings in 1910, 114½ columns of divorce alone?—Yes.

37,860. Does that mean on each occasion you raise the proportion of what you report of other legal things?—The proportion we give of divorce cases? It all depends on the size of the paper. The paper varies in size from day to day.

37,861. In the number of pages?—Yes. To-day it it is a 12-page paper, to-morrow it might be 14. For other reasons, therefore, we would let the law reports run a little longer to fill up the space in that particular page.

37,862. If there were a startling divorce case, you would increase the size of the paper to report it?—No, unless it is something very extraordinary. We do not increase the size of the paper for any particular thing.

37,863. If it was a very extraordinary case you would increase the size?—No, I never have yet.

37,864. I understand you report all legal subjects rather fully?—Yes, very fully.

37,865. Is there any process of selection? Do you take proceedings in the Chancery Court before you take proceedings in the Divorce Court?—It all depends. If there is a big legal point we give that prominence. As a rule we take the courts—I am afraid I do not know the order of their importance—in the order of their importance. We would not take a divorce case at the top if the Court of Appeal was sitting dealing with a big legal point.

37,866. You would not take the interest of the subject first?—The legal status of the court.

37,867. What defines the position of the subject reported?—Supposing the Court of Appeal was sitting and there was a good divorce case too, the Court of Appeal would come first as being the highest court; after that the Divorce Court and the King's Bench Division. I do not know the order of precedence of the courts.

37,868. Would they be reported at equal length?—It all depends. If there is an intricate legal case we should give it pretty fully for our lawyer readers and solicitor readers, but if it were a case that did not attract legal attention, and not of general interest, we should give it and give the other things more prominence.

37,869. (The Archbishop of York.) You said in your evidence that you thought the newspapers as a whole would rather resent any interference with their conduct. Would it be legitimate to say that naturally the main interest of a newspaper which has to be conducted on commercial lines is to furnish within certain limits what the people want?—Yes.

37,870. I suppose the State may legitimately look at the thing from another point of view?—Quite.

37,871. If it seems the people want to appear a lot of what is not desirable, it should restrict the supply?—Yes.

37,872. Would you say there has been in your experience a considerable development in certain sections of the Press of the furnishing of a great deal of this matter to meet a very unhealthy appetite?—I am rather a bad witness in that respect, because I was out of England for about 14 years, up to seven years ago. When I came back I had not followed it—you are referring to the weekly Press, whether it is better within the last seven years when I have more or less studied it. I should say it is about the same. It looks as if there is rather a tendency to increase these reports.

37,873. Would you agree there has been a great increase in what one might call the fulness with which the material is fitted up and set out before the public, in the way of headlines and descriptive articles, illustrations, and the like?—Yes, I gather it would be; but I am only competent to speak within the last seven years.

37,874. Has not the effect of that been to render it much more difficult than it was, the desire of the editors of the better class, if I may make a distinction, journals to keep up to their high standard of respectability?—Yes, I think so.

37,875. Would you go so far as to say that it becomes increasingly difficult, in face of this other class of newspaper, for the editors of the good newspapers to keep within the limits they would like to set themselves?—Honestly, I do not think it has affected them much, because it is quite a different class of reader. I may put it in this way. If I took a case just as it appears in some of the papers and put it in my paper, I should lose 10,000 circulation the next day. Obviously I should not do it, looking at it from that sordid point of view, but with regard to the other class of divorce, which interests the class of people who are involved, as a rule a man who has a divorce is a fairly rich man, we have to give anyway the result as a matter of news. Whether one likes to elaborate or not depends on the paper.

37,876. Do you think it would seriously affect the circulation of a paper like the "Standard" if hardly any details were given of divorce proceedings at all?—If it were universal, not a bit; but, of course, if we stopped altogether and other papers gave them, the people would buy the other papers.

37,877. Following that out, would it not seem to follow that if there are newspapers which are, as you say in your evidence, obviously pandering to this appetite, an increase of their circulation must inevitably affect the good newspapers in what they put in?—Yes.

37,878. With regard to what is reported in better-class newspapers, you would, of course, naturally strike out anything that was really filthy or obscene?—Yes.

37,879. You would not feel it right to strike out details which perhaps would scarcely come under these very strong adjectives?—My instruction to my chief sub-editor is to keep out anything which would offend a young girl.

37,880. Do you not think it is equally bad for the class we have in view, the young girl, to give her a long succession of sordid details all centering round sexual irregularities?—I am talking, of course, of the details. I keep out those details. You mean the fact of giving a divorce case which centres round an illicit love is bad?

37,881. Yes?—I suppose it is not the best thing in the world, and as far as I am concerned if it could be abolished from every paper I should be delighted. When I talk of the resentment of the Press I mean this. The editors who do not want that kind of thing and have laboured hard to keep it out, would resent interference; those who do it would do it for obvious reasons. I do not say whether I agree with that resentment or not.

37,882. That resentment would be greatly mitigated if the State dealt with the whole question?—Undoubtedly.

37,883. With reporting as a whole?—Undoubtedly.

37,884. I was much interested in what you said, that you thought it was evidenced by journalism that the moral tone of the country was rising. You have admitted that the number of newspapers which attempt to increase their circulation by the publishing of this class of literature is rather on the increase?—I was referring to what, for want of a better word, we call the higher-class Press itself. Twenty years ago the "Standard," the "Times," the "Morning Post"—I am not sure about the "Morning Post," but the "Telegraph," would think nothing of giving half a page to a really first-class divorce case. Now we do not.

37,885. Meanwhile, concurrently with that, there has been this immense increase of circulation of a popular class of journal which takes a very different standard?—Yes

37,886. Is not that presumably partly due to the increase of demand on the part of the public for that class of literature?—I should not like to think so, because a demand like that is rather tickled, like hors d'œuvres before dinner.

37,887. You would agree a good deal of that demand is due to the efforts of certain journalism to stimulate it?—I should think so to a great extent.

37,888. Therefore the moral tone of the community would be benefited by some restriction on the power of journals who stimulate an appetite in that way?—Yes, if it was universal.

37,889. Assuming some regulations were made, universal for reporting this class of cases, you have no suggestion to make excepting the one made, that publishing the judge's judgment or summing-up was worth consideration?—My feeling is that the best way of meeting the difficulty would be to define pretty clearly what is obscene and dirty, and let it be a police prosecution.

37,890. You know it has been found as a fact extraordinarily difficult to get much unanimity as to what is obscene?—I should have thought it was not beyond the powers of the lawyers to do that.

37,891. Even so, that would not affect what we were talking of a moment ago, the multiplication of details not singly offensive and obscene, but collectively having a bad effect on morals. Police proceedings would not touch that aspect of the problem?—No, except that they would be all kept out if there were threats of police proceedings on defined lines. My profession is very clever, I think, and it would be possible to evade breaking the letter of the law and yet the spirit would remain. The question is so full of difficulties. I should like to put it in this way, my own personal opinion: I would like to see the whole thing cleared away. When you ask me how you are to do it, I am afraid you are asking a very broken reed to help you.

37,892. Do you wish to give any expression of opinion on the suggestion that there might be a system of licensing reporters?—No, I think that would be almost impossible to work.

37,893. On the deterrent effect of publication, to which you have called attention, would you be prepared to tell us, as some other editors have told us, whether in your experience you have had any number of applications addressed to you to keep things out of the newspapers?—Yes, I have.

37,894. To any extent?—Yes, constantly.

37,895. (Mr. Burt.) I think you spoke just lately about the space given now as compared with the space given formerly to first-class divorce cases?—I am talking of "first-class" from the news point of view, what a journalist would call "first-class."

37,896. I suppose, measuring by columns, the space allotted would depend to some extent, probably largely, on the prominence or otherwise of the parties to the divorce?—That is true.

37,897. (Sir William Anson.) I think you said you are in favour of the clearance of the whole thing: you would like to see all reports of these cases cleared away by law?—I should be delighted.

37,898. Do you think there is any object whatever in publishing anything?—Except that publishing the pure results has a deterrent effect.

37,899. Has a deterrent effect on whom?—On would-be wrongdoers.

37,900. Do you think that would have some effect on the morals of the community?—Speaking from a high ethical point of view perhaps it is not the best sort of preventive, but there is no doubt it is one.

37,901. In the interest of an innocent co-respondent, publicity is in some cases necessary?—Yes.

37,902. Whose character is cleared by the proceedings?—There is a case where I think it is rather hard he or she should be mentioned at all.

37,903. He is made a party to the suit?—If you have the results—that is a case I had in mind when I was writing my proof: if he is innocent the very fact that he was brought into the Divorce Court is always against him. If you publish results only, his name ought to be left out if possible.

37,904. The results would be sufficient, to your mind?—Yes.

37,905. You would have publication on an important point of law, and for the clearance of individual character?—Yes.

37,906. Where that was just?—Yes.

37,907. Otherwise you see no object in the publication of any details?—No, if it is universal—not otherwise.

37,908. You would have no objection to legislation which effected that?—No, if it could be made effective, and could not be evaded. I think the difficulties are very great, but still not insuperable.

37,909. (Sir Frederick Treves.) You lay great stress on the deterrent effect of publication?—Yes.

37,910. That has struck you prominently?—Yes.

37,911. Would not that deterrent effect be efficient, or effectual, without the publication of details?—Yes, I have no objection to that. You may sweep away the whole thing, provided you give the facts; that is, that So-and-so brought a divorce action against his wife, and So-and-so was co-respondent, and he got his decree, which means those two were guilty, but that is all. I ask that should be published. I should not like to fact omitted.

37,912. Supposing the judge's summing-up were published, that would meet your feeling?—I think it is dealing with a very big question.

37,913. The judge's summing-up would cover the whole case. It would point out the innocence of parties who were innocent?—Yes.

37,914. So far as your feelings go, you have mentioned nothing in favour of publication except the deterrent effect?—Yes.

37,915. That is all you have to say for it?—At the present moment we have to give accounts of divorce cases, as long as all the Press do it. We could not exist a day.

37,916. Apart from the business side of it, from the general point of view all you have to say in favour of more or less elaborate publication is the deterrent effect, and that could be still attained by giving what you may call the very barest facts?—Quite so.

37,917. (Sir George White.) We have had it represented to us by some previous evidence that publication of the mere results would not attract any attention whatever, just simply that So-and-so brought an action for divorce against someone else, as you describe it. It would be like a category of bankrupts?—I think the category of bankrupts is read very carefully by every man in business.

37,918. And that people would not read them?—The general public do not read them. The bankruptcy cases are a good example, but it is not on all fours with divorce proceedings, which is a matter of social importance. Bankruptcy is business, but every business man reads them.

37,919. If it is desirable as a deterrent that these facts should be known to a certain extent, is the mere publication of the result sufficient? It has been represented to us that it is not?—I think it would be.

37,920. In a case where an innocent person's name is brought in, and you think there should be some details published in justification of that innocent person, how is that to be regulated?—By leaving the name out altogether, if possible.

37,921. Can you? Must you not name the co-respondent, if you publish the bare detail you are suggesting?—I am not a sufficient lawyer to know whether it could be done, otherwise we would be forced to give more details. It would not be fair to say, Jones v. Jones and Another, with his name, and then say, "Result, no decree," because the man's name is there. In that case I do not think the mere result would be sufficient to exonerate that man from any complicity in the affair.

37,922. Therefore I want to know who is to regulate what is to be published in justice to the innocent man?—I would suggest the judge who conducts the case. It would not be very much trouble to him if, at the end of a case, the officers of the court asked what was to go out, merely a few lines.

37,923. Then you are making the judge really the censor of the report, are you not?—Hardly the censor. Here is an innocent man. Looking at it from the point of view of wanting to avoid long accounts of proceedings, if you put the results, which would do in all cases of guilt, you ought to have some other procedure in the case where there is an innocent man, and the only thing I can see is a fuller account of that case, or the judge's summing-up, or that the judge should put forward a statement of his own.

37,924. You would suggest the judge's summing-up, which would probably deal with the innocent man, should be included in addition to the bare details. That would apply to other cases?—Yes. In the case of a summing-up, you could see the people who were innocent as co-respondents, and also witnesses; their names are brought into the Divorce Court, and you know how it clings, although people sometimes do not trouble to read the case. They say "Jones has been in a divorce case," whether as a witness or anything else. That is an aspect you have to deal with.

37,925. I am pointing out to you the difficulties of your own suggestion in regard to these cases?—I am sure it is a very difficult thing indeed.

37,926. You see it would not be sufficient in such cases simply to publish the results?—That is so.

37,927. May I ask you about two influences that operate in the conduct of a paper like yours. First, you are anxious to keep out of the paper, being a family paper, detailed reports which may be objection able to heads of families, and on the other hand you admit that there is a competitive influence which compels you to a considerable extent to publish certain details because other papers of the same standing may publish them?—Not the details. We have to give the case. The case itself may not be full of details, but still the whole case turns on a sordid or filthy or extremely sexual point. We have to give the case, otherwise people would buy another paper because they want to see that case. We do not search them out; we do not look for them; we rather repress them, and it is a very difficult thing every day when divorce proceedings are on to give a proper account of a case. Mind you, you are open to legal proceedings if you do not give exactly what happened, so that we have to be very careful.

37,928. I was rather putting to you, would you not welcome the influence of some fresh law upon the matter to back you up in your desire not to give details which to some extent you are compelled to give because other papers will give them?—Certainly.

37,929. With regard to the matter Mr. Brierley called attention to, the position which the "Evening Standard" occupies in regard to these reports, you say that the "Standard" gives somewhat extended reports because it is their practice to give rather lengthy reports of law cases in general?—Yes.

37,930. Does the "Evening Standard" give reports as fully of law cases generally as the morning "Standard"?—I could not tell you without making out a proportion. We are a bigger paper; the "Evening Standard" is a smaller paper. I would rather ask what is the proportion to the whole paper of police and divorce cases in the morning "Standard" and the "Evening Standard," and I could not tell you off-hand. I should say in the "Evening Standard" you would find the proportion was smaller in space than in the morning "Standard."

37,931. With regard to the columns, the "Evening Standard" which has 171½ columns as against the daily "Standard" 114, that is accounted for by the fact of the small page in the "Evening Standard"; to judge from one's casual knowledge of evening papers, as a rule they do not give the law reports to anything like the extent of the morning papers. If I wanted to go to the law reports I should not go to the "Evening Standard," I should go to the morning "Standard." Does it not show that the "Evening Standard" does give these divorce cases at considerable length?—Are these figures for divorce cases or law cases generally?

37,932. Divorce cases?—I should not think it gives more prominence than any other evening paper. It would give more space because it has more space. The make-up of a paper has to be taken into consideration. There are two pages set aside for police and law cases; they have to be filled up. You cannot put anything else on.

37,933. As a matter of fact you are not personally able to tell me whether the "Evening Standard" contains a considerable amount of law cases reported generally?—Yes, it has, I know.

37,934. The difference probably would be accounted for by the length of the columns.

37,935. (Chairman.) I am not sure I appreciate this view of yours about the proportion, because the question is how much is actually in the paper of this kind of thing, whether it is a large paper or not?—Take an 8-page paper, and a third of that is given up to that kind of thing. Surely that, from the point of view of the Commission, or rather from the high ethical point of view, is worse than a paper which only gives up one-tenth.

37,936. That may be, but the amount of one-tenth may be just as objectionable, although it appears in a larger paper or a smaller paper. I do not see your proportional idea improves the matter. If it is a column in a 6-page paper or a 10-page paper, the column is what we are considering?—Looking at it from the point of view of proportion, if a man gives a column in an 8-page paper and a column in a 12-page paper, it means the editor of the 8-page paper is determined to give as much as he can. By looking at the matter from the point of view of proportion, you have, at least, evidences of editorial intention.

37,937. I follow that from the editorial point of view, but the amount of material the public gets on this subject is the same?—Yes, but there is that difference.

37,938. That is rather from the editorial point of view, not giving more than a certain proportion, but still that proportion gets to the public?—You have to count the size of columns, too.

37,939. I am speaking of the same paper having the same size of columns, but more in one edition than another. I do not say, as regards the question we have to consider, whether the paper is large or small. The amount of objectionable material is what we are considering. From the editorial point of view I appreciate it?—And I have to put the editorial point of view forward because of these figures.

37,940. You used the expression "first-class divorce case"; what is the meaning of that?—I was speaking purely as a journalist there. I meant it was a thing that everybody wanted to read about.

37,941. I ask you because we were told that the Hilary Sittings of 1909 had what I think would come within that description, the Stirling case in Scotland. Do you recollect it at all?—Yes, that was what you would call a first-class divorce case from a news point of view.

37,942. That accounts for the fact that your paper, the "Standard," comes second in the morning papers we have; a quantity of material was published in connection with that. Of the evening papers the "Evening Standard" heads the list. Is that your paper too?—Yes. I am not editor of it, but it belongs to the same company.

37,943. That heads the lists of evening papers for material supplied of that case?—I wish to point out it is the biggest evening paper in size.

37,944. In that Hilary Sittings it gave 77¾ columns to divorce cases. It is a 20-page paper?—It varies from 20 to 24.

(Sir Lewis Dibdin.) In the next sittings I see it gave 9½.

37,945. (Chairman.) The Stirling case was finished then, I suppose?—I suppose so. I have forgotten when the Stirling case was.

37,946 The record for the evening papers during Hilary Sittings is: the "Pall Mall" 17, "Westminster Gazette" 30¾, "Evening Standard" 77¾, "Globe" 50, "Star" 36¼, "Evening News" 50. I suppose that is accounted for by the columns given to that case?—Undoubtedly.

37,947. Why do you think it is of advantage to the public to have a case of that sort circulated?—I do not suppose it was any particular advantage. I am willing, if the thing is made universal, not to publish such cases.

37,948. I quite appreciate that. It really comes to this, that if there is competition on the footing which is indicated, operating on the better class through the expansion—I am using those terms relatively—of those which devote more space to sensational matters, and if that competition remains, you are forced along the line more or less?—That is absolutely true.

37,949. You have frankly given your own views upon the general public value?—Yes.

(Chairman.) I ought to thank you very much on behalf of the Commissioners for your evidence. I am sure we shall attach great importance to it.

Mr. HAROLD HODGE called and examined.

37,950. (Chairman.) Are you the Editor of the "Saturday Review"?—I am.

37,951. How long have you been engaged in that work?—Since the end of 1898.

37,952. Your evidence is confined to the reporting of cases such as we have to consider?—Yes.

37,953. You commence your short memorandum by stating in your view these reports tend to have an injurious effect in the following way?—I ought to say my paper is not a newspaper; it is a review. I cannot speak from experience as to reporting. In the nature of things mine is hardly more than a pious opinion, but I give it for what it is worth. I think it is likely a great deal of harm is done by these reports as they appear now. I say "likely" because it seems a matter extremely hard to prove and hardly susceptible of proof. When one thinks of the reports as they are now, some of them at least, it seems to me almost certain that they must have an exciting effect on the prurient-minded reader. Also I think they act by way of suggestion on young readers. The whole subject of suggestion is very uncertain, I know, but I think it is fairly well admitted that young minds tend unconsciously to assimilate and grow rather like the things and the people they take an interest in. There cannot be any doubt that a great many young people do find reports of these divorce cases extremely interesting reading. To me more injurious than the question of indecency, or anything of that sort, is the excessive familiarity that the reading of these divorce reports induces in the mind of the reader reading these reports day by day. I am sure that a large number of people get the idea that divorce is a far commoner thing than it is. They get to think that in circles they know little about it is almost the normal end of marriage, and in a general way it produces far too much thought and talk and consideration of the whole subject of divorce and kindred questions than is good. I have the idea that it is well that the average man and woman should rather look upon divorce askance; in fact perhaps think it a shocking thing, and therefore it is not well that vast numbers of people of small experience should be constantly engaging their minds upon it. I believe myself, as far as I am able to judge, that is really the chief injury that flows from the reports of divorce cases as they are now.

37,954. You say at the end of the paragraph which you are taking your evidence from at the moment, "This results in a false social and moral perspective, "and sometimes reacts upon character, lowering the "tone"?—Yes. I think people thinking divorce is such a very common feature of social life in classes higher than their own, come to think, which is not unnatural, that it is not such a very bad thing after all, not so very wicked after all, and unconsciously they lower their tone, their view on the whole question, and think it is so common a thing and so normal that they need not take it so seriously as they would. I believe that kind of feeling has spread.

37,955. If these cases are reported, have you any suggestion to make?—I should like them not to be reported at all; but if they have to be, it seems to me to report the result so that there may be a record in public prints should be enough. It may be required to state actually what took place, what was decided by the judge; but if that is not enough, it always seems to me that there could be an official report issued subject to the court. It would be a libel, I take it, for any paper to publish anything concerning that divorce case which was not contained in that official report.

37,956. That is a third alternative; either no report, or report of results, or report supervised in some way?—Yes. The idea I have is that there would be an official reporter to the court, and that he would have to take down exactly what happens verbatim of the whole thing, and some officer of the court would draw up a report for the Press which was to go out, and that would be issued subject to the approval of the judge.

37,957. That is your last alternative?—Yes.

37,958. You prefer the first?—I would rather have no reports.

37,959. (Mr. Spender.) When you say "no report," do you mean that the court should be absolutely sealed; that there should not be a record publishable in the papers?—That is what I would rather have. I would provide means, in case it was required by somebody as a matter affecting his own personal interest seriously, to find out what did take place; that there should be a means of applying to the court to enable him to see the official report.

37,960. In that case you would have a longhand report of the proceedings?—Verbatim.

37,961. Filed in the court?—Yes.

37,962. And accessible on payment of a fee?—I would rather have it on application to the judge in court. To make it accessible on payment of a fee would make it too easily got at. It would be hard to prevent somebody paying the fee and using what he saw as copy in his own paper.

37,963. Supposing there was something in these reports which was very relevant to the character of a public man or a distinguished man, would you prevent a newspaper from publishing that and making reference to the case?—If any paper wanted to state something specific that was given in evidence in the trial, he should not be allowed to do that until he had made application first in court on the question, and then the judge would have to decide whether it was in the interest of the public that it should be made public. I should not leave it to the discretion of the editor.

37,964. You want a regular application in court, supposing the editor had reason to think there was something material in the case?—Yes.

37,965. You would want a formal application to the court then?—Yes.

37,966. Part of that first plan would be the existence of a record of all cases, a verbatim report of the trial?—Yes: it would be a record of the court.

37,967. The result would be given and the names of the parties?—And what happened when the case concluded.

37,968. You do not think that might do injustice to innocent parties, levelling the whole Divorce Court to practically one procedure?—I can imagine a case where it would, but as in everything else one has to consider the balance of advantage.

37,969. You would not allow the parties who would be aggrieved by private trial to make application?—Yes, it would be free to everybody to make application, and then the court must decide whether the application would be granted.

37,970. You would add that as a condition to your plan of publishing the result only, that either party might apply for a public trial?—Yes.

37,971. And the judge would decide?—Yes.

37,972. That we might add to your second alternative?—No, it is not a question of public trial; I do not propose a divorce case should be tried privately, but that they should not be reported. You said "public trial."

37,973. I was putting the case of a party who might be injured by a private trial followed by publication of results, or an innocent co-respondent or petitioner who thought it important to his character that he should be publicly acquitted?—I should not put it in that way. I should not like in any case the trial to be open to reporters, but anybody could apply that the verbatim report could be published after the event. I do not want the outside reporter to have any status in the court.

37,974. A verbatim report in all cases, and possible application to the court for liberty to publish it afterwards?—Yes.

37,975. With regard to the official report, have you considered the form and difficulties of that? It is put to us that that is an extremely difficult proposal, because it would throw on the court great responsibilities which now belong to the editor, and the editor knows it is very difficult?—If a man has a very responsible position he must take the responsibility; it cannot be helped.

37,976. That is so at present. Would you transfer it all to the judge?—In the interest of the public it is far better that the responsibility should be on the judge and not on the editor.

37,977. One purely general question. It is suggested to us that the privacy of divorce might have the opposite effect from what you suggest; that is to say, if it became as it is very much in France, a mere private incident, which is supposed to concern only the parties, and the public interest to be a prying into it, it would render divorce easier and a much more familiar thing than the extreme publicity and the sensation which may attach to it in an English court of law. Do you think there is any point in that view?—It might make it, as it were, in a sense a smaller thing, not such a big thing in the public light, but I do not see how it can make the public more familiar with divorce.

37,978. It makes the possible parties to divorce familiar with it as a very usual piece of machinery. Practically it comes to this. Do you regard the publication as a deterrent to the people who come into a Divorce Court?—I have not been able to gather from the evidence, from being here this morning, what the publication of reports is supposed to deter. Is it to deter immorality or the bringing of divorce suits?

37,979. I should not like to summarise the evidence so far. There is a difference of opinion. Broadly speaking we have had a great deal of evidence which suggested that a divorce suit entails these consequences and is a deterrent to some by the scandal, to others against the commission of the offence, at all events it gets into the consciousness or the subconsciousness that these conse uences follow just as penalty follows crime?—I should say as a deterrent of immorality it did not exist: as a deterrent of bringing divorce suits it might, but I should not think it would very often. I cannot conceive that people who meant to do it would be kept from doing it finally because of the appearance of a report.

(Mr. Spender.) I only wish to illustrate your view on the subject.

37,980. (Sir William Anson.) You say you prefer no report?—That would be the ideal.

37,981. Do you mean the proceedings should take place in camera, or that the proceedings should be public, but that a report of the proceedings should be forbidden by law?—The proceedings should be public, but no report should be allowed outside the court. There would have to be the official record of the proceedings, which in any case I should want to be verbatim, and that is all.

37,982. (Chairman.) They are now taken verbatim, but not at present for publication?—That would remain, I mean.

(Chairman.) There is an official shorthandwriter—perhaps the Commissioners do not know that—who takes a note. For instance, the King's Proctor or any party in the suit is always entitled to get it. Others get it only on application to the judge. If there is adequate interest I think I am correct in saying they generally are allowed to have a transcript.

37,983. (Sir William Anson.) How do you meet the case of an innocent party who was made a co-respondent to the proceedings, or an innocent witness who was brought in under circumstances which were compromising to his character? How do you meet those cases?—If there was no report at all?

37,984. Because socially it would be known that A. or B. had been a co-respondent or called as a witness?—That would be a serious obstacle to having no report, but looking at the matter from the public point of view I still think on the whole the balance of public advantage would be to have none, and even if a particular party had from time to time to suffer from it.

37,985. You are afraid that the public, being aware that divorce proceedings take place, multiplies them in its own imagination?—I think they do very largely indeed.

37,986. And get to think that the marriage tie is much less respected in this country than it is?—Certainly less, and also themselves get respected less.

37,987. If simply the results of these proceedings were known, anyone might make a calculation at the end of the year and the number of proceedings in the course of the year might be published, and no-one would have an excuse for thinking they bore any large proportion to the number of marriages. Do you see any objection to the bare results with so much additional information as the judge himself thought right, or on the application of one of the parties, to put in with a view to clearing the character of innocent persons?—I should think that an improvement on the present state of things, but not sufficient because, although anybody could make that calculation, extraordinarily few would. They would run their eyes over all they could find about divorce, and they would notice every day during the session of the court some divorce was granted or refused, and go away thinking it was a common thing. Exceedingly few people calculate seriously.

37,988. It would be still a matter of knowledge that divorce proceedings took place and parties were divorced?—Yes.

37,989. Do you not think absolute secrecy in the matter might have even a more serious effect on public imagination than the bare statement of results with qualifications such as I have mentioned?—The mere study of it would?

37,990. Yes?—That would be largely dispelled by the fact of the proceedings in public.

37,991. If the proceedings were public the public would know divorce took place?—You cannot prevent the public knowing divorce takes place. I do not want to make the public imagine there is no such thing as divorce. Far from it. Divorce happens, and it is no good pretending it does not. All I care about is that something should be altered so that the public mind should not be constantly turned upon it as it is now. I think divorce occupies the public mind to an extremely injurious extent, and I do not see how it is to occupy it less so long as we have a large portion of the daily papers given to it.

37,992. The effect on the public imagination, you think, would be improved if no proceedings were reported?—Yes, it seems to me certain that they would think less about divorce than they do now, and those who wanted to think about it in a serious and scientific way still would. It would not affect them if they wanted to study it. I do not want to interfere with anybody who wants to study divorce in a serious way, whether dramatist or author: it is the ordinary reader. I am thinking of classes of people who read very largely, small shopkeepers and people like that. I know they do.

37,993. You would not resent general legislation either in the direction of the entire prohibition of reports, or of reducing it to a statement of results of fact and law, with any further facts which the judge thought right should appear, either in the interest of an innocent party or an innocent witness?—I should welcome it extremely.

37,994. (The Archbishop of York.) I rather gather your personal opinion would be against no report of any kind except a report of the result?—Yes.

37,995. Do you think the mere publication of the result gives sufficient publicity to the termination of a relationship in which the State has shown its interest by insisting on publicity before it was entered into?—It seems to me enough. I do not see that any more publicity is given to the end of the case by what happens under the present plan than if you simply publish the result. After all, the result of the case only occupies a few lines.

37,996. An undefended case?—No matter whether defended or undefended, the end of the case is given in a few lines at the end. I do not see that gives any more publicity than supposing it was published in a single paragraph. If you put in a single paragraph of 10 lines, headed So-and-so Divorce Case—Result, it is very likely to impress itself on readers' minds more than now. I am sure for good or bad that would be largely read.

37,997. Nothing like the same number of people would read that record of the result as read the report now, and the papers would say it was not worth while to publish it?—I do not think they would, but still that is a matter of opinion. It is quite true a good many less would read it. I should regard that as so much undiluted gain.

37,998. (Mrs. Tennant.) Have you formed any opinion on the proposals which have been made to us that reporters should be licensed?—I have. I am very strongly against that, because on principle I think it is putting on the reporter what is not his business. Surely the business of a reporter is to report exactly what takes place. It is not his business to select between one portion of evidence and another. If you lay on the reporter the burden of having to discriminate between the various events he has to report, you put him in a different position, and I think it has had—I do not say in divorce cases, but in a great many other branches of news—a very serious effect. That has been the objection to the descriptive and imaginative reporter, who makes it so hard to know exactly what takes place very often. I think if the reporter is given the power to do more than take down what is there, you are putting on him a responsibility which ought to be on the court.

37,999. What is your view as to the other proposal, which is analogous, that only barristers should be selected?—That would be, I think, a very admirable thing. As a barrister myself I should naturally think it a great gain, but I do not think it would meet the whole situation. It would be better than now.

38,000. It leaves the onus of decision with the barrister?—I should think he was much more capable of bearing the burden than some of the existing reporters, but still I do not think it would meet what is wanted.

38,001. (Lord Guthrie.) I suppose you do not think that the divorce proceedings appearing at the present time in the best papers form a fitting subject for general conversation?—I should not put it in that way. I should not object to any divorce being discussed in a general way amongst people of what I may call right minds. It is not that I think these cases are not fit to discuss, but that it tends to make a very large number of people, whose experience is small and who are likely to look at these things in what I may call a diseased way, not knowing the whole truth, think about them far more than they need or would.

38,002. You refer to right-minded people. What do you say to those cases being the subject of general conversation among young people, especially of opposite sexes?—I think it is unfortunate, when they are.

38,003. So long as they are reported as they are in the best papers, it is not unnatural that they should be discussed in the way I mention?—Of course they are, certainly.

38,004. It is not unnatural, the idea that anything in the papers is fit for anyone to discuss?—A young person might think that.

38,005. You think that is an unfortunate result?—Yes.

38,006. If there is to be any publication, I suppose it would be right that all divorce cases, defended or undefended, should be published?—I should think so, because the only defence for publication is the interest of the parties, and that there should be a public record of the fact. That really would apply to all.

38,007. If there be anything in the deterrent, I think it should apply to all cases also?—Yes.

38,008. Do you know at the present moment the fact is that only about one-quarter of the cases appear in any newspaper?—I was not aware of that, but I daresay it is so.

38,009. It has been said that if the view you entertain about divorce cases were to be given effect to, the same would follow in regard to police court cases, and many High Court criminal cases, where sexual matters are involved. What do you say to that suggestion?—Whether it would follow or not, is doubtful. Whether it ought to follow is, I admit, a difficult question. I can conceive there are criminal cases which it would be better if they were not reported, but, frankly, I should not be by any means prepared to lay down that in a general way, as to criminal cases, as I have to divorce cases. I can see many considerations why criminal cases should be reported, which, I think, would not apply to divorce cases.

38,010. Even although, logically, it did follow, that does not prevent divorce being dealt with now, leaving the others to be dealt with afterwards?—No, because, after all, consistency is not the only virtue to be considered.

38,011. You have no information as to what is done in such countries as France, where your views about reporting being excluded are carried out. You do not know whether any official report is given, or not?—I have no special knowledge.

38,012. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) You are against reporters being licensed in the Divorce Court?—Yes.

38,013. That is because you think the reporter is not the right person to have so much discretion thrown upon him?—I do not think it is fair to him. I do not think it ought to be done. It is not his province.

38,014. Why not?—The reporter's province is to report only. He has not to discriminate between the desirability of publishing one portion of evidence and the desirability of publishing another. It is an entirely different province.

38,015. You know that a reporter is a skilled person?—Certainly.

38,016. That reporting is rather a science?—Yes, in a sense. More an art, I should think.

38,017. You know also that no reporter in reporting a matter in an ordinary way takes a full shorthand note of it?—I suppose he does not in the ordinary way.

38,018. The papers would not hold it?—I agree.

38,019. So that he has in every matter to select what had better be published and what had not?—He very often does, but I feel often with extremely unfortunate results.

38,020. Is not that necessarily part of his professional duty, when he is reporting any event, whether it be a divorce case or anything else. He must make some selection as to what he will publish and what he will leave unpublished?—He cannot help it, as a rule, because of the conditions of his work.

38,021. That is his business?—It is his business only in the sense of that circumstance.

38,022. Have you had any practical knowledge of reporting yourself?—None whatever.

38,023. You think it would not be so undesirable if that discretion rested with a barrister?—I think so.

38,024. Has a barrister special training of that kind?—In discrimination?

38,025. In reporting, discriminating what to report and not report?—I do not think you can say he has any special training, only I think his whole training, both his legal training and the education he has probably had before, would make him better able to discriminate than the ordinary reporter.

38,026. Am I right in saying a barrister has no training, as such, in reporting at all?—Probably he has not.

38,027. Is there any doubt about it?—He may have by chance.

38,028. He is not examined in reporting before being made a barrister?—No, certainly not.

38,029. Would it meet your view if the results were published? Is the idea that there should be a settled column, part of the news of the paper, in which the results should appear? How would it appear?—I should suppose that would be in the discretion of the editor. He would put it where he thought fit.

38,030. His discretion might take the form of not giving it at all?—I should not compel him if he did not wish to.

38,031. The importance of publication would not be satisfied because there would be no publication?—If anybody took the view it was very important it should be published, I suppose he would want to have some provision to compel its publication, but I would rather it was not published.

38,032. I thought you told Sir William Anson you did think it important that the results should appear?—I said it might be. I have said I would like to have no reports. But if there have to be reports, I would rather have the result than anything else. If you must have him, I would prefer an official reporter.

38,033. You would prefer that even the names were not mentioned?—Yes.

38,034. Has it occurred to you that in some sections of society that would be exactly what those who are the subjects of divorce cases would prefer. The thing they are most afraid of is that their dirty linen should be washed in public?—I can believe it would suit a good many parties, who contemplate divorce, that it should not be published.

38,035. Not all parties, but all guilty parties?—It might suit the innocent parties too sometimes.

38,036. You would face that?—That might be unfortunate and sometimes amount to a personal injury, but I should say public advantage was greater on the side of not publishing it. and the private injury must give way to the public advantage.

38,037. If you cannot achieve that, the next best thing would be to only publish results?—That is the way it has occurred to me.

38,038. It would be like an extra column added to births, marriages, and deaths—a column of divorce?—That surely is a matter for the editor's discretion. I should not lay down for any editor how he is to print items of news. He might choose to make it a fourth column on the first page, but if he thinks, as he would probably, he could make more use of it by a more attractive paragraph, he could do it. I should not interfere with that.

38,039. Your third alternative is that there should be, first of all, a shorthand note taken in court of the whole proceedings, which is done now by the official reporter, and then from that some official person should make a report, and that should be accessible to the Press?—Only the report must be issued subject to the approval of the judge.

38,040. Has it occurred to you that all those steps would take some time, and that a report so framed would not be very fresh?—I should have thought the report of the day's proceedings could always be done in time for the papers to have the official report and to publish it the next morning, because the paper need not have it till the early hours in the morning, or late at night, any way.

38,041. Think of the steps. First of all the shorthand note is taken, then it has to be written out?—Yes.

38,042. Then it has to be condensed; the official reporter has to make a report from it?—The official reporter would be at the whole proceedings, and his mind would be occupied with the report all day, and when he came face to face with the verbatim report his mind would be made up as to what ought to go out and what ought not.

38,043. That would help him, but it would be unwise to make up the report without looking at the shorthand notes?—I am not suggesting that.

38,044. There is a further step, that the official reporter must have the shorthand note copied out, and use that for the purpose of making his report?—Plainly.

38,045. When that is done it has to go to the judge for his revision?—Yes.

38,046. Do you seriously think, all those steps being taken, it would be ready in time for the next morning's paper?—I think it possible. Things can be done very quickly.

38,047. (Sir George White.) Your ideal is to have no report at all?—Yes.

38,048. And yet to have the court open?—Yes.

38,049. Do you think it is practical to have an open court and an absolutely silent Press?—It might be. I should conceive it was difficult. I believe certain papers—I hope a few—would think it worth while to take the chance of any punishment inflicted on the editor in order to have the copy, but, on the other hand, I think that it could be kept down to a very small proportion compared with what they are now.

(Sir George White.) I do not know whether your Lordship would say that would be contempt of court for anyone in court to make any communications to the paper.

(Chairman.) There is no difficulty whatever upon that. Prohibition of publication is Mr. Hodge's point. It is equally true whether conveyed or written down at the time.

(Sir George White.) My point is, with an open court and a large number of people present, would it be contempt of court to communicate anything to the Press and publish anything that transpired?

(Chairman.) Certainly. Mr. Hodge would say so if there was prohibition of publication.

38,050. With regard to the difficulty of getting the report out, do you see any detriment to the report being delayed a few days?—I should not, personally, but I could understand that the editor of a daily paper might see great detriment.

38,051. I am speaking of the public interest; it would not matter whether it came out on Monday or Saturday?—Not at all. I am not looking at it from a newspaper point of view.

38,052. With regard to the suggestion of an official reporter, you were asked as to the discrimination of reporters at present in making a report. Would you regard the discrimination at present employed as a discrimination exercised as to whether it was better in the public interest to report this or that, or whether it was better for the paper's sale?—I should say my own belief was—it is purely my own personal view—in regard to the greater number of papers, that the interest of the papers was the main thing to the Press, perhaps the only thing. I should also say that there was a considerable number in which both public interest and the interest of the paper were considered.

38,053. As you seem to have reflected upon this a great deal, I should like to know whether you can present to us what you think are the considerations which distinguish between the publication of criminal cases and divorce cases?—The first consideration that would appeal to me is this. It seems to me just possible that the course of justice in criminal cases could be affected by its not being published. It might be certain points which were in favour of the defendant or of the prisoner might be slurred over for some reason or another, by accident or something, and if that were published it would be a good deal harder to do that. I also think that the prisoner is entitled to have all that can be said in his interest published as far and wide as possible. It seems to me very important that all that can be said in favour of an accused person should not only be said but made public.

38,054. Is there anything else that occurs to you at the moment?—Not at the moment. I did not really go into that seriously.

38,055. I gather your broad view is that the private interest had better be sacrificed to the public interest, because the present system, as it were, feeds the imagination of a large section of readers?—Yes. That is why I think that more injury is probably done by the respectable reports of divorce cases than by the others, because they are read by a far larger number of people.

38,056. Supposing your view were adopted of publication not being allowed, but the official shorthand writer still taking his note, do you think it would meet any particular difficulty, either in the case of a public man or a party who desired to have his innocence put forth before the world, that the judge should have power to authorise, upon application either of a public authority or an interested individual, the publication of the report?—I do.

38,057. On a special application showing interest of a private or public character sufficient to justify it?—Yes.

38,058. That would meet one point of view?—Yes. I think the application should be made in court.

38,059. The other matter you have not been asked about is this: to what extent do you attach importance to the interests of the children of married people on this question of publicity?—I should think that in many ways the publicity might be injurious to the children.

(Chairman.) We ought to thank you very much for your evidence and hope your attendance has not interfered too much with your public duties.

Mr. John Searles Ragland Phillips called and examined.

38,060. (Chairman.) Will you kindly tell us your position in the newspaper world?—I am managing editor and editor-in-chief of the "Yorkshire Post" and its other papers.

38,061. Where do you do your work?—In Leeds.

38,062. Your name was mentioned to the secretary by the Northern Newspaper Society?—Or by the Newspaper Society, I think.

38,063. By both, I am told?—Very likely by both.

38,064. Are you a member of the Northern Federation of Newspapers Owners?—Yes.

38,065. And the Newspaper Society?—Yes.

38,066. How long have you been engaged in editorial work?—Since 1878.

38,067. I have your proof before me, and I will follow that?—Before that is touched I wanted to say a word or two about some other matters which have arisen since.

38,068. If they have arisen since I would rather have them afterwards?—If you please.

38,069. In giving evidence you desire to say you do not represent, although you are a member of, any definite newspaper organisation?—Yes.

38,070. Your evidence will be your own views?—That is so.

38,071. You say that the opinions of proprietors of journals vary so much that it has not been found practicable to appoint anyone to represent the whole?—That is so.

38,072. The opinions are not capable of any such definite and simple grouping?—Yes.

38,073. Some are favourable to a total abolition of reports, only they think the names of the parties and the decision should be given?—A few.

38,074. That would not be what you call readable matter, and would not be worth inserting?—That is so.

38,075. That probably would lead to non-publication?—Yes.

38,076. You say another section of your paper friends believe in what may be called limited and official publication?—Yes.

38,077. Will you explain that?—That is a publication written out by an official reporter of the court sanctioned by the judge, or issued on the responsibility of the official reporter.

38,078. May I take the next paragraph and see if that expresses your view on that head: "They agree with certain of the opinions expressed before this Commission, that if there were an official reporter in the court, responsible to the judge for what was sent out, this would meet the need of publicity in which they believe. They do not think it would be consistent with public interest that there should be no reporting of such cases: on the other hand, they are very strongly of opinion that some of the reports printed at the present time—mainly, they say, by a few weekly papers which do not rank in high-class journalism, although they may have large circulations—are much to be deprecated"?—That is so.

38,079. Then you proceed to say what reports you have examined?—Yes.

38,080. Why do they consider they are to be deprecated?—The witness you have already had, namely, Mr. Russell-Allen, who is a friend of mine, and also Sir Francis Gould, think the publication of these cases does have a demoralising effect upon the public.

38,081. What is your own view upon that point?—I do not think there is any evidence of it.

38,082. Is this still the view of those you are dealing with: "It is felt that unchecked publication is very apt to run into indecency, and that reports of the kind which they deprecate tend to degrade the readers, and possibly to encourage immorality"? That is the point on which they entertain that view, but you do not agree?—No.

38,083. How far do you go?—I am opposed to the publication of any matter which is obscene or indecent. I do not know how far I can go beyond that.

38,084. The point, if I may put it plainly, is not that any paper publishes what could be characterised as obscene or indecent, but points in its reports of this class of case too much to sexual matters, and, therefore, has a detrimental effect by being read by a large section of juvenile readers?—There may be an excess in the amount of publication, I would not deny that there is in some cases, but I do not see how to limit it without going further than I think desirable, that is, how to limit it by legal means. You can limit it by editorial discretion: that is one way.

38,085. You say "There are other journalists of standing who, while holding strongly that matter of the kind is injurious to the national life, are yet afraid that the restraint of publication would tend to defeat the interests of justice; they have known very many cases where publication has led to the discovery of fresh evidence, one way or the other"?—That is true.

38,086. There are three categories of people, so far?—Yes.

38,087. Can you tell us which preponderates?—The last category preponderates, I believe.

38,088. I do not propose to go through the details of some of these cases to which you refer. I would like to come down to a passage in the paper which says: "The point I wish to make here is, that if your object is to prevent the publication and wide dissemination by newspapers of objectionable matter involving sexualism, and, one may add, abnormality, you must throw your net much more widely than has been suggested by any of the witnesses whose evidence I have seen. You must aim, not against the publication of reports of divorce cases, but against that of this much more extended class of reports, many of them, to my mind, far worse than the mere giving of such details as are ordinarily reported in connection with applications for divorce." That may be true in one sense, but is there any real objection to curtailing? Assume for a moment that the reporting of divorce cases is not a good thing. Is there any justification for it because others might go on and be reported if you prohibit it?—In the first place I think that the limitation of divorce cases would not affect the others; that is to say, you might restrict the total amount by the elimination of divorce cases. That is what you suggest. I quite agree that is so, but, on the other hand, there are, as I tried to show other reasons which would operate against such conclusion.

38,089. Logically it does not follow that because it may be a bad thing to publish one class of case, therefore you should take no steps to stop the publication of another class of case?—That is perfectly logical and clear.

38,090. Lower down you proceed thus: "There is one striking distinction between newspaper reports of divorce cases and literature such as I have just indicated, in this: that the reports of the divorce case may, and often do, serve a very useful purpose of either rehabilitating the character of some person who had been attacked, or in showing a prominent person in his true character; and, further, that the fear of publicity may exercise some deterrent effect, whereas in the novel, where all the personages are fictitious, publication does not seem to provide any equivalent benefits." You are drawing a distinction between the publication of reports of actual matters and fiction?—That is so.

38,091. Rather in favour of the view of publication of the actual facts?—That is so.

38,092. I do not propose to go through the details?—I did not propose to read the extracts, but I thought I should put them on my proof for the benefit of your Commission.

38,093. You find, unfortunately, in fiction objectionable features which you would like to see got rid of?—Yes, and very much worse than any I have seen in reports of divorce cases.

38,094. I quite appreciate the point. I would like to take it in this way. A good deal of what I have had my attention called to on page 5 is comment on what witnesses have said before this Commission, which no doubt you have studied with great care?—That is so. It was my own view of points which had been raised and which might or might not have suggested themselves otherwise to me.

38,095. I think it would be best if you would state to us exactly what your own views are. We have all had a look through this proof, no doubt, and therefore we appreciate the minute criticisms, but I think it would be best if you would tell us what your own conclusions are?—That is getting apart from the case I have prepared to show my opinions clearly.

38,096. I do not think it is necessary to go through a lot of detailed cases which are what I might call comments on the evidence which has been given. We want your own experience and your own views?—I may miss some of the points that are touched upon here, and if I do that is a misfortune, from my point of view.

38,097. I do not think you need think that, because we have all read it. Even if we do not get it on the notes it will be in our minds?—My own view is, in the first place, against the abolition of reports advocated by Mr. Hodge. I think, in the first place, that the public, or large sections of the public, do unquestionably hear beforehand of all the divorce cases which are coming on. They may see in the columns of the "Times" the cases which are set down for action, and you may have a divorce case with three or four co-respondents. It may happen that the case against some of the co-respondents breaks down altogether. Supposing you have no report, there is nothing to show the innocence of the innocent persons; there is nothing to show any mitigating facts; there is nothing to clear numbers of persons, witnesses as well as others, who may have been implicated by the gossip of their neighbours. That gossip is very extensive; I know that by my own knowledge. There are cases which I have referred to here in which there have been reports of a petitioner being alleged to behave unkindly to his wife and so has forced her conduct. The evidence in court has shown that to be absolutely unfounded, and cleared the petitioner entirely. Without the publication there would have been no clearance. I think, moreover, there is a large class of cases of persons of high rank, I have detailed some of them here, in politics, the Navy, the Army, or what not, who are involved in cases of the kind, and there I think the openness of the court (and the freedom of publication in a large degree) is not only permissible, but is a public duty. I do not see how you can set up a tribunal with power to say which of these cases shall and which shall not be published. I have named the cases here; I need not name them again. If the Commission has read them all, that is what I want. There are cases where undoubtedly there would not have been a full trial and conviction but for the fullest publication which was given in the papers of an earlier trial. That is my case in regard to those. You may have in the case of secrecy, the absolute secrecy Mr. Hodge wanted, a co-respondent who has been named in the list of cases and you have no report. Thereafter you may have in a political dispute, or what not, the allegation made that Mr. So-and-so had been a co-respondent in a divorce case. It would be perfectly true, but it would not represent the facts, and the publication of that statement would be quite legitimate; it would be to his detriment, and there would be no clearance of him at all. I think that is a very strong argument indeed against absolute prohibition.

Within its degree it goes in favour of freedom of reporting, subject always to the condition that there should be nothing obscene or impure published. It is the public aspect of it in that way upon which I lay stress.

38,098. Then you proceed further on to make the suggestion as to what your view would be, but perhaps before I pass to that, do you wish to say anything on the effect and the extent to which publicity is a deterrent?—That I do know to be the effect. The cases I have stated are facts. We have frequent applications from parties interested not to give anything of their cases, or to deal with them slightly. I would not like to express an opinion as to what extent that fear is an actual deterrent from the committal of adultery. That is quite another matter.

38,099. You heard Mr. Hodge say he did not think it had any?—I did.

38,100. The question of a fully reported case is another matter?—I think publication is part of the punishment, which is quite a different thing from being a deterrent, since you may say the publication of a case of embezzlement is also a part of the punishment, whereas it does not operate, we know, very greatly as a deterrent. I do not think very many clerks who embezzle, or managers of banks, or what not, have had in mind at all the fact of publication. They have had in view the punishment, their general ruin, their downfall. Publication is a secondary matter in that case, but when it comes on I think it is part of the punishment. In the same manner you have referred to the case of children. In the publication of divorce cases there is undoubtedly very much pain and suffering brought upon very many families altogther, and the innocent suffer with the guilty. Unfortunately we know from old times that has been the case. The children do suffer down to several generations, but it is equally the fact in the case of embezzlement. There you have the family suffering under a disgrace which they naturally consider a very serious one if their fathers have embezzled. The punishment is there; it falls upon them equally, I think, as in the case of a divorce trial. I do not think there is any difference from that point of view, and if you consider the children as the determining factor in the one case, then I think you set up a case against the publication of any trial whatever.

38,101. Then you proceed to deal with the suggestions. I do not think it much use making comments on suggestions made. I should like to have your own suggestions, whether you would leave matters as they are, or have you any suggestion to make as to any modification of the present practice?—I think there ought to be a somewhat stricter rule in regard to the checking of the publication of indecent matter. I should support any change in the law or any additional strictness of administration which would deal with that all round.

38,101A. Might I suggest there is a difficulty in treating any of these publications as indecent? The point made is that they are not necessarily indecent, but are harping on a subject which is not fit for the consideration, especially, of young people. To what extent would you go to meet that?—I think you might say that would apply equally to the case of extended trials of murder, and extended trials for a great many other offences. It would apply also to nearly every drama placed upon the boards, because nearly every drama I know of deals essentially either with a sexual problem or with some problem of swindling in some form or other. That is the case not only in the present day drama, but of all drama of which I have any knowledge.

38,102. You say to some extent you would restrict it. To what extent would you?—There are details published unquestionably from time to time which are indecent. I think if there was a prosecution in those cases where indecency can be proved, not only in the case of newspapers, but all others—for I should protest against any singling out of the newspaper press as being the worst offender; I do not think it is the worst offender—I think prosecutions of that kind would have a deterrent and beneficia effect. They would not only prevent what you and I might call the actual obscenity in publication, but they would also tend to check the going as near as possible to the border dividing line. Those of us who have any experience know that there is a great difficulty in saying, on the spur of the moment, what is or what is not actually proper for publication. Matters of that kind arise before an editor and his staff of sub-editors every night, and they have to be dealt with at once; and some of us deal with them on the principle of "leave out where you have any doubt," but there are others, I believe, who would run as near to the line as they possibly could.

38,103. I should like to ask you one general question. You said that there are instances in which there is an excess of reporting offensive details?—Yes.

38,104. Do you think that the publication of reports as it at present stands has a bad influence on the public?—Yes.

38,105. You have dealt with the operation as to individuals concerned in the cases, and the deterrent effect. I am now speaking of the general mass of readers and the effect it has upon them?—You have reminded me. I have suggested that the judges and counsel and others engaged constantly in handling divorce cases, are not, so far as my knowledge extends, worse in a moral respect than the rest of the population.

38,106. You partly put them in the same category as the young people?—As the rest of their class.

38,107. We are rather concerned with the young people?—There has never been, so far as I am aware, the slightest allegation that by reading reports of divorce cases young people or anybody else have been incited to go and do likewise. We have had many cases indeed of boys alleged to have been incited to theft and robbery by following the example of Dick Turpin and other heroes of the kind, but I am not aware of a case where there has been an incitement to adultery through the reading of a divorce case.

38,108. Perhaps you have not read the whole of the evidence we have had yet? At any rate, that is your view?—Yes.

38,109. Is there any other suggestion you think it worth while to put before us?—Might I deal for a moment with certain later facts?

38,110. You said you had something to say which had occurred since?—Yes. The first point was in regard to the table of columns collected by the Commission. No doubt they are perfectly accurate, but at the same time I would suggest they are misleading as they stand. In the first place, the "Westminster Gazette," over which Mr. Spender presides, is set down as publishing 61¼ columns of divorce cases, and the "Yorkshire Post" 60½ columns. I want to say that is a distinct injustice to Mr. Spender. The "Yorkshire Post" columns are longer to the extent of what we call two "sticks," about 30 lines in each column, so that the comparison is not accurate.

38,111. I think you may understand that we appreciate that?—Again, I want to point out that consideration must be given to what are called local cases as distinct from the general cases. There are a large number of local cases which we should report at a length of, perhaps, three or four inches, in accordance with what might seem to be their local interest as news. The London papers as a rule are less local than provincial papers. They would not have the same reason for publishing what we call the local cases we have. Those in the course of a year would mount up considerably. I understand it is the longer cases, those of greater news interest, which you have in mind.

38,112. You seem to have taken as much interest in the Scotch case as most of the other papers?—The Stirling case?

38,113. Yes. Your columns for that in the Hilary sittings of 1909 were 26½, and the other sittings only 3, 7, 8, 7¾ and 8—quite small?—That is perfectly accurate. In that matter, I may say frankly, we give as news what we think the public want to be interested in, always subject to the condensation and the elimination of matter which is in itself obscene. That, I think, is the general newspaper rule, and any suggestion to the contrary I should myself receive with suspicion.

38,114. We have heard Lord Guthrie's description of that. I think he tried it, but I do not gather why so much attention was given to it in any of the papers?—I do not recollect exactly the status of the parties. Was not one of them an actress, or something of that sort?

38,115. We were told so?—That, no doubt, would account for it. She had been known all over the country, or it would be supposed she was known, and that would account for the extent to which it was reported. May I say, if you take the columns, that really does not affect my case, because a larger number of columns might in themselves be more innocent than the smaller ones.

38,116. That is one point you wished to call attention to. Is there any other?—Yes. The other deals with the extent of the columns also. You have the "Western Morning News" down for 21¼ columns. That may possibly be influenced by the distance from London and consequently the greater difficulty of getting the news over in time, and the expense of getting it in the same way. Then I would say you have had raised the question of how the publication of these cases does affect the circulation of papers. I would suggest from the table itself that there is no strict comparison which can be drawn between the publication of length and the circulation of the papers. I may take the case of the "Standard" as compared with the "Daily News" and the "Chronicle." The "Standard" has a much larger number of columns than either of those other two papers, being a penny paper as against their halfpenny. I do not suppose the circulation is so large in actual numbers; it is more important, no doubt, but that is another matter. Again, we have been referred to the question of the lower strata of the population demanding the publication. The figures given in your table would seem to indicate that there is just as eager a demand in the higher strata as in the lower. We may point to the case of the "Times" and the "Daily Telegraph" as supporting that view. The question has arisen of the procedure of a newspaper in checking matter of the kind. I have a tolerably large experience, and in all law cases we get reports very much longer indeed than we could possibly find room for. They come into the office by train or by telegraph, and they are handled by sub-editors. We have in our office eight sub-editors, whose duty it is to select and cut down news all through the night. They are subject to general instructions from me, and they are also subject to my control when the matter is on the proofs before the paper is published, as a rule, although sometimes a proof or two will get through without being seen by the editor. The chief sub-editor glances at the matter when it comes in, or he has a report from another sub-editor upon its character and general news interest. Then he considers the amount of space at his disposal, and gives instructions accordingly as to what length it shall be given at, and the sub-editor in charge cuts it down. Subject to his general instructions it is passed to the printers and appears on the proof. The chief sub-editor glances at the proof, and so do I, as well as the official readers. That is the check we have, and that is the mode of procedure.

38,117. I should like to ask you some questions on two or three specific points. You are not in favour of restriction on the publication wholly; would you be in favour or not of publishing the names of the parties and the result?—That we should not do, and I think it would be objectionable from other points of view.

38,118. The points of view you have already mentioned?—Yes.

38,119. Then it is suggested further that it might be proper to have official reporters licensed for the purpose of reporting. Have you formed any view about that?—I think that would be impracticable. In the first place, suppose you appoint a barrister, we have this objection, from my point of view, that one trained ordinary reporter is worth a great deal more for our purpose than any barrister you can find who is not trained. In the next place, although I think an official reporter might write out his case while the case was proceeding, and side by side with a verbatim man who took the court record, yet by the time the judge had finished his dinner and was able to go through the proof the matter would be very late indeed for the provincial papers. It might not be so for the London papers, which have an extra hour to turn on. We go to press about the same time, and we find that with the matter telegraphed there is about one hour in favour of the London papers. That would, I am afraid, frequently give the London papers an advantage of a day in publication over the provincial papers. While I agree with the suggestion that it does not matter whether you publish a thing on the Monday, Tuesday, or Wednesday, one, two, or three days after it has occurred, provided every newspaper publishes on the same day, yet it does matter very much if one paper is given in practice a preference over another.

38,120. Assuming it was desirable to make some change, would you accept the view that no case should be published until after it was finished?—No, I would not.

38,121. Why?—I will tell you why. You may have cases of great importance which go on for four or five, six or seven days; it would be absolutely impossible to publish the whole report on the one day, to do it anything like adequately.

38,122. You could report a sufficient account to show what had taken place?—I mean a case like some of those I have referred to, high politicians.

38,123. Supposing it is not considered an advantage to publish the reports except so far as necessary to inform the public of what had happened, what objection would there be to say no one was to report the case till it is over?—I do not think you could report a case adequately, not from the freedom of reporting point of view I advocate, where the character of some high person is concerned. If the court were to regulate and limit the report that should be issued and published in a case of a royal personage or a high social person or statesman, or what not, the public would look upon that report with very great suspicion, and rightly so.

38,124. Even though it was published after the whole case was over?—Yes.

38,125. Is there any other point you wish to draw our attention to?—We have been referred to the pressure put upon more reputable newspapers to publish cases of this kind, the pressure they suffer because of the publication by others. I think that is exaggerated. I have sometimes said that we have in the Press and in literature a sort of application of what is known as Griffith's law in economics, which is this: Suppose you put bad money into circulation by the side of good money, the bad will drive the good out, and there is something of a similar application in the matter of literature and journalism. That applies generally rather than in the reporting of individual cases. It applies to the constant publication of chroniques scandeleuses from France and Italy, matters which would be outside the cognizance of a divorce law in this country, and which would not be touched by any of the proposals you have had made before you. Those cases are published very largely indeed in the papers with the largest circulation, and they are expensive to get. They are got by means of special correspondents, who are constantly on the watch, as they have in foreign countries. The worst cases of reporting we have had are not those of divorce cases; they are cases of abnormality largely, and some of them have been sent over to the extent of four or five columns from the United States.

38,126. (Mr. Spender.) In regard to the practice of reporting, do you give the results of undefended cases in the "Yorkshire Post" when they are local cases? Supposing there are local persons divorced and the action is not defended, is it your practice to give the result?—Very rarely; but if the case is undefended there is a statement of it by the counsel. That would not be the bare result, which is the point, I take it.

38,127. You would give a statement of it. Your reporter in London would have instructions to watch all local cases in the Divorce Court?—That is so.

38,128. He would send you not merely the bare result in those cases, but the result and the speeches of counsel?—Yes. Whether we published that or not would depend upon the condition of our columns as to pressure of space for other matter, and upon what might be regarded as the news interest of the case. Suppose it was a case of somebody of high standing in the county, then we should give the statement of it. If it were a case of, shall I say, a small shopkeeper, we should probably not give anything of it at all. We should refuse to publish.

38,129. Supposing there was no statement by counsel or proceedings in the court, and you had simply had the record that So-and-so was divorced and So-and-so was co-respondent, or whatever the bare result might be, and that concerned important people in your district, you would still publish that; you would feel obliged to?—If it concerned important people in the district we should probably publish it. May I take another case you will appreciate? We have a column called "Court and Personal." It gives the movements of people in a high status, their marriages and statements of that kind. Suppose my Lord Archbishop of York were engaged to be married; in that case we should insert a paragraph as soon as we could get it in that column "Court and Personal;" but if, shall I say, you yourself were engaged to be married and you wanted it to be published, we should charge you one guinea for it.

38,130. That sufficiently answers the question?—That is a case in point. That illustrates my point in regard to the publication of divorce cases. Where the matter seemed to be of considerable social or political interest we should give what we could and should not charge for it; but if the court or State wanted us to publish other cases which we considered not of interest in that shape we should certainly want someone to pay us for them.

38,131. The point I am trying to get at is this. Supposing an eminent person, a well-known person in the district, to have been divorced and you had the bare record of that, you would still publish it as you do now, without the statement of counsel?—I should indeed.

38,132. It has been suggested as a relevant point that a very small proportion comparatively of all these cases are reported. I think Lord Guthrie said just now only one quarter were reported. Is it not a fact that among all the divorces that come into the London courts a very large proportion are reported locally even if they are not reported in the London papers?—That is a point I had on my notes. When Lord Guthrie referred to it, I was going to suggest that I had not seen the figures. I had had no opportunity of examining the statement that only one case in four is reported. My point was that a large number of purely local cases would be reported solely in the locality in which they were of interest; that is to say, a West of England case would be reported in the "Western Morning News" or the Bristol papers, a Yorkshire case would be reported in the Yorkshire papers, and so on. They would not go outside their own area, so that it is rather difficult, and it would be a most complex table to find out how many were actually reported and at what length. Some would be reported in the daily papers, others would be reported only in the weekly papers. You would have to examine the whole press of Great Britain to have any solid figures.

38,133. That is the point I wanted to get at. In your view the effect of publicity is more even than has been suggested in present circumstances; it is seldom in London but very widespread locally?—Subject to the condition that I have not seen the statistics, I agree with you.

38,134. May I ask your view about the effect of certain statistics which have been laid before us and put in evidence, in regard to the difference between the weekly and the daily paper: the weekly paper has only one issue a week to six of the daily papers?—That is so.

38,135. Therefore when we see on this statement of fact that the paper called the "Umpire" has 238 columns, and the "News of the World" 118 columns, whereas the "Yorkshire Post" has only 44½ columns, it must mean that in the single issue of the weekly paper there is an immensely greater quantity of matter of that kind than there is in the daily issue of any other paper?—That is so. The weekly paper will sweep up the whole of the cases for the week and give them all at once, rather than day by day as the daily papers do.

38,136. Therefore in papers of that class you get a concentrated effect?—That is so.

38,137. By the collection of all these reports into one issue, whereas in the others they are spread over six?—More than that. Where you get the case of the publication of 210 columns in a paper published only once a week as against 60 columns in a paper published six times a week, the disproportion is increased.

38,138. I do not want to make a point of the difference between one class of paper and another, but it has been put to us by chief constables, police court missionaries and others, and we have had a very impressive volume of evidence to that effect, that a kind of impression is made by the practice of these weekly papers sweeping up this garbage, we will call it, which is becoming a very great evil among a number of the working classes. You would admit that that was a very serious matter. They say it is a new feature which pressmen would have to bear in mind?—May I say in regard to it being a new feature, I have here in my proof given cases of reports very much earlier, in the thirties, showing the extent to which matters of the kind were reported then and the character of the reports given. I think they were reported then much more fully than now, and details were given then which would not be given now. I must say, further, in regard to the weekly papers, while I should be ready to agree that the constant publication of such a large mass of matter of the kind is on the whole injurious, yet if you did not have it of the divorce cases you would certainly have its place taken by novels of a similar character, because you must remember, according to theory, that is given because there exists a demand for it in the public, which the proprietors and the editors of those newspapers think they must satisfy, and they will satisfy it, either with the fact as given in the Divorce Courts or the fiction as given by the novelists I have quoted. Unless you prohibited both I think you would entirely fail in your object.

38,139. You would say that supposing we cut off the Divorce Court there would be a great many other criminal cases, as you have said in your evidence, which the purveyors of this literature could take advantage of?—Yes.

38,140. And if you cut off those sources you would multiply fiction which would meet the same demand?—Yes.

38,141. You frankly admit the purveying of this material is for profit and in order to meet this prurient demand?—I do.

38,142. You would not as a pressman say any public interest was served by its appearance?—No.

38,143. It is pure commerce?—Yes, in the cases you have in mind; where you go to the cases of statesmen and persons of that class I hold that the interest is in the State.

38,144. We are face to face with a very wide extended commerce which has nothing to do with serious journalism?—Yes.

38,145. But which is wholly and solely for the purpose of profit, and which you admit to be highly demoralising?—To what extent it is demoralising I would not like to express an opinion. You put in the word "highly."

38,146. It would be very advisable if you could stop it?—When you look back at the history of literature, if you take the Restoration period, which is notorious for its plays and novels, during that period there was, I believe, a steady progress of the country in the right direction.

38,147. Suppose we could imagine a very extreme instance. I do not know that there exists such a journal, but supposing there was a weekly journal devoted entirely to divorce and criminal cases and sexual cases?—There are some almost, the "Police News," for instance.

38,148. Suppose we say "entirely," and it deliberately proclaimed itself as such, and suppose, as some of these newspapers have, it had a circulation running into a million or upwards, would you as a pressman object to proceedings being taken against that paper, and treating the whole thing as a kind of public nuisance?—Not if you could do that without interfering with the free publication of the other cases I have in mind.

38,149. It is the condensation in those that becomes evil?—That I should have no objection to.

38,150. Would you as a journalist have any objection to proceeding on the principle that at a certain point this thing becomes a public nuisance for which the purveyors may be fairly proceeded against in the public courts, I should say with a jury to decide whether any public interest was involved?—I should have no objection whatever to a proposal of that kind.

38,151. (Sir George White.) You say that the newspapers are not the greatest offenders in the matters about which we are enquiring. Do you consider them really offenders at all? Do you, in the existing state of these publications, believe that any change in the law is necessary?—I think a strengthening of the law or the administration in regard to publication of absolutely indecent matter may be desirable. I agree also with Mr. Spender's suggestion further than that.

38,152. Do you agree that any of these papers do publish indecent matter in their reports of divorce proceedings?—Sometimes, I believe, they do in divorce and in other matters.

38,153. Therefore, you consider some fresh regulation is necessary to check that. You are of opinion, from cases you cited, that there have been great improvements in the last two or three generations?—That is my belief, undoubtedly, as the result of enquiry.

38,154. Is it your opinion that this improvement continues, that is to say, during your connection with the daily Press have you found the change still going on in an upward direction?—I have not found any worsening. That is a general impression, whereas the other is the result of examination.

38,155. Do you agree with Mr. Gwynne when he says "I believe the moral tone of the country is rising "every day, for it is possible to point with some pride "to the fact that there is no print that could be "described as obscene or dirty which has any circula-"tion in England"?—I do not think I should agree with Mr. Gwynne.

38,156. You believe that there are such prints?—I believe there are such prints.

38,157. I am afraid that is so. You seem to generally guard yourself as to whether the effect of these publications that are more or less bad in their tone is bad upon the morals of the country?—That is a point upon which I certainly would not like to dogmatise, judging from my own survey of the history of literature.

38,158. You think there is no proof absolutely?—That there is a worsening in the country I have no proof.

38,159. Or that the effect of the publication of these reports is bad on the morals of the country?—I have no proof of it. I can only argue with myself on general principles.

38,160. (Sir Frederick Treves.) You lay great stress on the fact that publication has a deterrent effect?—I am told that it has in cases. It certainly has if one may judge by the desire the parties have that there should be no publication. It is part of the punishment, if not an actual deterrent.

38,161. Would not that deterrent effect be affected by the merest statement of the case without details?—I think not.

38,162. You quote the case of an official of a county council who would have been discharged from his office?—Who was.

38,163. If it had been known he was concerned in a divorce case?—Yes.

38,164. Surely the very barest statement of that case would have sufficed?—That applies in certain cases, but it would not apply as regards the social status of a great many people. In other cases the question of detail does undoubtedly arise because the friends of the parties and the public, their neighbours in villages and towns, judge not only by the fact of the presence or absence of legal guilt but by the whole of the surrounding conditions and circumstances.

38,165. In this particular instance, you cite this one case as an evidence of the beneficial effect, or the deterrent effect, at least, of publication?—The strong desire.

38,166. You admit the barest statement of the case without details would have sufficed?—Yes.

38,167. I suppose there must be many more like it?—I suppose there must. That is the only actual official case I have had before me.

38,168. You say that there is no evidence of the demoralising effect of publication. I take it that evidence is practically impossible to supply?—You have evidence of the demoralising effect on boys of literature of the Dick Turpin kind. You have absolute evidence of that. Whether you can get evidence of the other I do not know.

38,169. I do not know whether you think this is fair. You say there is no specific instance where adultery could be accredited to an individual through the reading of divorce reports. Surely you would not press that to such an extent as to suppose that because a report of a divorce case was not found amongst the papers of the guilty individuals, that they were uninfluenced by the reading of those reports?—I would be the last person to say there may not be such influence. If you say there is such influence, I could not contradict you; but I say I have not seen any evidence of it. I can only reason generally, but that is another matter, that is not evidence.

38,170. It may be perhaps regarded as a little unfair to put it in that way?—No, I think it is fair.

38,171. If this evidence on publication is not demoralising, do you consider the discussion of a divorce case at the family breakfast-table is a perfectly reasonable proceeding?—It might very conceivably have a moral tendency. May I take you to another point in that sense. You would not say, I think, with regard to any of the stories of Dickens which deal with seduction or adultery that the recital or the discussion of those cases in the family circle is demoralising? I should say it was not.

38,172. That is a little beside the question. You say there is no evidence of the demoralising effect of such publication. One therefore assumes you think it is not demoralising?—I did not say that.

38,173. There is no evidence, you say, of its having a demoralising effect?—Yes.

38,174. You own it might be demoralising?—Yes, I have done so already.

38,175. And yet not a subject to be discussed with advantage in a family circle?—That opens up a different question. It might be discussed with advantage.

38,176. Do you think generally that the avoidance of publication of detail would be a public advantage? You have mentioned reasons for and against?—In my final conclusion I think the prohibition would be disadvantageous. It is a balanced opinion; it is not a partisan pinion.

38,177. (Mr. Burt.) I understood you to suggest the desirability of some stricter rule with regard to publication?—Of anything indecent or obscene, and, as I have said to Mr. Spender, I should be quite ready to agree that the constant publication of a large mass of matter of that kind might be regarded as a public nuisance.

38,178. I suppose it would be difficult to formulate a general rule with regard to a matter of that kind?—It would undoubtedly be difficult, but so it is difficult when you come to formulate what is a public insanitary nuisance, such as the emission of smoke from a chimney, and a variety of things of that kind, as to which there may be differences of opinion, and yet we do find that the prosecution in cases of that kind becomes effective more or less.

38,179. You suggest, I think, prosecution in extreme cases?—Yes. I think that would have the effect of a general deterrent, a general warning; that might be desirable.

38,180. Without some specific rule or some alteration of the law, would it not be extremely difficult to get a conviction even in an extreme case?—I think not in an extreme case. There are many cases where you might obtain a conviction. You would not be able to obtain a conviction in a case which was just on the border line, but I think you would warn the purveyors of matters on the border line, and I think it would have an effect. I should very much deprecate any attempt to transfer that responsibility from the editor personally and the sub-editor acting under him. I should deprecate transferring responsibility from them to the reporter. That would not be consistent with the fixed practice of any paper I know of. We regard the reporter undoubtedly as exercising a discretion. He must do that, as you suggested, because he has to cut down his matter; he cannot give a verbatim report of anything that comes before him. That would be nonsense. But the rule we lay down is that he must report the salient facts of any meeting or trial as they come before him. That is the report we expect from him. After that we cut it down and take out what we regard as objectionable from any point of view, not only the moral point of view, but various others.

38,181. I take it the reporter would not be the responsible person in any case, it would be the editor?—That is so.

38,182. (The Archbishop of York.) You have put the question very broadly before us, and I should like to ask you one or two questions on the points you have brought out. I gather your main suggestion is the strengthening of the law against indecent publications?—That is so.

38,183. With regard to the suggestion that papers that habitually offend should be treated as public nuisances, do you mean that the Public Prosecutor should proceed against them?—The actual mode of procedure is a matter I have not considered, because I had not had the point raised till it was raised by Mr. Spender. My answer upon that question was entirely on the spur of the moment. It is an answer I would adhere to so far as it goes. As to the detail, I think the Public Prosecutor would be a reasonable officer.

38,184. Would there not be great danger—Mr. Burt has pointed out how difficult it is to secure a conviction—that the failure of any prosecution would be a great setback to the cause of cleanly reporting?—I do not think so. In the first place, the paper prosecuted, whether the case succeeded or not, would feel that it had gone very close to the line indeed. I think its editor, if it were a responsible paper, would feel that, and would exercise more control in future.

38,185. I lay emphasis on the "if." That applies to a paper of good conscience. Would not the papers we are thinking of mainly be prepared to run the risk and be glad of the advertisement?—There is another point in that connection. There are a large number of publications which persons will buy and will not take home to their families. There are others which they will not show. We all know a number of years ago Fielding's celebrated novel was said to be read surreptitiously in that way: it was not seen on the drawing-room table, but it was read in private. In the same way if you give a paper a public reputation for being indecent, or inclined to indecency, you undoubtedly set it outside of the reputable circle, and to that extent you serve a purpose.

38,186. I would suggest there are other classes who might regard that paper as a paper to give them this kind of stuff?—That is so. There are papers which undoubtedly have a circulation of the kind, papers which, by the way, do not report divorce cases. There are some of the sporting papers—you know the names well enough—which regularly publish indecent jokes and anecdotes, and suggestive jokes, any number; and they get a circulation, probably a large circulation, from certain classes; but those classes are not the classes which are likely to be demoralised. They are demoralised already, and I do not think you would do them any damage.

38,187. Supposing that such a prosecution as you speak of succeeded, that would only be admittedly in what you call a very extreme case?—In the first instance that would be so, but I think it would act as a warning to others who did not want to be prosecuted.

38,188. You gather the main difficulty in this matter is not the existence here and there of an extremely obscene paragraph, but the cumulative effect of a large number of details on sexual matters which would not be touched by this proceeding?—The cumulative effect is suggested as being dealt with by Mr. Spender's proposition.

38,189. The great majority of reports, even lengthy reports, would not be touched?—I am prepared to admit that your idea of what would be an improper cumulative effect might differ from mine as the editor of a newspaper. There may be differences of opinion upon all matters of that kind between one man and another.

38,190. Let us come to the interesting distinction you drew between a newspaper and a novel. You laid considerable stress on the fact that you must deal alike with both classes of literature. Is there not this distinction, that the newspaper is so very much more accessible? Would it not be fair to say the newspaper is put into the hands of the people? A novel is a thing which has to be expressly sought out and bought. Your "Yorkshire Post" is on the table of most of the respectable people of Yorkshire, no doubt, and anything that appears there therefore reaches all these respectable family circles?—Yes.

38,191. The kind of novel you are speaking of has to be deliberately asked for and paid for?—Yes.

38,192. Does that not make a distinction between the two?—May I suggest, as against that view, that when the "Yorkshire Post" has been published 24 hours it ceases to be read, that that is the end of its circulation; and that in the case of a novel bought its circulation does not cease at all with the person who buys it. It is thereafter passed from hand to hand in the course of three, six, nine, or twelve months; and on the whole those 1*s.* or 6*d.* novels—and they are published at that price, those I refer to—have a larger circulation in proportion to their cost.

38,193. I quite appreciate that point, but you would agree that a newspaper, in proportion to its respectability, is likely to reach a large class of persons who would presumably never come across a bad type of novel?—And who would presumably be less likely to be influenced detrimentally?

38,194. Possibly?—Their conditions and education being of a better class, a class that we hope would fortify them more against matter of that kind.

38,195. Is there not this further difference, that a newspaper is a piece of literature which contains an immense number of other subjects and, therefore——?—It is not bought specially for that, that is your point. That is so. It must be from our point of view a representation of the whole world as far as we can make it such.

38,196. Under the circumstances is not the State entitled to make a distinction between a class of literature which reaches all just because it gives news on every subject, and a class of literature which is of a single and special character?—The State is entitled to do whatever it pleases. I could not complain of it, but whether I think it right or desirable—I do not know whether that is the case you would put—that is another matter.

38,197. Let us come to this other point upon which you lay stress, upon the evidence of the effect of all this class of publication, following out what Sir Frederick Treves was saying. You drew the analogy of the admitted effect of reports about crime upon juveniles?—Yes.

38,198. Crime of that kind comes out?—Yes.

38,199. The evils which this class of literature stimulates do not always come out?—May I give you an instance, a personal instance. I have never committed a murder. I may say that to begin with: but I remember reading of Mrs. Siddons, how she studied Lady Macbeth till she was afraid to go to bed with her husband because she was afraid she would put a knife into him. That is a dramatic instance. I myself have had the task of sub-editing night by night two very extended murder cases, one the murder in a railway train on the Brighton Line, in which there was a long search for a young man who was afterwards hanged, the other the famous Lamson poisoning case. It so happened that the paper I was sub-editing obtained from the Press Association what they call day reports, and those give prominence to the afternoon trial. There were other evening papers we obtained which got the morning reports, and a part of my duty was to carefully collate those two and to extend the report we published by including from the one and the other that which both did not give. I became so immersed and interested in the games of those murderers that I really began to wonder whether I should not commit a murder myself in order to see whether I could escape when these other people could. It was most exciting and for the time a demoralising process. "And almost thence my nature is subdued to what it works in, like a dyer's hand," says Shakespeare.

38,200. These reports of crime issue in crime, therefore you could get some evidence of that. But would it be a fair analogy to say the issue of reading this class of literature is a specific act of adultery? It is the effect, is it not, on the general sexual attitude of large numbers of people?—I say that is a generalisation. I couldr eason generally. I should argue generally that they have a tendency in the wrong direction.

38,201. Therefore the analogy between the effect of criminal and sexual literature is not the same?—The evidence with regard to it.

38,202. With regard to your views as to the effect of publication as a deterrent, you said publication must be regarded as part of the punishment. Had you in mind the fact that in some cases in these divorce proceedings there is an innocent party as well? Would you say he or she ought to be included in the punishment?—If there is an innocent party, surely in the case of a fair report the innocence is shown?

38,203. All his or her most intimate domestic life is dragged out and published in detail?—I do not know how far you can quite say that. I do not know whether you could substantiate that from the majority of cases in regard to any innocent party's life. I imagine a judge would say that the detail of the innocent party's life was irrelevant to the case.

38,204. (Chairman.) You cannot do it. The joint life makes the difference?—The joint life of the two; that may be so.

38,205. (The Archbishop of York.) Are you prepared, for the sake of punishing the guilty, to include some distress and pain given to the innocent?—I do not see how that can be avoided in any trial.

38,206. About the discretion of editors, you would say roughly your point is to strengthen the law against indecency, and trust the discretion of the editor?—That is so.

38,207. Is it or is it not true of a very large class of journals who have to make their way, that there is a pressure upon the discretion of editors by competition operating in the main in one direction, that is to publish as much as possible?—I think it is only very slight, and the figures in the table suggest to me that competition in that direction does not matter. I take the case of the "Manchester Guardian" and the "Nottingham Guardian" in the figures published this morning. I have nothing to say against the "Nottingham Guardian," it is quite a reputable local paper, but no one would attribute to it either the circulation or the importance of the "Manchester Guardian," yet the "Manchester Guardian" publishes a very much smaller number of columns than the "Nottingham Guardian."

38,208. You do not agree with the evidence we have had that the competition of these less strict journals does create a very great difficulty in the case of an editor who wishes to keep his paper as you would wish it to be?—Some editors may feel it so, but I think the statements on that side have been very much exaggerated.

38,209. I suppose you mean the very interesting memorandum which you have submitted to us with all the painful details to be entirely confidential to the Commissioners?—That I do not know exactly, because that proves my case. I think it proves my case. I think it is necessary to my case. There are some names I have given I certainly would not publish in any form. Those I should regard as confidential.

38,210. (Chairman.) I think your evidence deals with the point of view we want. Your evidence as it is given here is quite sufficient on the broad point?—I leave myself in the hands of the Commission. I have no objection at all to doing that.

38,211. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) What do you mean about that? Do you mean you do not press for publication as part of your evidence here. your memorandum, or do you mean you will not make any use of it yourself except as we desire?—I have no intention of making any use of it.

38,212. I want to know which you mean?—I have no intention of making any use of it. It is not published and I do not propose to publish it.

38,213. I observe it is in type: that is all?—If I give evidence here or before the Copyright Commission or anything of that sort, I do put my evidence in type beforehand, but I do not publish it at all necessarily.

38,214. There is no part of this you desire to go in your evidence that you have not told us?—I would not like to say that. If the Commission would eliminate the illustrations I have given and certain news I have given, otherwise the mass of the argument and the mass of the statements I make I think are necessary to my case.

38,215. (Chairman.) I have really gone through the points of it and covered it?—Not perhaps so fully as I should like to prove my case. If you would allow me afterwards I would edit this and cut out what I think objectionable and then submit it to you.

38,216. I think we have had quite enough evidence from you without going into that memorandum?—It seems to me that I have endeavoured to deal with the matter broadly and fully from a variety of points of view which have not been raised by previous witnesses.

38,217. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I see several points that I should have thought you would want to put in evidence?—That is so.

38,218. I will just put one to you. You say on page six: "An earlier witness had laid stress upon the "fact that Queen Victoria was very emphatic in her "condemnation of such reports; but as against this "I may set the fact that in Lord Morley's 'Life of "Gladstone' there is a footnote which says, 'Mr. "'Gladstone used to desire the prohibition of publicity "'in these proceedings until he learned the strong "'view of the President of the Court that the hideous "'glare of this publicity acts probably as no in-"'considerable deterrent.'" I do not know that that has been before us?—That is so.

38,219. (Chairman.) That is before the Education Act?—I would not like to say beforehand you have covered all the points.

38,220. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) In fairness, is it a matter you think you ought to have an opportunity of bringing out?—I thank you.

38,221. You would admit the wholesale publication of matter dealing with sexual matters is regrettable?—Yes, I do.

38,222. I suppose there may be people in the world who think that the daily publication of the reports of this Commission is a regrettable matter?—I do not know that the reports of this Commission are much better than the reports of a good many divorce cases I have read.

38,223. There is another point I gather you make, which is that you think that when there are divorce cases where prominent public people are concerned, suppression becomes much more difficult—non-publication of reports becomes much more difficult?—Not only so, but I think it is undesirable in the public interest.

38,224. Is it your view that public opinion would not tolerate suppression of those cases?—That is a very large speculation, as to what public opinion would tolerate, but I think in cases of that kind you would find very many newspapers that would say, "This is a "case which in the public interest we ought to publish, "and we will publish."

38,225. I thought I caught you to say that if the law restricted publication to the names and fact of the divorce, you would not publish?—In very many cases we should not.

38,226. Why would you not?—Because it would be a waste of space from our point of view.

38,227. From your point of view it would have no news interest?—It would have no news in it, and, therefore, there would be no reason to publish it.

38,228. You would not consider yourselves simply bound to discharge a public duty which had no reference to your own particular calling?—That is so. If the State wants us to publish it the State ought to pay us for it.

38,229. You have drawn attention a good deal to the statistics put before us yesterday with regard to different papers, in which the number of columns devoted to divorce cases in different papers are arranged side by side for the purpose of comparison? —Yes.

38,230. You would admit that those statistics are of interest and of utility? — I should rather take exception to that, because in the case of the provincial papers——

38,231. Might I interrupt you for a moment. I am not suggesting there are no limitations to that utility, but you would admit there was some utility? —As they stand, no.

38,232. Your judgment on that point, I suppose, is influenced by the fact those figures have no common denominator?—They have no common denominator, and more than that, they do not include a variety of papers which should be included if the comparison is to be of value.

38,233. One objection is that the numbers have no common denominator. You get so many columns in the "Times," and so many columns in the "Daily Mail," but the "Times" and "Daily Mail" columns are of different size?—Quite different.

38,234. Therefore, for the purpose of comparison you want a common denominator?—That is so.

38,235. I suppose for the purpose of a really fair comparison between the papers you must take into consideration the amount of space given in each paper to law reports generally?—I scarcely think that.

38,236. Take the "Times." The "Times" publishes, we all know, elaborate law reports, far and away beyond any other newspaper, in size and care and elaboration?—Yes.

38,237. Is it not inevitable that the number of columns which the "Times" publishes on divorce must be in excess of the number which a paper like —I will not instance another, but another paper which has not elaborate law reports, would publish. It is natural, is it not?—My own opinion is that that suggestion is fallacious, that there is a distinction between the reasons for the publication, shall I say, of an appeal from India and the publication of a divorce case here. The two are on a different footing and are dealt with on a different footing, and the publication of the divorce case is solely on account of the news interest and not for any legal principle involved as there may be in the other cases. That is my own personal opinion, as against, I know, some eminent authorities.

38,238. Your view is that for the purpose of fair comparison between paper and paper you must take into consideration the size of the paper, whether a weekly or daily paper, and its general character?—Its general character, yes, and the fact of it being a weekly or daily paper. Whether the size of the paper affects the matter I should differ from other witnesses; I do not think it does.

38,239. The length of the column. It is no good comparing 30 columns in the "Times" and the "Daily Mail" when the column is different altogether?—That is so, if you are considering the mass simply.

38,240. For the purpose of comparison?—Yes, of the mass.

38,241. You have described the way reports are compiled in your office; they are written by the reporter, and revised by sub-editors acting on instructions from yourself?—Yes.

38,242. Have you general instructions with regard to reports of divorce cases and similar cases?—That no indecent matter of any kind shall be given, and they shall not be given at what we could call too great length, that we should not compete with a good many other papers in regard to the length of such reports.

38,243. In other words, you do not emphasise that kind of news?—No, not at all, not to the same extent as a good many papers.

38,244. (Chairman.) I do not think there is anything to ask you beyond what has been asked. This memorandum we have read, and I understand you leave it to me to dispose of?—If you would allow me to make some alterations and cut out what we may call the invidious and improper matter, I should prefer it in that way. I could do it to your satisfaction, and, if you will forgive me for saying so, I think I considered the arrangement of it and the course of the argument very carefully when I prepared it.

38,245. I must ask you, I think, if you have anything to add to add it now. I must dispose of the matter?—That is very difficult to do.

38,246. I intended to cover it all?—I acquiesced in your procedure of not reading the memorandum aloud, as other witnesses have been asked to read theirs. That was, of course, a differential treatment. I appreciated the reason for it, and acquiesced to that extent, but still I must be allowed to protest that the general argument I have laid down and carefully prepared is carefully prepared, and that it goes beyond the statements I have made, and beyond any supplementary statement I could give without reading the case.

38,247. I think I must ask if you want to add any point, that you should do so after the adjournment. I do not want to have the whole of that paper put in after the evidence has been transcribed?—I will cut it down with pleasure. I will eliminate those illustrations I gave. I do not want to publish those, but I did want the Commission to have them. There are various matters of that kind. There is the detail in the Lord Melbourne and Caroline Norton case, and the detail of the York case I gave. Those are matters I should cut out. They are strong illustrations illustrating my meaning, but I should want to include the whole of the points in detail in a concise and straightforward argument. I should want to have those on record.*

38,248. I think you must leave it where it is. I think I have taken you all through the proof; it would be simply adding to it I think we have all seen the points if there is any point I have omitted?—I cannot say what you have omitted, because I have skipped from point to point without doing anything more than that, but I do protest most firmly and respectfully that the argument I have laid down was very carefully thought out, and the procedure has been different from that of any other witness.

(Chairman.) My view is, with great deference, I have taken you through all the points, and that is quite sufficient.

Mr. JOHN ST. LOE STRACHEY called and examined.

38,249. (Chairman.) You are the Editor of the "Spectator"?—Yes.

38,250. How long have you been engaged in journalistic work?—For the last 25 years.

38,251. May I take it you have considered this question of the reporting of divorce cases?—Yes.

38,252. You have prepared a very short proof: I daresay it covers all you wish to say on the subject. You suggest it should be the practice of the judge, whenever he is of opinion that the reporting of evidence or of statements by counsel would be injurious to the public interest and contrary to good morals, to indicate to the reporters and to all persons present in court that such and such testimony by witnesses or statements by counsel ought not to be published in the Press or elsewhere, and that he would treat the publication of the passages as contempt of court. That is the view you present?—Yes.

* The Memorandum referred to is set out as a Supplemental Note in App. XVII., p. 136.

38,253. Is that based on a view that at present the reporting is not in the public interest and is contrary to good morals?—Yes, in many cases.

38,254. You think that is a matter that ought to be checked?—Yes.

38,255. This suggestion is a means of checking it?—My suggestion is that at present the State, quite innocently and unconsciously, provides a great deal of copy to the Press which is of the nature of poisonous literature, and that the State ought to have complete control over the copy, using the journalistic phrase, which it provides, and should have the right to say whether or not it should be used by the newspapers.

38,256. Do you think it would be practicable for the court to interfere continuously in the way you suggest?—I speak with great diffidence before your Lordship on that point, but it seems to me that it might be. At present in very bad cases the judge adjourns the court in camera, into a private room to hear evidence, and something of that nature might take place. The judge could say, "The proceedings, "although I shall not hear them in camera, ought not "to be reported." He should be able to enforce that decision by the procedure of contempt of court.

38,257. Strictly speaking, his right to hear cases in camera in the Divorce Court is confined to the nullity cases?—Is that so?

38,258. It is said—I am not sure whether the authority is sound—that he has in any case power to close the court if injurious to the giving of the evidence, or indecent. You assume he has that power?—I thought in cases of venereal disease and so on he occasionally adjourned the court into his private room.

38,259. You must not take that to be so. There is only one authority I am aware of at the moment, and I think both sides consented in that case?—They can by consent.

38,260. If that authority is distinctly sound, perhaps, However, that is the basis upon which you would go?—Yes.

38,261. Do you think that it would be a duty which should be cast on the judge to act as a censor in that way?—I understand that the judge might dislike it, but I think, considering the great public inconvenience, that it is a duty, though extra and burdensome, which you might put upon him.

38,262. You suggest as a corollary if necessary an Act of Parliament should be passed increasing the existing powers of judges in the matter of contempt of court, so as to secure the object just stated? That is, of course, a corollary?—Yes. I take it, at common law he would not have the power.

38,263. You say the advantage of such a proposal would be that the matter would be dealt with summarily, and that punishment would fall upon those who published undesirable matter, without the publicity of an indictment and trial?—To prevent a big trial at Bar as to whether the thing was indecent or not which would mean having it all rehearsed again.

38,264. You add that at the same time we should not suffer from the undesirable results of trials altogether in camera? You do not favour a private hearing?—No, let the public be present.

38,265. Your point is that it is against public interest that literature of a suggestive character, perhaps not indecent, should go before the public in the way it does?—I should put it in this way. Why should the Divorce Court provide indecent copy for the Press?

38,266. Have you considered whether the publication is a deterrent on the commission of immoral acts?—I have considered it, because it has interested me a good deal. It appears to me most unlikely that in cases of lust, and so forth, it should act as a deterrent. People do not think of these things.

38,267. You would consider it acted as a deterrent in launching a case, but not on the commission of the act?—No.

38,268. (Sir George White.) I understand you believe in some report of these cases being put into the daily papers?—I think so. I do not think that there would be any reason for preventing a report. For instance, I have thought one way out of the difficulty might be to allow the judge's summing-up and judgment to be reported, but nothing else.

38,269. Do you not think the plan you suggest, of leaving it in the hands of the judge to intimate when he thought a report of proceedings should be stopped, would lay him open to the reproach, in cases affecting people in high positions of society, that he had stopped a case of that kind when he might not have stopped one with a humbler person?—That inconvenience naturally occurs to one, but I think it is the old story—you must take the lesser of two evils.

38,270. You consider this a better plan than reporting the summing-up, or another suggestion is having an official reporter?—I do not like the idea of official reporters, but I am not at all sure the summing-up would not meet the point, because I presume no judge would as it were censor his own summing-up, or very seldom. In no case would a judge say his own summing-up must not be reported, because the judges are careful not to put in anything that could not be published.

38,271. (Chairman.) Would your view, as I follow from what Sir George White asked you, be met by publishing the results and the decision of the judge?—Yes, and even the actual wording of the judge.

38,272. The judge's judgment, or summing-up, if it was a trial by jury?—Summing-up and judgment.

38,273. I daresay you know, in addition to some of the cases which have been mentioned, cases concerning the custody of children are always taken in camera?—Yes.

(Chairman.) We thank you for your evidence, and hope we have not kept you too long.

Rev. Augustus Robert Buckland called and examined.

38,274. (Chairman.) You are a member of the Church of England?—Yes, I am a Clerk in Holy Orders.

38,275. A minister of the Church of England. You are the President of the Religious Tract Society?—I am the clerical secretary of that society, 38,276. You are also a member of the National Council of Public Morals?—Yes.

38,277. Do you attend here as representative of the council, or in your individual capacity?—In both. I have the agreement of the council as to the general lines of the statement submitted to the Commission.

38,278. You are confining your evidence, I think, to the publication of proceedings in divorce cases?—That is so.

38,279. What do you consider with regard to the existing conditions as to publication?—The existing conditions appear to me to be detrimental to public morals for the same reasons that have been stated by Mr. St. Loe Strachey, that the proceedings of the court enable newspapers to publish a good deal which would not be provided in any other way.

38,280. In your proof you made three points: one that the publication of a selection from the proceedings of the Divorce Court is general, and that in the majority of cases restraint is shown?—That is so.

38,281. Does that tend to indicate that in certain cases it is not general?—Certainly.

38,282. The second is, where the cases present unusual features, as where the parties are known to the world or are persons whose position makes their appearance in such a court the more noteworthy, additional space is given? You take that from your general reading of the paper?—That is so.

38,283. Then you say such a case may be reported from day to day in much detail, is given all the prominence of a feature deemed attractive, and is paraded on the contents bills. That, again, is from actual reading and experience?—That is so.

38,284. The third point is, that certain weekly journals, habitually give much space to proceedings in criminal cases, habitually present week by week extended reports of divorce proceedings. These reports appear to be, when the court is sitting, one of the most conspicuous features of each issue?—That is so. I present a copy of the "News of the World" for the 24th January 1909, which conveys an example of excessive publication of detail.

38,285. Is that the Stirling case?—Yes.

38,286. We have heard a great deal about that. I do not know that we need put in examples. Those speak for themselves. I only want to take it generally; I do not want the details. You have found similar publications when anything of particular interest is in court?—Perhaps even more than that. It seems to me that the weekly journals of this class make a point week by week of filling several columns with divorce reports, given as a rule at much greater length than the morning or evening paper reports of the same cases.

38,287. There is this feature, too, that it concentrates for the reader of the one paper a great mass of material for the week?—Precisely, and also presents reports in a form meant to be as attractive as possible, accompanied by portraits of the chief personages. Each has been carefully sub-edited and interesting features brought out in headlines from time to time.

38,288. Have you had enough experience to tell us whether papers which are published in that way do really penetrate into different parts of the country?—I believe it can be found from official figures that some of these papers circulate to the extent of more than 1,000,000 apiece weekly, and I find from inquiries among the clergy in country districts that they reach very remote country parishes, and form, I am told, the staple reading of many families on Sundays.

38,289. You proceed in your paper to say: "It is contended (1) that no public interest is served by the elaborate presentation of divorce reports, prepared with such additional attractions as the descriptive reporter, the sub-editor, and the photographer can provide; but (2) that, on the contrary, such reports are a stimulus to evil thinking and evil living." Can you tell us to what extent you have noticed the stimulus of evil thinking and evil living?—No, I cannot indicate any particular case; but I was assured by a gathering mainly of country clergy and country laity quite recently that they regarded journals of this character, more especially from the point of view of their publishing divorce reports and similar reports, as real incentives to immorality in the lives of their people. I should add that I was addressing this clerical gathering on the suppression of pernicious literature, and in the discussion which followed the address these opinions were stated quite clearly by more than one speaker.

38,290. What was the volume of that gathering?—It was a small gathering, numbering, I should think, perhaps 24 people altogether—not more.

38,291. All with parochial experience?—No; three members of the audience were local booksellers and newsagents. The newsagents spoke with very great regret as to the circulation of this kind of literature.

38,292. You proceed in your memorandum to say the grounds for the publication of some report may be (1) the punishment of the guilty, and (2) the vindication of the innocent. What have you to say about those two points?—I imagine that the publication of the facts that a decree has been granted may be deemed a part of the punishment of the guilty party, and at the same time may vindicate the innocent party. Neighbouring gossip at the time may not discriminate between the guilty and the innocent in a divorce case. But the publication of the result would discriminate between the guilty and innocent, and anyone who wished to know whether the husband or wife in the particular case were guilty would find the information in an official report.

38,293. Do you think that either of those things, either punishment of the guilty or vindication of the innocent, requires full publication of the proceedings?—I do not.

38,294. It has been said a good many times here that such publication acts as a deterrent to the commission of acts of immorality. What have you to say upon that?—I should regard it as most improbable that a person contemplating acts of immorality of this kind sat down seriously and considered for a moment questions of publicity or any similar questions whatever. Within my personal observation I have never known any consideration for home or family keep any man from the commission of acts of that character, as far as I could understand.

38,295. Or a woman?—I should hesitate to say that in regard to women.

38,296. You would meet those points by suppressing all publication except the names of the parties, the nature of the charges, and the decision of the court?—Yes. May I add, in relation to the preceding question, that I do believe that the publication of the facts acts as a deterrent to proceedings in divorce cases? I believe, that is to say, that many persons refrain from going into court because publicity would ensue, but that does not affect in the smallest degree the fact of wrong having been done.

38,297. Have you been engaged yourself in parochial work?—Not for 25 years or more.

38,298. Before that?—Yes.

38,299. You say it might be that the publishing what has been referred to would result in very few cases being reported. What comment do you make upon that?—I believe that in one Continental country it has been said, in answer to inquiries, that the result of not permitting general publication of proceedings is to secure that practically no cases are reported in the Press. If that is so in another country I conceive it possible it might happen here. It seems most probable that very few newspapers would take the trouble to report anything more than the names of purely local cases, if only the results were allowed to appear.

38,300. Then you say, inasmuch as many cases are even now passed over, it is not clear that any evil would result from silence being observed in a still greater number?—It might be deduced from such publication that takes place that publication is given for one of three reasons, because it is a case which locally interests the readers of a particular paper, or because the case affects persons whose position and standing in society render them peculiarly the subject of public comment, or because the circumstances are of such a nature that readers who like a degraded type of literature will very eagerly read whatever is written about the particular case.

38,301. Would you regard unlimited publication as being an evil?—Undoubtedly.

38,302. You have already covered the next point in your paper with regard to the conference you mentioned. Perhaps you had better state that yourself?—The opinion of the conference was in no way unanimous with regard to that, but inasmuch as I believe various newspaper editors have appeared before the Commission, it would be perhaps needless to give any of the opinions represented in this report of the conference proceedings.

38,303. What conference was that?—That was a conference held last summer.

38,304. A conference of whom? Is it your own society?—It was a conference of the National Council of Public Morals.

38,305. Was that a conference of persons like yourself and others interested in the society?—Undoubtedly.

38,306. What is the point you want to make about that, because I do not appreciate it at present?—It seemed to me only right to state that at such a conference, held in the interest of public morals, the newspaper editors were not at one in desiring restriction of publication.

38,307. Were they there?—Yes, several editors were present and took part in the proceedings, and in view of the nature of the conference it seemed to me right to point out that they did not advocate the suppression of all reports. Many of them expressed great regret at the nature of some of the reports published, but it cannot be said that they were in favour, as a body, of total suppression.

38,308. From your next sentence you seem to have had Mr. St. Loe Strachey present?—Yes.

38,309. We have had his evidence and know his views. The rest of your paper is rather what we have had ourselves, the laws of the other countries?—That is so.

38,310. I do not think we need trouble with them unless you have any special knowledge of the working of those laws in those countries. By that I include information upon which you can rely ?—I have no information which goes beyond the statements doubtless embodied in the official report.

38,311. That is only a statement of what the law is ?—Precisely.

38,312. As we have that, I need not trouble further with your proof. Is there any other point you think worthy of drawing our attention to besides those I have put ?—There is one point, but whether it is one which this Commission should consider, or not, I am not clear. It seems to me from the point of view of the nation's morals, the publications of the character I have presented to the Commission raise a very serious difficulty in regard to national life on one side. Young people, as well as their parents, read these kinds of reports. A great many persons associated with the society of which I am a secretary are keenly anxious as to the reading of the nation, believing that the characters of the people depend to a certain extent on what they read, more especially when they are young. We are face to face with the fact that millions of copies of these publications are taken into the homes and read, in the quiet of Sunday more especially, week after week. It is impossible not to feel that reading of that kind must have a more or less permanent effect upon the moral character of the people. Whether that is a question which should be considered in detail by the Commission I cannot say, but it certainly places a very grave difficulty in the path of those who would like to see the literature of our people raised to a higher standard.

38,313. You include in that literature these reports ?—Yes.

38,314. There are others on other subjects and other kinds of publications ?—Yes.

38,315. They are also included ?—Yes. It may be said that any attempt to restrict publication is unfair to proprietors of journals of this character. On the other hand, a glance at their papers will show that they must in the first place represent so much capital, and in the next place so much journalistic ability, that it is impossible to believe that if this source of news were taken from them they could not supply their pages with something else, which in time, at least, would be equally interesting to their readers. In the end I do not think they would suffer, although undoubtedly if one alone had to exclude all such literature that particular paper would suffer very greatly.

38,316. Your society's object is to raise the whole moral tone ?—It is.

38,317. One of the means of doing that is by general purification of its literature ?—Yes.

38,318. Are there any other lines in which you direct your efforts besides publication ?—Is your Lordship referring to the league or the society of which I am secretary ?

38,319. I do not know that there is any distinction ; if there is, will you explain it ?—One is a society which is missionary in its character, and has as one part of its work the publication of religious and general literature in English.

38,320. Which is that ?—That is the Religious Tract Society. From that point of view I should have to number myself with the publishers who have appeared before the Commission. The National Council of Public Morals is an organisation of those who desire, if possible, to elevate the standard of public morals altogether.

38,321. All round, including literature ?—Yes.

38,322. I think that covers all your proof ?—Yes.

38,323. (Mr. Spender.) With regard to the legal provisions in other countries, it would not be true to say that in most of them there is less divorce than there is in this country : I mean, in spite of our publicity or because of it, whichever anybody may choose to think, we have comparatively low statistics of divorce ?—You are aware in some countries there is no divorce at all.

38,324. Compared with many of these countries, France, we will say, and the United States, to take two examples, where the practice is to keep the Divorce Court private, I will not say the result, but the fact is that divorces are very numerous ?—I believe they are.

38,325. It does not necessarily follow that the standard of public morals in matrimonial affairs is lowered by the publicity given to the proceedings ?—That raises an entirely different class of question, because I should have to consider the differences of race.

38,326. I do not wish to press it further than it is worth. As these cases are cited, it seems relevant to put that in ?—Yes.

38,327. Going into the nature of divorce for a moment, in some of these countries might one suggest that complete privacy in the Divorce Court generally goes with a conception of divorce which makes it a private affair of the parties in which the public or the State has very little concern, into which it is a kind of impertinence for other people to pry ?—Unless I had assurance from the countries in question I should hesitate to assume that that was the explanation.

38,328. I do not wish to make any general statement which it is difficult to sustain, but take France, where there is not any publicity. It would not be generally denied by Frenchmen, unless they were strong churchmen, that as a rule the conception of divorce, as of marriage, was that it was essentially a matter for the two parties and nobody else ?—I should have doubted whether French moralists would regard it from that point of view.

38,329. I am speaking of general public opinion, not French moralists. I will not press that. It would be natural if that were the view, and if divorce were regarded as a matter of private convenience, that that view should go hand in hand with complete privacy in the courts ?—I can see that is a possible explanation of it.

38,330. And the view which regarded the State as being a third party, and a very important party, both in the making and breaking of marriage, would carry with it a certain measure of publicity in divorce proceedings ?—I think that position is weakened by the fact that, in some countries at least, the position as to the reporting of proceedings appears to have been taken up with a view to restricting publication of the evidence.

38,331. I do not wish to press it too far, because it becomes a question of whether the reporting is good or bad. One conception of marriage seems to lead to some kind of reporting, and the other leads to complete privacy, so that the moral aspects of the question may be at least divided ?—I should have thought the facts might have been clearly ascertained by witnesses from those countries who might state whether repression of reporting was due to the same feeling which has been represented by witnesses here, or to the feeling which you have suggested.

38,332. To put it on general grounds, you would accept it as a general proposition that in a country where the State is regarded as a party to the divorce as it is to the marriage, some kind of publicity naturally or logically follows ?—I think some kind of publicity is absolutely necessary.

38,333. The question is, what kind ? Your view is, I understand, only the result should appear ?—Precisely.

38,334. Would you modify that for special cases, say that of the innocent party of a divorce suit who might feel himself gravely prejudiced unless he could submit himself to a public cross-examination ?—He may have been cross-examined. One might assume he had been cross-examined in private with the utmost stringency, possibly by counsel on the other side, but why he should yearn to have his cross-examination published for the benefit of the world, I cannot imagine.

38,335. Cannot you imagine the feeling of a public man who would know that a certain amount of gossip and mud sticks ?—I do not think I can.

38,336. That a cross-examination in public would be an advantage to him ?—If he were a public man the other side would probably have been represented by some very eminent counsel, and the public man would know enough to feel sure that counsel had done his best in cross-examination for his own client, and the public would know that, too.

38,337. If you lay down that principle, it applies not only to divorce but to the entire administration of justice. We should have to take it for granted when a verdict was given that there was the verdict, that the counsel were the most eminent counsel on both sides, and the public had no further interest?—Not at all. If the publication of the details are of an obscene, or at all events of a distressing character, it would be better in other cases they were not published. There are many cases in criminal courts the details of which would shock the public more than divorce details if they were printed in the same fulness.

38,338. I agree certain discretion is necessary. I was taking it on the general principle which you lay down, that the public ought to be content with the verdict of the court?—Only where the publication of the details is contrary to good morals.

38,339. You would say in all these cases publication was necessarily contrary to good morals?—No, not in all cases, but in so many cases that it is far easier and more satisfactory to have no publication of details than to lay upon the shoulders of someone the duty of discriminating what cases should be published in detail and what should not.

38,340. You would make a general rule that there should be no publication?—Certainly.

38,341. You would not allow any of the exceptions suggested, not from the point of view of public justice?—No.

38,342. That was not clear from what you said in regard to results and offences. You would not allow the judge's summing-up to be published or any comments or remarks?—Yes. I confess I do not feel strongly against a proposal to publish the judge's summing-up if thought desirable, but I can conceive even that being made a means of exciting prurient curiosity and so on, and doing harm.

38,343. With regard to these weekly papers which are, as you have said, a concentration of all these cases in one number, a concentration of all that is scattered over the Press during the week, do you not think it possible, if you shut the Divorce Court and leave others open, you merely change the material these papers will have at their command? Police courts are open, and the criminal courts are open. There is an immense field if papers are determined?—In answer to that I should say they have already reaped in those fields to the fullest possible extent, that they had left very little.

38,344. There is always the possibility of extending the reports. These cases in the newspapers are a collection of comparatively short reports which produce a kind of cumulative effect It is an immense number of comparatively short reports; some are long, some are not. I suggest to you—I do not know whether you agree with me—if you asked the editor of one of these papers, or the sub-editor, whether he had put in all that had come to him, he would probably make the answer which every editor who has come here has made, that he he has cut down everything by half and thrown the greater part into his waste-paper basket?—No doubt, but it does not follow that the rejected ones would in any serious manner add to the extent of the evil in a large number of cases.

38,345. I submit just for your consideration, because I think we all admit the evil, it is only a question of remedy, whether this evil in these particular cases had not better be met, or could not better be met, by treating these papers against which you allege this offence—and we all do to a certain extent—as common nuisances to be prosecuted and possibly put before a jury?—That is an alternative method of dealing with them, but it does not appear to meet the case which is before the Commission of ordinary morning papers reporting from time to time particular divorce cases.

38,346. I suggest to you that if there was a public authority which could undertake prosecutions of this kind and give warnings to those it considered were grossly offending before taking proceedings, it would cover the whole Press; but I am not contesting that there is a difference between the two cases. I submit that a remedy of that kind might cover the whole ground, and not merely the reports in the Divorce Court which are a comparatively small proportion—sometimes a large proportion, but often a small proportion—of the total matter presented?—I should scarcely say they were a small proportion.

38,347. I merely suggest that to you. You do not object to that?—I think that there are more difficulties threatened by giving discretionary publication.

38,348. I am suggesting to you that no rule you can make for the Divorce Court will prevent the traffic in cases of this kind, sexual cases, which are by no means confined to the Divorce Court?—No, but I should not be without hope that if something were done in the matter of divorce cases something might in time be done over a still larger area, because obviously there are other cases, as you suggest, the publication of which is equally undesirable.

38,349. I do not want to pursue this too far, but should we not be brought up at exactly the same point as we are with regard to the Divorce Court, I mean the point of difficulty in discriminating between the cases which raise this issue and which do not, and if we made this rule and went on in the way you suggest, we should next go to all other courts of justice and shut them all up on the ground that they might raise issues of this kind?—I do not think the argument is different from that which has always been advanced against any moral reform. We are always told that you will not know where to stop, and that if you do this you will have to do something else; let us be content to do the thing immediately proposed.

38,350. I only put it as a question arising out of an answer you gave me. I should be the last person to press the argument too far, I hope?—Quite.

38,351. (Sir George White.) You said in your opening evidence that Divorce Courts furnish these papers with an amount of writing which, if it were not provided in this way, would not be provided in any other way. We have had some suggestions made to us, something on the lines Mr. Spender was asking you questions, that if these proceedings were limited very much, or deleted altogether, the columns now filled with them would be filled with fiction dealing with the same questions, because the papers would satisfy the taste of their readers in some form or other. Have you any belief in that?—I hesitate to think that the space occupied now by divorce cases would necessarily be taken up by material of the same kind under another guise. Mr. Spender will probably say these papers are put together by men of considerable capacity and experience. They have ample means behind them, and still, as any perusal of their contents will show, there are fields which each of them could enter probably with advantage to itself.

38,352. On other lines?—Yes, on perfectly honest lines.

38,353. The suggestion is that they have a taste to provide for, and they are bound to provide for it, if not on the lines Mr. Spender suggests, by reporting other police cases of a similar kind at length, then by fiction dealing with sexual questions?—It might be so, but even so I should hesitate to think the influence of the same amount of fiction would be as bad as the influence of the same amount of fact.

38,354. Mr. Spender has put before you what I suppose is a fact, that the statistics of divorce in this country are very low, and yet we have practically free publication of details. In other European countries the statistics are much higher, and yet publication is prevented. Is there any necessary correlation between those two facts, do you think?—I think it quite possible that the fact might be accounted for by other causes than those suggested. I am not prepared to think that because there are more divorces in some Continental countries per 1,000 of the population than there are in England, that that increased number of divorces may be due to the fact of publication being restricted or forbidden.

38,355. In those countries, generally speaking, divorce is granted on many more grounds than in England?—There is a large number of facts which would have to be taken into account before any general inference could be drawn.

38,356. (Mr. Burt.) I understand you suggest the suppression of all publication save the names of the parties, the nature of the allegations and the decision of the court. We have had evidence submitted to us from the editors of newspapers that in that case they would refuse to publish altogether. You seem to anticipate that that would follow, and you suggest that probably no evil result would follow from the complete suppression of publication. As regards the suggested innocent party, the co-respondent, I think the question was put to you by Mr. Spender, is it not possible that some evil result would follow to him from his not having the opportunity of vindicating his character?—I think that difficulty will be met in part by the official publication of the decree.

38,357. You agree there should be an official publication?—Yes. My words refer to publications in the general newspaper. There would, I take it, be some official record of what had taken place. Then in regard to the possibility of few cases being published, I should think that all cases of local interest would find publication, because there is nothing, as Mr. Spender would probably say, for which an editor of an ordinary paper is keener than news which has local powers of attraction. I take it the facts as to a local divorce case would be certainly deemed worth publication in the first issue after the decree was pronounced.

38,358. (Lady Frances Balfour.) I want to ask you about these newspapers. Is there anything as objectionable as the reports of divorce cases? Is the serial literature as bad at present as the reports of the divorce cases?—I have not given serial literature attention for the purpose of this Commission. I do not feel able to make any statement in regard to that.

38,359. Like the public they cater for, you have only read the divorce reports?—For this purpose.

38,360. You do not know whether the literature is as bad in proportion?—I can say I have never heard any general statement impugning fiction as worthy of the same condemnation as the reports of divorce cases.

38,361. The rest of the fiction is for edification?—The rest of the contents?

38,362. Yes?—I do not think that can be said at all. In any of the papers there are quite a number of things for a Commission examining into a question of public morals to consider—answers to correspondents, advertisements, and so on.

38,363. Is it your opinion that these rags are sold purely on account of these divorce reports?—I think they are sold upon their merits as collections of news and reading matter of the kind desired by their readers.

38,364. The matter is bad, whatever it comes under?—They have a general character.

38,365. Police news and matrimonial news?—Certainly those figure largely; any criminal case of interest, a murder, or a suicide, a runaway match, even a breach of promise case receives particular attention.

38,366. There is not much hope of improving, even if the Divorce Court were closed to them?—I am not sure. I do not see why they should not at least in that respect.

38,367. Why do these cases appeal so to the classes that read the papers? Is it that they represent a class of life they do not live themselves, what is known as "high life"?—That is no doubt why so much space is given to a particular case from time to time such as the one mentioned.

38,368. They are representative of a class?—No doubt that adds to the interest and the attractiveness of the report.

38,369. Is it stated in that kind of way, that this is representative or typical of the life of that class?—I could not put my finger upon a case in which that was said, but I have formed a very strong opinion.

38,370. That is the real interest?—That is the influence left on the mind of the readers.

38,371. Not so much the sexual irregularity, but the representation of the set of society to which they think they belong?—Both, certainly.

38,372. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I had not the advantage of hearing the earlier part of your evidence, but, if I understand rightly, your general point of view is that on the one side there is wholesale corruption caused by the publication of these reports, and on the other side there is, whatever benefit there is in a safeguard by publication, the safeguard of publicity, and so on; but recognising that latter side, on the balance you think more harm is done by publication than good?—I do.

38,373. That is your general standpoint?—That is so.

38,374. I think you said if your remedy were adopted and only the names of the parties and the nature of the result were published, commercially it would not be worth publishing. The news interest of that case, in the case of a local divorce suit, say in London, would be very slight indeed?—Certainly, it would be only of interest as material for a paragraphist.

38,375 Not always that?—Not always that.

38,376. It would be like the undefended cases now, a long string on certain days which do not appear anywhere?—Quite.

38,377. You face that?—Yes.

38,378. But facing that, you still think it wiser that reports should not appear at all?—I do.

38,379. With regard to what has been said by other witnesses and put to you by Mr. Spender, namely, that these undesirable reports are not confined to cases of divorce, but apply to many other cases. Would you say in answer, that while that is so, the largest class of cases in any court in England which deal with sexual matters is in the Divorce Court?—I should.

38,380. By far the largest class of cases?—Yes.

38,381. And therefore if you deal with those, although you leave other matters unremedied, you have remedied, after all, what is the largest class of cases in this particular context on sexual subjects?—Quite so.

(Chairman.) Let me thank you very much on behalf of the Commissioners for the assistance you have given them. I am sure we shall attach importance to it.

Adjourned.

FORTY-FOURTH DAY.

Monday, 21st November 1910.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HON. LORD GORELL (Chairman).

His Grace The LORD ARCHBISHOP OF YORK.
The LADY FRANCES BALFOUR.
The Hon. LORD GUTHRIE.
Sir WILLIAM R. ANSON, Bart., M.P.
Sir FREDERICK TREVES, Bart., G.C.V.O., C.B., LL.D. F.R.C.S.
Sir LEWIS T. DIBDIN, D.C.L.
His Honour JUDGE TINDAL ATKINSON.
EDGAR BRIERLEY, Esq.

The Hon. HENRY GORELL BARNES (Secretary).
J. E. G. DE MONTMORENCY, Esq. (Assistant Secretary).

(Chairman.) I think, having read through these proofs with great care, the best way will be to ask the witnesses to read their papers and reserve all questions till they have finished.

Mr. ISRAEL ABRAHAMS called and examined.

38,382. (Chairman.) Would you kindly inform the Commissioners of your exact official position at Cambridge?—I am reader in Talmudic and Rabbinic literature.

38,383. How long have you filled that office?—Since 1902. Previously to that I was senior tutor at Jews' College, London.

38,384. May I suggest to you, if it suits your convenience, as this is a most carefully considered paper that you have prepared, that you might read it through to us, and we can reserve our questions till you have finished. Until it is read we are not quite in a position to ask you questions?—I think in reading it I may omit the references.

38,385. Yes, it shall be printed as it is there, as your evidence, and you can skip anything that it is not absolutely necessary to read aloud?—Yes. "Social conditions in Palestine at the beginning of the Christian era were bewilderingly complex. Restricting our attention to the question of marriage, we find at the one extreme a sect (the Essenes) which advocated celibacy, and at the other a sect (the Zadokites or Dositheans)"—those were named after the supposed founders of them, Zadok or Dositheus—which forbade divorce, or, at all events, re-marriage. Then there were the aristocrats of the court circle who had adopted Roman ways. For instance, Josephus records two instances in which women of the Herodian house (Salome, 25 B.C., and Herodias, contemporary with John the Baptist) divorced their husbands, and paralleled the excesses denounced by Juvenal in his sixth satire," and it may be that Mark x. 12 is directed against such licentiousness. He refers to the divorcing of the husband by the wife. The Pharisaic Judaism of the same period regarded marriage as the ideal state, yet freely permitted divorce. If the ideal were shattered it seemed to accord best with the interests of morality to admit this, and afford both parties to the calamity a second chance of lawful happiness. The marriage bond should be inviolable, but must not be indissoluble.

"The progress of law and custom in Jewry tended not to modify the theoretical ease of divorce, but to increase its practical difficulties. The Gospel view was that the Deuteronomic divorce was a concession to human weakness, a lowering of the earlier standards of Genesis which held marriage to be indissoluble. The Rabbinic reading of history was different. The Pentateuch introduced the formality of the written Letter of Divorce, and Rabbinism regarded this as an advance in civilisation, not a retrogression. The Deuteronomic divorce was a restriction of the earlier right or power of the husband to discard his wife at will, and with scant ceremony. Rabbinism contrasted the decent formalities of the Mosaic Code with the arbitrary indelicacy of primitive custom (Genesis Rabba, ch. xviii.).

"The Pentateuch, however, contemplates the husband as alone having the right to effect a divorce. In the Babylonian code of Hammurabi the wife had some power of initiative, and when recently the Egyptian papyri of the fifth century B.C. were discovered, it was thought that these Aramaic documents showed the Jewish woman in possession of the same status as man in regard to initiating divorce." It may be that that is still the true reading of those documents, but it does not seem to be so. The reading I quote there is that of Professor Sayce, so that it has good authority that the woman had initiative at that period; the document seems to have that meaning. "Closer study, however, shows that at most the woman of the papyri could claim a divorce, she could not declare one. This condition remained unaltered in the first Christian century. Josephus (Antiq. xv. viii. 7) distinctly asserts: 'With 'us it is lawful for the husband to do so (i.e. 'dissolve a marriage), but a wife, if she departs 'from her husband, cannot marry another unless her 'former husband put her away.' In two cases the husband's right of divorce was abrogated by the Pentateuch (Deut. xxii.), if he ravished a virgin or if he falsely accused his wife of ante-nuptial incontinence. In the first case the man was compelled to wed the woman in an indissoluble union, in the second case he could not divorce his wife. But what was her position? The option rested with her. She could compel her husband to retain her, or she could accept a divorce. Philo declares (ii. 313, και μενειν και απαλλαττεσθαι, this last word being Philonean for divorce) that she could divorce him, but it is not probable that the law ever agreed with Philo's view. At most the injured wife may have been entitled to move the court to compel her husband to write her a Letter of Divorce. The situation reminds one of Meredith's 'Diana of the Crossways,'" where the husband fails in a divorce action against the wife, and she will not have anything to do with him. "We are in possession of a clear piece of evidence as to the Jewish progress in divorce law in the period preceding the Christian era. In Matthew xix. 10 the disciples after hearing Jesus' declaration on the indissolubility of marriage, object: 'If the case of the man is so with his wife, it is not expedient to marry.' Here the difficulty of divorce is treated as a bar to wedlock. This is the man's point of view. What of the woman's? Now in the first century B.C. it would seem that, from the woman's side, the facility of divorce was a bar. In face of the ease with which a husband could whistle off his wife, women refused to contract marriages, and men grew grey and celibate (T. J. Kethuboth, end of ch. viii.; T. B. Kethuboth, 82b, Tosefta xii.). Thereupon the Pharisaic leader, Simon b. Shetah, the reputed brother of Queen Alexandra, enacted that the wife's Kethubah or marriage settlement was to be merged in the husband's estate, that he might use it as capital, but that his entire fortune should be held liable for it." I do not know whether you would like that more clearly put. Before this reform the settlement was kept as a separate entity. It first lodged with the wife's father; afterwards kept, at all events, distinct; apparently they brought objects of value for the sum. Then all the husband had to do was to say, "Go home to your father, he has got your settlement," or, "Here you are, here is your settlement," and take down these objects and give them to her. By merging the property in the general estate of the husband and encouraging him to use it, it was very difficult for him to realise sufficient loose cash (in those days money was very scarce) and when he had from his estate to produce the sum of the settlement, it was much more difficult for him than under the former arrangements.

38,386. More difficult to put away his wife?—Yes. In fact the whole difficulty of the Jewish law has been increased by the Kethubah. "This effectively checked hasty divorce, and indeed the rights of wives under the Kethubah were throughout the ages a genuine safeguard to their marital security. In respect to holding property and possessing independent estate the Jewish wife was in a position far superior to that of English wives before the enactment of recent legislation.

"Another point of great importance was this. Jewish sentiment was strongly opposed to the divorce of the wife of a man's youth, and men almost invariably married young. The facilities for divorce seem mostly to have been applied or taken advantage of in the case of a widower's second marriage (a widower was expected to re-marry). 'What the Lord hath joined, let no man put asunder' represented the spirit of the Pharisaic practice in the age of Jesus, at all events with regard to a man's first marriage." I should say in general in the discussions between the Pharisees and Jesus in the New Testament one never has their answer; that is a point to be remembered. Thus this statement would not have been a knock-down blow to them; namely, "What God hath joined together let no man put asunder." We do not know what they would have said in reply to that. Probably they would have said, 'We agree to that.' "It is rather curious that while in the Gospel so much use is made of the phrase of Genesis 'one flesh' to prove marriage indissoluble, no reference is made to another verse in the same context, 'It is not good that the man should be alone,' which obviously requires marriage and not celibacy. It may be that Jesus, anticipating the near approach of the Kingdom, was teaching an 'interim' ethic, which would have no relation to ordinary conditions of life (cf. the view that angels do not marry, Enoch xv. 3—7, Mark xii. 25, and the later Rabbinic maxim that in the world to come there is no procreation (Berachoth 17a). But it is more likely that he was laying down a rule of conduct only for his own immediate disciples, declaring that all men cannot receive this saying. That, however, a belief in the divinity of the marriage tie was compatible with a belief that the tie could be loosened, is shown by the course of Jewish opinion. The Rabbis held with Jesus that marriages are made in heaven (see 'Jewish Quarterly Review,' II. 172), and several Old Testament phrases point to the same roseate view. Of the marriage of Isaac and Rebecca it is written 'the thing proceedeth from the Lord' (Genesis xxiv. 50). 'Houses and riches are the inheritance of fathers,' says the author of Proverbs (xix. 14), 'but a prudent wife is from the Lord.' Again, 'Fear not,' said the angel to Tobias (Tobit vi. 17), 'for she was prepared for thee from the beginning.' The Pharisees fully accepted this amiable theory of divine fatalism. 'God,' said the Rabbi, 'sitteth in heaven arranging marriages.' Or it was more crudely put thus: 'Forty days before the child is formed a heavenly voice 'proclaims its mate' (T. B. Moed Qaton 18b; Sota 2a) Another saying there is that a man gets the wife he deserves. In the Middle Ages, this belief in the divine arrangement of marriage affected the liturgy, and on the sabbath following a wedding, the bridegroom proceeded to the synagogue with a joyous retinue, and the congregation chanted the chapter of Genesis (xxiv.) in which, as shown above, the patriarch's marriage was declared as ordained by God. Naturally this belief in the pre-ordainment of marriage must have strengthened the Jewish objection to divorce." "'For I hate divorce,' saith the Lord" (Malachi ii. 16) was a verse much honoured in Pharisaic thought, and Malachi's protest gave rise to the pathetic saying, 'The very altar sheds tears when a man divorces the wife of his youth,' and to the sterner paraphrase 'He that putteth her away is hated of the Lord' (T. B. Gittin 90. Cf. Prov. v. 19: Eccles. ix. 9; Ecclus. vii. 26)

"But though divorce is hateful, continuance of the marriage bond may be more hateful still. Perfect human nature could do without divorce, but it could also do without marriage. Adam and Eve, it has been well said, went through no marriage ceremony. The formalities of marriage are not less the result of human imperfection than is the need of divorce. Were it not for the evil in human nature, said the Rabbis (Gen. Rab. ix.; Eccles. R. iii. 11.), a man would not marry a wife—not that the married state was evil, on the contrary, it was held to be the highest moral condition—but X needed the marriage bond to limit his own lusts and also to ward off Y. And just as, in this sense, man's evil side requires a marriage contract, so in another sense his good side demands the cancellation of the contract, if its continuance be degrading or inharmonious.

"Hence, though the strongest moral objection was felt against divorce, and though the vast majority of Jewish marriages were terminated only by death, the Pharisaic law raised no bar to divorce by mutual consent of the parties, just as marriage, despite its sacred associations, was itself a matter of mutual consent. It should be remembered that in the Jewish document of divorce no ground for the act is defined, the husband simply declares his wife thenceforth sui juris and free to re-marry." The document of divorce is directed to the wife in the second person.

38,387. Is that what we understand as a bill of divorcement?—Yes. She was sui juris and free to re-marry. No ground is stated for the divorce. "She could, and often did, re-marry her husband, unless he had divorced her for unchastity, or unless she had in the meantime contracted another marriage." There are also one or two other grounds on which she could not re-marry her divorced husband, but they are not of much consequence. According to some, if he divorced her for barrenness he was bound not to take her back. "In the time of Jesus it was not necessary for a divorce by mutual consent to come before a regular Court or Beth Din of three Rabbis, as later became the practice." It is now distinctly the practice in all decent Jewish communities for a divorce to be brought before a Beth Din. "The whole ceremony could, at the earlier period, be gone through privately, in the presence of two witnesses. An expert Rabbi was, however, probably required to ensure the proper drawing up of the document, and the due fulfiment of the legal delivery to, and acceptance by, the wife. Thus if Joseph of Nazareth and his betrothed bride had mutually consented to a divorce, there is no reason in Jewish law why he should not have 'put her away privily' (Matthew i. 19). There is little ground for thinking that—while Jews lived in an environment in which their whole manner of life was regulated by their own laws—such divorces by mutual consent were either frequent or productive of social evils, though it may be that the woman's assent was occasionally extorted by harsh measures. But though the Rabbis could oppose no legal bar to divorce by mutual consent, it was their duty to exhaust every possible expedient of moral dissuasion. 'Aaron, in Hillel's phrase (Aboth i. 12), was the type of the peacemaker, and this was traditionally explained (Aboth de R. Nathan, ch. xii.) to mean that his life-work was, in part, the reconciliation of estranged husbands and wives." This applies even more strongly to recent times, when Rabbis refuse to listen to a frivolous claim for divorce. I state here that divorce by mutual consent was not very common. It is certainly very uncommon at the present time. I recently made inquiries with regard to Jerusalem, where the Jews live practically under their own law, Mahommedan law being very little exercised there; and I find divorce is extremely rare; much rarer than divorce in European countries. "But the case was different when one of the parties to the divorce was unwilling to assent, or when one party had something to gain by treating the other party as unwilling. From the eleventh century it has been customary in Jewish law to require that in all cases the wife shall assent to the divorce, except where her misconduct or failure could be shown to be sufficient cause why the marriage might be forcibly dissolved by the husband. But this condition of the woman's assent was not necessary at the beginning of the Christian era, when neither Rabbinic sanction nor the wife's consent was obligatory. The rule in the first century was (Yebamoth xiv. 1): 'Woman may be divorced with or without her will, but a man only with his will.' If, however, the wife contested the divorce, it is highly probable that the husband had to specify his reasons and bring the matter before a regularly constituted Beth Din," or court of three. "This was certainly the case if he suspected her of adultery (Soṭa i. 3–4). The accusing husband took his wife before the local Beth Din or court of three, and after a first hearing two Rabbis would conduct the accused to the Supreme Court in Jerusalem, which alone could deal finally with such charges. If she confessed, she forfeited her marriage settlement and was divorced; otherwise the ordeal of the waters (Numbers v.) was applied."

38,388. What is that exactly; I forget at the moment?—They subjected her to an oath, and gave her to drink this prepared water—these bitter waters; Scripture describes the constituents of it; and if it had an injurious effect upon her, if her body was swollen and so forth, she was guilty, and in the old days her death was supposed to follow. It was an ordeal, a trial by ordeal by a more or less supernatural test as to her innocence.

38,389. If she answered to the ordeal she was treated as innocent?—Yes.

38,390. If she did not she was treated as guilty?—Yes, or rather the ordeal itself was believed to have such effects as to prove her guilt. If she refused to subject herself to the ordeal she was divorced. "We may well suppose that in other cases, especially such as involved a stigma on the wife, the matter would be made a matter of public enquiry if she so claimed. It is only thus that we can fully explain the different views." A wife always had a right to protest against an evil slander against her, and she could force the matter to be brought before the court on other grounds if she wished to resist the divorce. "It is only thus that we can fully explain the different views taken at the early period as to lawful grounds of divorce." I mean that unless the court had something to do with it, then, the husband having full power to divorce on any ground, there would be no reason why the law should attempt to formulate reasons. Apparently it points to somebody else judging, and not the husband.

38,391. As if divorce by mutual consent was a consent forced, because this is dealing with the case where she was unwilling?—No, I am now passing away from them.

38,392. But going back for a moment. If there was consent there was no difficulty?—No difficulty at all.

38,393. But if the consent was withheld this part you are reading came into play?—Yes, that is my point.

38,394. Was it ever found that divorce was obtained by force?—Yes, in certain cases where it says they compelled the wife to accept a divorce if she had been guilty of certain offences; then the divorce was merely delivered to her and delivery was accepted, so long as it got into any space over which she had control; if it was somehow conveyed into her room, or within a certain distance of her hand. Of course there were very close rules as to what delivery of it was.

38,395. But you mean that in effect it forced her consent?—In certain cases, yes. From the eleventh century it was held she was not to be divorced against her will except if she was charged with adultery; or, according to many, in case of barrenness. "The schools of Hillel and Shammai differed materially (Gettin, end): the former gave the husband the legal right to divorce his wife for any cause. Cf. Matthew xix. 3 Josephus, Antiq. iv. viii. 23 ('for any cause whatsoever')."

38,396. Would you kindly tell us for what date those schools——?—I go into that point in the next sentence or two. "The school of Shammai limited the right to the case in which the wife was unchaste. The 'schools' or 'houses' of Hillel and Shammai belong to the first century." They begin from about the time of Jesus and continue till the end of the first century.

38,397. Were they in existence in His time?—Yes, but it is uncertain on a particular point as to how early it goes back into the century. "It is uncertain whether this particular difference of opinion on divorce goes back to Hillel and Shammai themselves, and thus to the very beginning of the Christian era. It is barely possible that the teaching of Jesus on the subject led to further discussion in the Pharisaic schools, and that the rigid attitude of Jesus influenced the school of Shammai. This, however, is altogether improbable, for the view of the latter school is derived from Deuteronomy (xxiv. 1) by a process which closely accords with the usual exegetical methods of the Shammaites." It looks as though it were quite natural to them, and had not been the result of any outside discussion. It is much more likely, as most commentators agree, that the Gospel reproduced a discussion of the schools. Then this I can omit—that "as the text now stands." If that passage in Matthew in which adultery is admitted as a cause of divorce be a genuine part of the text, then it looks as though it must come from Shammai, because there the Greek of the New Testament corresponds so precisely with Shammai's words and not with the words of Deuteronomy. Matthew v. 32 (as the text now stands) with its λόγου πορνείας is certainly derived from the school of Shammai, for the text of Deut. xxiv. 1 reads ערות דבר, and it was the school of Shammai who turned the words round into דבר ערוה (Gittin ix. 10), which corresponds exactly with the text of Matthew.) Hillel's language: "Even if she spoiled his food," is, of course, figurative, and may point to indecent conduct, a sense which similar metaphors sometimes bear." For instance, "there is a metaphor that a man shall not eat out of the dish which his neighbour has partaken of; that is against marrying a woman who has had intercourse with another; and when Hillel said "even if she spoilt his food," I do not think he was making a frivolous remark, but may have been referring to unchastity, but the later authorities did not so interpret him; they interpreted him to mean for any cause whatever. "Hillel was a teacher noted for his tender humaneness; it was he who popularised in Pharisaic circles the negative form of the Golden Rule before Jesus stated it positively. Hence, it is not just to speak of his view on divorce as 'lax' or 'low,' even if (as no doubt later Rabbinic authority assumed) Hillel used this forcible language to preserve as inalienable the ancient norm that a husband possessed complete right to divorce his wife for any cause. For it must be observed that his 'lax' and 'low' view of divorce was also a more rigid and elevated view as to the necessity of absolute harmony in the marriage state." That always has to be remembered, that an apparently lax law of divorce was a rigid law as to the importance of complete domestic harmony. "Still, his view (or its interpretation) did produce a condition of subjection in the woman's status, and left room for much arbitrariness on the part of the husband. 'Aqiba, who went beyond Hillel in maintaining the husband's arbitrary powers ('even if he find another woman more beautiful'), was in fact no friend of divorce, for he applied the severest rules in estimating the pecuniary rights of the wife under the marriage settlement. 'Sell the hair of your head to pay it,' said 'Aqiba (Nedarim ix, 5) to a would-be divorcer who complained that the payment of the heavy demands of the settlement would impoverish him." 'Aqiba is himself the hero of one of the most romantic love stories in Rabbinic literature, and when a man cites a law it does not necessarily mean that that was his teaching to his disciples; a law is one thing, and a man's feelings and views with regard to it is another. "As D. Amram in his excellent book on the subject of 'The Jewish Law of Divorce' (Philadelphia, 1896) puts it, neither Hillel nor 'Aqiba was making law, they were stating it, 'regardless of their personal views or opinions' (p. 37) It is true, however, that their statement of the law helped to make and perpetuate it for future times. The injurious effect was much mitigated, though never theoretically removed, by subsequent modifications. We can trace the gradual incidence of restraining enactments and customs. Already in the year 40 A.D. we find various reforms introduced by Gamaliel, who ordained, e.g., that the Get or divorce letter must be subscribed by the witnesses." Previously, apparently, it had not needed the signature of the witnesses. The husband does not sign the letter; it is only signed by the witnesses nowadays. "And withdrew from the husband the right to cancel the Get unless the wife or her attorney were present." It seems that a husband would sometimes give a divorce, and then alter his mind (I point that out in the next sentence), that he would cancel the divorce before it reached her hands, and she would know nothing of it, and she would be in a very awkward position if she remarried, and that was obviated by this reform. "Such cancellation was made before Gamaliel's reform; the husband would locally constitute a Beth-din of three Rabbis ad hoc." At that period he could give a divorce without the Beth-din, but he could not cancel it without, because it became a contract then. When you were dealing with contracts the court had to have cognisance of it. "Though, as stated above, the divorce itself needed no court, many questions (as to settlements, &c.) arising out of the divorce would have to be brought before the Beth-din."

"There were, indeed, certain grounds on which husband or wife could claim the help of the court in effecting a divorce against the other's will. In all such cases, where the wife was concerned as the moving party, she could only demand that her husband should divorce her, the divorce was always, from first to last, in Jewish law the husband's act. The matter was not, however, always left to the parties themselves. 'Joseph being a righteous man, and not willing to expose her to shame, determined to divorce her secretly.' This implies that Joseph had no option"—as a righteous man—" to discarding his wife. If the husband suspected his wife of unchastity while betrothed to him, he was compelled, as a 'righteous man' to divorce her (betrothal was so binding that divorce was necessary to free a betrothed couple). His only option was between divorcing his bride privately with her consent, or formulating a charge of infidelity against her, thus subjecting her to public disgrace as well as divorce."

Anyhow she would be subjected to disgrace if he sent her home and the marriage did not occur, and he divorced her; but the disgrace would be far greater if he absolutely charged her with infidelity. "Divorce was not in itself a disgrace, seeing that it might occur on grounds involving no moral stigma." Of course in this case it would be. "The case was aggravated by the circumstance that Mary was with child, until Joseph received the assurance that his whole suspicion was erroneous. The Wisdom Books and the Rabbinic doctors agreed in regarding adultery as peculiarly heinous when it resulted in the birth of a child."

Thus the Rabbis, on the text in Ecclesiastes (The crooked cannot be made straight), asked, What is that? That is the birth of a child from an adulterous act; that cannot be made straight. "The offence was a three-fold sin." The next statement is taken from Ecclesiasticus (xxiii. 23): "against God, against the husband, against the family. In Jewish law adultery was the intercourse of a married woman with any man other than her husband. Though his conduct was severely reprobated, and at all events in later centuries gave his wife a right to claim a divorce, a man was not regarded as guilty of adultery unless he had intercourse with a married woman other than his wife. For though monogamy had become the prevalent custom in Jewish life long before the Christian era (cf. 'Jewish Encyclopedia' viii. p. 657), the man could legally marry several wives, and sometimes did so. Thus an unmarried and unbetrothed woman with whom a married man had intercourse might become his wife; indeed such intercourse could be legally construed into a marriage. By the Pentateuchal law the penalty for adultery was death. But this law can never have been frequently enforced. It needed eye-witnesses (hence the 'taken in the 'very act' of John viii. 4)."

I must point out that the objection to the view that adultery was no longer punishable by death is that passage in John. That does assume that the woman who was taken in adultery was going to be put to death, but most commentators do not think it was actually the case, but that it was merely testing Jesus as to whether He would dispute the Pentateuchal law as to the penalty for adultery. Of course, the woman had not been tried, and she could not be put to death without trial. People could not seize a woman and say, "Shall she be put to death?" That would be quite impossible. Therefore, the whole incident does not weigh against the other evidence that adultery was no longer punishable by death. It makes the case different in the interpretation of Matthew; for if adultery was punishable by death, then it stands to reason that when Jesus was saying there should be no divorce, as He did in Mark, He was not thinking of adultery, because that would be punishable by death; the marriage bond would be absolutely broken by adultery, because it would lead to the death of the wife or the guilty party. If adultery was no longer punishable by death then it entirely alters the effect of those passages. "Moreover the husband would hesitate to charge his wife, and the detected adulterer would offer heavy compensation to save his own life which was forfeit. The husband could privately divorce his wife" (even if she was guilty of adultery, I mean) she naturally losing all her rights under the marriage settlement. A charge of adultery would have to be public, and tried before the central court. It is not probable that the death penalty for adultery was inflicted at all in the age of Jesus. The Jewish courts had lost the general power of capital punishment in the year 30 A.D. (T. J. Sanh. 18 a, T.B. 41a). The Mishnah cites a single case which would fall within the age of Jesus, but it does so doubtfully (Sanh. vii. 2), and Josephus' casual assertion that the penalty for adultery was death was rather an antiquarian note than a record of experience (Apion ii. 25). On the other hand it would seem that the ordeal of the bitter waters, as applied in case of suspected adultery of the wife, was still prevalent, for the Mishnah records (Soṭa ix. 9) that the ceremouy was only abolished during the Roman invasion (circa 70 A.D.), though Queen Helena of Adiabene—a proselyte to Judaism in the first century A.D.—sought to restore the practice (Yoma iii. 10, Tosefta Yoma ii. 3). It is interesting to note that 'Aqiba—whose view on divorce was so 'lax'—nobly said of the ordeal: 'Only when the (accusing) 'husband is himself free from guilt will the waters 'be an effective test of his wife's guilt or innocence' (Sifre, Nasô 21; Soṭa 47b). With this may be usefully compared the fine utterance (John viii. 7): 'He that is without sin among you, let him first 'cast a stone at her' ('Jewish Encyclopedia,' I. 217; Hastings, 'Encyclopaedia of Religion,' I. 130: from my article there I have taken some passages). The abolition of the ordeal is attributed by the Mishnah to the great prevalence of adultery, and it may be that in the disturbed conditions due to the Roman régime a temporary laxity of morals intruded itself."

I might add that that would be confirmed by the evidence of the Wisdom Books. The Book of Proverbs is full of warning against harlotry and adultery, so is the Wisdom Book of Ecclesiasticus, but that does not point to a general state of immorality, because the people attacked are the wealthy, and both books were written when the Hellenistic morals had made a road into Jewish society, and we would have the same conditions as during the Roman period, when the Jewish law would lose its hold, and the new law was either laxer, or had not yet come into force, and between the two there may have been a temporary outbreak of immorality of this kind. "The Rabbis held adultery in the utmost detestation. Not all a man's other virtues could save the adulterer from Gehenna (T. B. Soṭa 4b). Unchastity drives away from man the Divine Presence which dwells only in the chaste soul. It is impossible, however, to attempt to collect here the mass of Pharisaic maxims against such offences. In the year 135 A.D., at the crisis of the disastrous revolt against Hadrian, a meeting was held at Lydda. The assembly was attended by several famous Rabbis (including 'Aqiba), and the question was discussed as to the extent of conformity with Roman demands which might justifiably be made rather than face the alternative of death. The result is a remarkable testimony to the Jewish abhorrence of unchastity. It was decided (Sanh. 74a) that every Jew must surrender his life rather than commit any of the three offences: idolatry, murder, or gillui 'arāyoth, a phrase which includes both adultery and incest. "The penalty for proven adultery, when the capital punishment was abolished, was mitigated into the divorce of the woman (the husband having no option)."

38,397A. Might I ask how that was enforced. Did the Rabbis insist on his presenting a bill?—Yes, they had all sorts of powers of compulsion. They could order him to have 39 stripes; they could imprison him; they would certainly fine him. We have records of their imposing accumulative fines on him if he refused to obey the order; and they could excommunicate him. In an environment where the Jewish law prevailed that was a terrible power. I state further on that if the man was contumelious in the end I do not see what remedy they had.

38,398. But practically they put such pressure on him that he was forced to present the bill?—That was it. "The wife also lost all her rights under the marriage contract, and was not permitted to marry her paramour (Soṭa v. 1). The husband could, nay must, divorce her on suspicion, but her settlements would be intact." If he suspected her of adultery he was not allowed to continue to live with her.

38,399. Even for suspicion?—Yes.

38,400. But supposing she was not guilty?—That would not matter; he was expscted to divorce her.

38,401. Whether he had real ground or not?—Whether he had real ground or not. It was considered that his suspicions vitiated the position between them.

38,402. Then he only had to say he suspected her to get rid of her?—He would have to give some ground for his suspicion.

38,403. Some reasonable ground?—Yes; that is laid down in the Mishnah. He was not allowed to compel her to undergo the ordeal of the waters without good primâ facie grounds. He would have to give evidence. "It would therefore be to his advantage sometimes to prefer a public charge against her. The male adulterer was scourged, but was not compelled to divorce his own wife unless she insisted. In general, when the Mishnah speaks of 'compelling' the husband to execute a bill of divorce, the court could scourge, fine, imprison, and excommunicate him, and had practically unlimited power to force him to deliver the necessary document freeing his wife. By a legal fiction which undeniably had moral justification, the act would still be described as voluntary on the husband's part. But in case of his determined contumely, there would be no redress, as the court could not of its own motion dissolve a marriage, though it could pronounce a marriage ab initio void." There would always be a way out of it in certain cases; they would say that the marriage was initially void; and in certain cases they were compelled to do so. "The secular courts might be "used to enforce the desire of the Beth-din (Gittin "ix. 8)." We read of the Beth-din going before the Roman court to compel the man to give a divorce to his wife. But the Beth-din could not be induced to return the compliment, and validate a divorce pronounced in a Roman court (Gittin i. 5). For the whole tenour of Jewish divorce depends on the theory. . ." I should like this to read with reference to the past rather than the present. I was deliberately keeping from the statement——

38,404. You shall have every opportunity of revising the proof?—I should like this to read "depended"; "the whole tenour of Jewish divorce depended"; I do not wish to enter into the present-day question. You are going to hear the Chief Rabbi.

38,405. Of to-day?—Yes; and the practice of the courts substantially in European lands may act on a different principle from this; I am talking of the historical position in the olden time. "The whole tenour of Jewish divorce depended on the theory that divorce is the act only and solely of the husband, and no Beth-din could validate a divorce which was the act of any court, and not of the husband, in the prescribed forms. Moreover, on matters affecting marriage and divorce the Jewish courts would be most jealous of external interference. In modern times, however, the Beth-din would refuse to sanction or validate a divorce which had not been previously effected in the civil courts of the country.

"Other consequences followed from the theory that divorce was the willing act of the husband. The divorce of the insane husband of a sane wife would be impossible (Yebamoth xiv. 1), as he could not execute the deed of divorce. Nor could the insane wife of a sane husband be divorced by by him, because she stood in all the greater need of his protection." It is an interesting point to notice that the insane husband and the insane wife could not get a divorce; the insane husband because he is incapable of executing the document, and the insane wife because it is cruelty to her; but for that, she could be divorced, but the one humane idea comes in that she is not to be thrown off because she needs her husband all the more. "(If the insanity were proved to have existed before marriage, the marriage could be pronounced initially void, for the marriage of the insane was illegal.)." She could not, if insane, contract a marriage; there was a difference of principle. The wife could not be married against her consent though she could be divorced against her consent. "It should here be pointed out that though the sane husband could divorce his sane wife on a variety of grounds, and in the first century could do so without the intermediation of a court, he could not secure himself against the divorced wife's claims for maintenance unless he satisfied the court that the divorce had been properly executed, and that the wife's just rights had been satisfied. In that sense, the courts would have a power to revise his personal acts, even in the early period under review. Apart also from legal duties, the husband was expected to show every possible considerateness to his divorced wife. She was, of course, no longer under his jurisdiction, she was sui juris, and her husband lost the usufruct of her estate. This last fact was a constant preventive of arbitrary divorce (T. B. Pesahim 113b)." The charge on his estate for the settlement went much further than his own estate; any property he had ever possessed and had passed into the hands of third parties might be seized by the wife for payment of the settlement.

38,406. That seems rather hard on the third party?—Very hard indeed. "But the husband was expected, as a humane son of Israel, to save his divorced wife from penury. It is related of Rabbi José the Galilean (about 100 A.D.), that after his divorced wife had remarried and was reduced to poverty, he invited her and her husband into his house and supported them, although when she was his wife she had made his life miserable, and his conduct is the subject of Rabbinical laudation. 'Do not withdraw 'from thy flesh,' said Isaiah (lviii. 7); this, Rabbi Jacob bar Aha interpreted to mean, 'Do not withdraw help from thy divorced wife' (Amram, op. cit. p. 110). If the divorced woman retained charge of infant children, the former husband not only had to maintain her, but he was also required to pay her for her services. But, in general, as to the custody of the children, the regulations were extremely favourable to the wife, who was treated with every conceivable generosity. These regulations, however, were not formulated so early as the first century." I could tell you briefly what they were; they were that the children were in the control of the wife until they were six; up to which time, if she chose to retain them, the husband could not reclaim them.

38,407. Even though she was divorced for adultery?—I do not know; I should not like to say offhand about adultery. If she kept them till they were six the husband had to maintain them; if after six the husband claimed them, and the wife was unwilling to part with them, she could still retain them, but then he was no longer compelled to maintain them. Except the daughters; the daughters he was compelled to maintain throughout their lives or until marriage, although they remained with their mother. But this was a later enactment. "It is clear that a husband was very reluctant to divorce his wife if she were also the mother of his children. Though it was held a duty to divorce an 'evil woman'—an incurable scold and disturber of the domestic peace—nevertheless if she were a mother, the husband would waive his right and endure his fate as best he might ('Erubin 41b).

"We have already seen that the insane husband was incompetent to deliver a bill of divorce. In certain other cases of disease—though not of mere infirmity—" I mean if he broke his leg or lost an eye, that was not held to be a ground for divorce, but disease was different—"the wife could claim a divorce (his rights in similar cases were indisputable). If she became deaf-mute after the marriage, he could divorce her" because her consent was not necessary. "If he contracted the same defects he could not divorce her (Yebamoth xiv.);" because he could not address her; he could not divorce her in the same manner as that in which he had married her. "If the husband fell a victim to leprosy the wife could claim a divorce, and in the second century the courts could enforce a separation in such cases against the will of the parties, unless the latter satisfied the authorities that there would be no continuance of sexual intercourse. The wife could claim a divorce in other cases of loathsome disease, as well as when the husband engaged in unsavoury occupations which rendered cohabitation unreasonably irksome (Kethuboth vii. 9). In those cases the wife retained her settlements. The husband could divorce the wife with loss of her settlements if she transgressed against the moral and ritual laws of Judaism, and some Rabbis of the first century held that the same rule applied if the wife made herself notorious by her indelicate conduct in public. If he became impoverished and unable, or if he were unwilling, to support her adequately, if he denied to her conjugal rights, she could by rules adopted at various times claim the right to her freedom (Kethuboth v. 8—9), indeed such treatment on his part was a breach of the contract made in the marriage deed" in which he contracted to do all these things.

38,408. Is there a marriage deed generally?—Yes, certainly; there is strong evidence now that the marriage contract is older than the Christian era. These Aramaic papyri show that in the fifth century B.C. a marriage contract was a very important document and the Book of Tobit has a reference to the writing of marriage. In the present marriage contract the husband contracts to support her as a decent husband should support a Jewish wife, and to honour her and do all those things a Jewish husband should do, and to maintain her in every possible manuer; so that it would be a breach of contract.

38,409. Does she contract in any way?—She only accepts it.

38,410. I suppose that originates really in his having the power of divorce?—Yes.

38,411. He makes certain bargains and she simply accepts?—Yes; of course, she was always asked whether she accepted; it was quite an act of free will on her part. "Similar rights accrued to the wife—some of these concessions belong to a considerably later period—if he restricted her liberty, if he became an apostate, if he committed a crime which compelled him to fly the country, if he violently and persistently ill-treated her, and if he were openly licentious in his life. In case of desertion, the wife could not obtain a divorce; though, in order to certify his death" (presume his death, I mean) "the court would waive some of its usual strictness as to the reception of evidence." They were on the side of the woman wherever they could be. If the woman appeared before them they would accept evidence of the husband's death which they would not accept in the ordinary course; they would accept a single witness's evidence instead of two; there was great relaxation of the law of evidence. "If the whereabouts of the husband were known, the local court would use every effort to compel him to return or grant a divorce. The excellence of intercommunication between Jewish settlements would enable the court to trace him. But the court could not grant a divorce to the wife if the husband had merely vanished and left no trace."

38,412. I suppose he would take the initiative always?—Yes.

38,413. And that presented the difficulty?—Yes. He could appoint a delegate; give a power of attorney, I have read in the middle ages of cases where a man, fearing he was going on a dangerous journey, would get a power of attorney; something like a conditional divorce; I have mentioned in this following paragraph much the same idea.

38,414. You mean if he did not return his attorney could present the bill?—Yes.

38,415. So that it would free the woman?—Yes. This is a conditional divorce that I refer to in what follows. "The persecutions to which the Jews were subjected, compelled many men to leave home in search of a livelihood, and in the Middle Ages, out of love and consideration for his wife, the husband would sometimes give her a conditional divorce which would become effective if he failed to appear within a stated term. It is said that in ancient times a Jewish soldier on going to active service, delivered such a divorce which would be valid if he died on the field. The effect would be to save his widow from the levirate marriage, from which as a divorcee she was free." You see she had to marry her brother-in-law if she had no issue, and if she was divorced she was free from that. "In course of time the position of the woman was continuously improved, generation after generation of Rabbinical jurists endeavouring to secure to her an ever greater measure of justice and generosity.

"The wife's barrenness, after ten years' married life, was a ground for divorce (Yebamoth 64a); later on it was disputed whether the court should leave the man to follow his own feeling in the matter, or whether it should compel him to divorce his wife, or alternatively (in countries where monogamy was not demanded by law) marry an additional wife."

38,416. Supposing she objected, what would she do then?—To what?

38,417. With regard to the divorce?—Then he could theoretically compel her to accept it. But the husbands do not seem to have wished it; it was really the Society that wished it.

38,418. For the procreation of childreu?—Yes, and one often finds that with the husband. In fact this passage I quote from Philo shows the curious position in which the husband, out of love to his wife, does not wish to part with her because she has no children; but Philo argues with him and says, "Yes, but you are only having intercourse for sexual passion, you know you can have no children, this is not the reason you are permitted to exercise this passion."

38,419. They practically compel them to?—I do not think he says he would compel them, but he would like them to divorce her. In certain cases in the Middle Ages they would have compelled the husband to have another wife.

38,420. In the general interests of the community?—In the general interests of the community; but they were very reluctant to compel them. I heard of a case in Jerusalem recently where the same principle would apply. It was rather a pathetic instance. He is a good friend of mine, and his grandfather was a Russian, and had lived with his wife for several years without issue, and he thought if he went to Jerusalem the propitious holiness of the soil might give him better luck, and they went and settled in Jerusalem, and waited there ten years and had no children. Then he went to the Rabbi to get a divorce, and the Rabbi absolutely refused. He said he would not sanction divorce on such grounds; they had waited for ten years, let them wait eleven. "But," he added, "I will tell you what I will do, I will bless you." And he blessed him in the court, and they went away, and within a year they had a child—the father of my friend. I only cite this as showing that there is tremendous reluctance shown by Jewish Rabbis for anything like a lax interpretation of the powers the law gives them. "Philo gives us reason to think that at the earlier period husbands were reluctant to make use of their power to divorce a barren wife. But childless marriages were regarded as a failure, and the point gave much trouble at various epochs. It was a religious duty to beget offspring, this was the fundamental purpose of marriage. We very rarely come across a celibate among the well-known Pharisees. Ben-'Azzai (Tos. Yebamoth viii. 4, Sota 4b, &c.) was a solitary exception. He belongs to the beginning of the second century, and he remained unmarried though he denounced celibacy. When a colleague remonstrated with him, pointing out the inconsistency between his conduct and his doctrine, Ben-'Azzai replied: 'What shall I do? My soul clings in love to the Torah' (that is, the religious law); 'let others contribute to the preservation of the race.' But it was not believed that this prime duty to society could be vicariously performed, and every Jew was expected to be a father. The act of sexual intercourse was consciously elevated by the view from an animal function to a fulfilment of the divine plan announced at the Creation," in accord with the text, 'Be fruitful and multiply.'

"From this brief summary it will be seen that the Jewish law of divorce must be judged in relation to the general principles of social and domestic ethics. Rules for marriage and divorce cannot be appreciated apart from many other factors. Jewish teaching and training were directed towards producing moral sobriety, continence, purity. It did this by word and deed, by formulating moral maxims and fostering moral habits. Society usually attacks the problem at the wrong end; it penalises marital offences instead of making those offences rare. The ancient synagogue dealt with the youth and maid in the formative period of their lives. The Jewish law of divorce was the law of a society in which young marriages predominated, and the contracting parties entered into a life-long wedlock straight from a pious and virtuous home, a home in which harmony and happiness were the rule, and the relations between husband, wife and children were distinguished by a rarely equalled and never surpassed serenity and reverence. As a saying (certainly not later than the first century) runs (Yebamoth 62b): 'Our masters have taught, He who loves his wife as himself, and honours her more than himself; who leads his sons and daughters in the straight path, and marries them near their time of maturity;—to his house the words of Job apply (v. 24): Thou shall know that thy tent is in peace.' With much of this ideal the modern world has lost sympathy, but the Judaism of the first century maintained it, and built on it a moral structure which has never been excelled among all the manifold attempts made by man to arrive at an effective discipline of life."

38,421. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) Before the Christian era was there any trace of what we call judicial separation, which had the effect of separating parties for life without dissolving the marriage tie?—I do not think so; I do not find any trace of judicial separation apart from divorce, unless this be the real effect of the Aramaic papyri referred to above.

38,422. Then I gather from what you say that the condonation of adultery was looked upon with dislike by the Jewish society?—Yes.

38,423. It would be still more strongly looked upon with dislike if there were no facilities for divorce?—Yes; that would be held a horrible state of immorality, that a man should be compelled to retain an adulterous woman as his wife; it would have been looked upon as the height of immorality.

38,424. Is there any trace in the authorities showing that the facilities for divorce tended to create immorality?—No. On the whole, I have tried my utmost to get to the bottom of that from the historical evidence. It seems to me it was never abused. I think you had better ask those who are dealing with the execution of the law at the present time. As to what is going on in Russia and those places I am not informed; but I do know of the Oriental countries, where I should expect divorce to be more frequent than in European settlements, and there I am convinced that divorce is very rare; though the facilities would be very great for any Rabbi in the Oriental countries to apply the letter of the law, he does not, and the divorces are extremely rare. It is because of the young marriages, too; the spouses grow up together and they very rarely part—those marriages which have been contracted in early maturity are very lasting.

38,425. (Lord Guthrie.) How would you compare the position of women among the Jews in the period you have been speaking of with Roman and Greek women?—The Roman and Greek women just then were getting into a position of great independence. The average Jewish woman would not have had anything like the rights—I will not say the rights, but the freedom—that the Roman women seem to have had if we are to believe the satirists, though I never believe them. I think one has to take Juvenal and those people with a very big grain of salt. I cannot think he is giving a true picture, but if he is, then these women like Herodias and Salome—no decent Jewish woman would have desired such a position of rights over her husband. According to the Sixth Satire of Juvenal a woman could have eight divorces, divorce eight husbands one after another. I do not know whether that is true to Roman law or whether it is the satirist's exaggeration. With it go certain conditions in the status of woman, no doubt.

38,426. Would you say that amongst the Jews morality has always been high as compared with that of persons professing other religions?—I should not like to contrast them with good elements of Christian society; but I can only say this, that the condition of sexual morality was far superior to what it is in modern big towns; undoubtedly it was far purer. The sexes were separated to begin with; they did not mix in this free manner; the whole position of women was a different one. What I object to is calling it a lower one without qualification. It is not a lower one but a different one. It is a pity when one talks of "low" and "high." You are aiming at a certain result, and you may get it in the Jewish methods when the Jewish law is prevailing. You cannot think of criticising what the marriage law and divorce law of Jews was by itself; you must deal with it and the other methods of the Jews as a solidarity.

38,427. That is, the Jews have mixed with other races now?—Yes.

38,428. Could you say how their morality in this country now compares with what it was under the old conditions?—I should say it is not as good as it was. I should say there has been a deterioration amongst Jews owing to their living the ordinary life of the society around them and having abandoned a great many of their own distinctive safeguards to morality.

I should say there has been a weakening due to the participation of Jews in general society, as in other matters. You would never have come across a Jew who was a drunkard, but you will find Jews, nowadays, I suppose, drinking too much. You would not have come across them in the olden days when sobriety was the common virtue of Jews. They mix with other young men and go and drink with them, and no doubt catch the same morals, and will have intercourse with women before their marriage just as other young men do; but it was entirely unheard of in the days of young marriage; that was the point, to keep them straight and pure, and from many of these temptations.

38,429. Are you able to speak—or will you leave it to the Rabbi—of the present position of Jews with regard to divorce, and to the statistics, if any, of the proportion amongst them in proportion to marriages?—I should think it would be very difficult to get the statistics, for this reason. Dr. Adler, for instance,—the Chief Rabbi—would certainly not permit a divorce if it had not been granted first in the civil court; so his statistics would probably be the same, or fewer, than those of the general court.

38,430. But in the Jewish statistics there is nothing said about religion, so we can only get it from him?—I think I saw a return——

(Chairman.) We have a number of statistics.

(Lord Guthrie.) With regard to divorce?

(Chairman.) Yes.

(Lord Guthrie.) Judicial statistics?

(Chairman.) Those that the registrar has furnished from the Divorce Court. The figures of the various churches are given.

(Lord Guthrie.) That will meet my point.

(Chairman.) I do not say that it will give the proportion in relation to all the Jewish marriages. Dr. Adler is going to be called.

(Witness.) Yes, he will be able to answer questions of that kind better than I can.

38,431. (Lord Guthrie.) As to the time you have been speaking of, what were the causes under which nullity would be declared?—Well, there were various causes. For instance, supposing the wife was incapable of bearing children, and that was discovered after.

38,432. Relationship? — Relationship would be rather incest. Of course any cases of forbidden degrees.

38,433. Want of knowledge?—Perhaps; I should think so.

38,434. No others?—I think there would be others.

38,435. Ante-nuptial immorality?—Certainly; but there would be others than that. If either party contracted the marriage under misinformation on important crucial matters—on matters of serious importance, or even a deliberately misleading statement on less important matters, the contract was invalid.

38,436. Do you know, Mr. Abrahams, whether the Jewish law now, in a country, would allow a divorce or a nullity suit to be carried through which the civil law would not allow?—I do not quite understand the question.

38,437. Take the case that the Jewish law allowed nullity on a ground that the civil law of a particular country did not allow, would it be possible by the Jewish law to carry it through; or are the only grounds, either for nullity or divorce, according to the civil law of the particular country?—I think in all the modern communities—say London, Berlin, Paris, and communities like that—the regular Beth-din would never dissolve a marriage on grounds which would not have previously led to dissolution in the courts. They would not put a woman in the double status of being married by one law and not by the other. The other difficulty is where the divorce is pronounced in the civil courts and not confirmed by the Jewish courts. Then she is in a double status until some way is found of getting the husband to divorce by Jewish law.

38,438. Can you tell me whether now, if a divorce is carried through in the civil courts between Jews, it first comes before the Jewish court?—Oh no.

38,439. It comes after?—It would come after They might have heard of it before, but they would not decide it.

38,440. You quote the statement that the birth of a child through an adulterous act could not be made straight. Was there no legitimatio per subsequens matrimonium?—In many cases in which the marriage was dissolved the child was not declared illegitimate. Certainly in the next generation it made no difference. The child of an illegitimate child was legitimate: it did not go on.

38,441. That was not the point of my question. Supposing a Jewish man and woman before marriage had had a child, and the man then marries the woman, would that make the child born previously out of wedlock between them legitimate?—I cannot remember that particular point; I cannot answer that definitely, but I think that the subsequent marriage could not legitimise the child in regard to inheritance.

38,442. With regard to divorce, Mr. Abrahams, either in the old days or now, did it and does it at all affect the social position of a man that he has divorced his wife. Is it thought to put a stigma at all upon him, he being innocent?—No, I should think not. I should think there was no stigma in divorce when the divorce was for a cause which was no question of morality. I should say no, there is no stigma.

38,443. Have you ever known a case of a Jew or a Jewess being divorced more than once?—Yes, they could divorce more than once. The husband could not re-marry the wife after she had been divorced a second time. He could only marry her previous to her second marriage.

38,444. Do you know if this matter has been discussed in the Jewish community; especially the difficulty that the poor have in getting a remedy, about which we have heard so much?—There is no difficulty at all. The poor and the rich are in precisely the same position. The mere cost of the suit is nothing. The court takes no fees.

38,445. I quite understand that as far as the Jewish Court is concerned, but you know we have had a great deal about the poor generally being denied the remedy on account of the expense of Divorce Court proceedings. Do you know if that has been felt, discussed, amongst the Jews?—I do not think the question has been felt very strongly at all amongst the Jews. I think still, in spite of the influence of modern society upon Jewish morals, the desire for divorce amongst Jews is very slight, especially amongst the poor The rich man is always better off than the poor in every law devised by society. There are the difficulties I have mentioned about paying settlements, and there the rich man does not have the same difficulties as the poor man. The rich always get the pull; that must be the case.

38,446. (Lady Francis Balfour.) I did not quite understand if the wife could claim a divorce for the infidelity of the husband. She can if he has a loathsome disease?—Yes.

38,447. But can she claim it for infidelity?—In modern times she could.

38,448. But not previously?—I do not think so, because you see with the husband's infidelity he could, after all, marry the other one. The position was complicated. He would not be guilty of a crime if his infidelity was not adultery; that is to say, if the partner of his wrong was an unmarried woman. That was where the position was a little complicated. If, however, the infidelity went so far as to cause her husband to absent himself unreasonably from the wife's society, she could claim a divorce. It was one of her strongest rights.

38,449. But she could claim it if he had a disease?—Certainly, and also if he had had that disease when she married him, and even if she did it knowingly, because she might say, "I did not realise the difficulty "of living with him; I now realise it, and I cannot live "with him any longer"; and thereupon the marriage was null and void.

38,450. If it was leprosy she was bound to claim it?—The authorities had the right, and at certain times they felt it was necessary, to enforce the separation; but if they were sure that they were only living in the same house together but having no intercourse, they would allow them to remain married.

38,451. (Sir William Anson.) Is there any difficulty at the present time in conflict arising between the Jewish law and the law of the land in which the Jewish family is situated?—Yes, it does arise sometimes in the case of re-marriage. The synagogue will not re-marry a party that has not been divorced by Jewish law, and then the difficulty arises. That is, I think, the only question on which it arises.

38,452. Are not there cases in which, by the Jewish law, the divorce or decree of nullity would be possible when it is not possible by the law of this country; for instance, in the case of pre-nuptial unchastity?—It would not be granted—not by such a Jewish court as we have in London, on the ground that it cannot place them before the law in a state of freedom, and therefore it would be only deceiving the people to go through any ceremony of divorce which means nothing to them.

38,453. Practically the Jewish law would be made to conform in those respects to the law of the land?—Except that it will retain its own stringency over and above the law of the land in the one case, that it requires the husband to divorce her even though the law has decreed a divorce. As to all this question—the relation of the Jewish law to the law of the land in England at the present day—Dr. Adler can better inform you. It is a local question, affecting different countries differently. My own inquiries have been limited to Oriental countries.

38,454. (Chairman.) In some cases the woman could claim a divorce—Yes.

38,455. How was that put in force?—She would no doubt appear before the court, and the court would listen to her.

38,456. But I thought the claim would be made, but it must be a claim to make him present the bill?—Yes; then they would have the husband before them.

38,457. And they could force him to present a bill? Yes; the word in the Mishnah is constantly "כּוֹפִין" which means compel or force.

38,458. But he might still be obstinate?—He could always be obstinate. Just as torture nearly always effected its ends, but it did not always.

38,459. Can you specify in what cases the woman would be allowed to claim a divorce such as to justify pressure to be put upon the husband to get it?—In all those cases in which I talk of her having a right to claim I mean that.

38,460. Does that include any form of infidelity such as adultery with a married woman. I think you said it did?—In the case of the man's adultery with a married woman he was in no better position than the woman adultress. I mean he was guilty of a capital offence.

38,461. Then the wife could press the claim then?—She could have brought a charge of adultery against him, or have instigated the charge, and later in case of proved adultery of course she could have a divorce.

38,462. But I did not know if she could do that in the case of infidelity with a person not married?—No, not in the olden time; certainly not.

38,463. Is there a difference now?—There is a difference now in many communities. Many Jewish communities would allow the wife to claim a divorce if the husband were unfaithful.

38,464. One other matter. There is a beautiful saying on the last page of your proof. I want to know whether that is the foundation of what you have said, that there is really great care taken in entering into the marriage?—Yes.

38,465. And that leads to the probability of less difficulty after?—Yes.

38,466. And that is the foundation of the Jewish position?—Yes. While the Jewish discipline of life prevailed as a whole, the Jewish law of divorce fitted into the scheme.

38,467. With regard to statistics which Lord Guthrie inquired for, I have them now. In 1908 there were 17 decrees nisi of marriages apparently that have been performed in a Jewish synagogue; in 1907, 10. Probably Dr. Adler will be able to give more assistance about that?—I think it would be as well, perhaps, if you were to apply to the United Synagogue or some authority who could give you the number of marriages.

38,468. I do not know to what extent you can tell us, but in the case of divorce in the olden times what was the position of children? Is that what you have already stated, namely, that the wife would be allowed the children to six years and he would maintain them?—In olden times? It is the third century that those rules apply to; that is why I did not put them in. I find them first stated for the third century. It was the influence of Roman law; I believe it was in the age of Diocletian.

38,469. You do not know what was done with children in the days of Christ?—No; only infant children. That regulation about infant children was the first century; up to the time of weaning. An Oriental child often is not weaned till three, and certainly not till two; and therefore when we talk of weaning it means a longer period in Oriental countries. Until the time the child was weaned the divorced wife, in the time of Jesus, retained the child if she liked; if she chose to repudiate it she could do so from the first hour of divorce. They had no claim upon her services as nurse of the child. But if, as in normal cases, she did wish to retain it, the husband had to maintain her till the child was weaned, and pay her for her services as nurse. Then, when the child was weaned she could discard it or retain it till six—that was the third century regulation—during which time the husband had to keep her. Then at the sixth year he could claim the children, and if she refused to give them back she had to support the sons. The daughters he had to support for ever, or until they were married. If the father died, the children became public wards, the community having to support them.

38,470. Do you know how much of that relates back to the Christian age?—No, I could not say how much of the regulation applies to the early Christian age.

38,471. But as to the weaning?—That distinctly belongs to the first century. I cannot trace the other matter.

38,472. With regard to children now; do they follow the civil courts' orders?—I should think so. I should think that the Jewish Beth din would not interfere with the civil courts at all.

38,473. There is one other matter at the bottom of page 2, in reference to the phrase in Genesis "of one flesh." Could you give me the interpretation of that?—The words used there are that the woman is made out of the rib of man; she is physically his flesh. Then she becomes woman and he marries her and gets back his flesh. There is an amusing saying in the Talmud on that subject. One Rabbi asked, 'Why does the man do the courting and not the woman?' and the answer is, 'If a man loses a valuable 'object he has to go and look after it, and he cannot 'expect it to run after him. So his rib being taken 'from his side he has lost it, and he has to go and 'look for his wife and court her. She becomes his 'flesh again by marriage.' That is rather quaintly put, but it seems to be the whole idea of the passage originally. Then once more they are one flesh. It is uncertain whether it points, as some commentators think, to the primitive form of beena marriage, the marriage by which the husband went, on the marriage, to the tribe of the wife; the phrase, 'A man shall leave his father and mother and cleave to his wife,' might mean to leave his paternal kindred and go to his wife's; of which there is evidence in the patriarchal stories, where the man leaves home and joins himself to his wife's kindred.

38,474. Which is the more modern?—The second is the more modern thery. The objection to it is simply this, that to assume that meaning in Genesis would mean giving Genesis an antiquity which critical science does not ascribe to it. If that refers to beena marriage it would be very ancient, and the modern idea is to regard that passage in Genesis as nothing like so old.

38,475. It might mean the latter, but that is the objection to it?—Yes.

(Chairman.) I think I ought, on behalf of the Commissioners, to thank you very much indeed for your interesting paper. I am sure we shall have a great deal of pleasure in studying it with greater care than we can at the moment.

Dr. William Sanday called and examined.

38,476. (Chairman.) Although I think we know them, would you kindly give us your official and other qualifications?—I am Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity at Oxford; a canon of Christchurch; and Doctor of Divinity.

38,477. I did not quite hear. Do you occupy one of the professorial positions? — Yes, I am Lady Margaret professor.

38,478. Of divinity at Oxford?—Of divinity at Oxford.

38,479. Might I ask how long you have held that office?—Since 1895.

38,480. You have been good enough, I have no doubt with a good deal of trouble and care, to prepare a paper for us on the New Testament passages bearing on marriage and divorce. It is so much in sequence that I think, if it is not too great an effort to you, I should like to ask you to read it, and we will reserve any questions we have till it is finished. I would suggest that, as there is a good deal of quotation and Greek, you might omit the reading of those parts; but, of course, they will appear in the print as part of your evidence?—Yes.

38,481. Will you read it yourself?—I will read it, my Lord:—

"It is perhaps desirable to guard expressly at the outset against a mistake and confusion which may be very easily and naturally made, especially by anyone who is not quite familiar with the particular class of questions to be investigated. There are two distinct questions, which should be kept distinct: one as to the text of our present Gospels, and another as to the original wording of the hypothetical documents or sources which, on the strength of critical analysis and inference, are presumed to lie behind our present Gospels. The first of these questions is commonly treated as coming under the head of 'textual criticism;' the second is rather regarded as a department of what is technically called the 'Synoptic Problem,' or the inquiry into the mutual relations of the three first Gospels to each other and to their sources. It is this second deeper question which really gives trouble in the case before us. There is, it is true, some variation in the authorities for the text of the Gospels, but it is all of a minor and secondary kind. The important questions do not arise until we begin to go behind the text of our Gospels. I observe that in the paper of reference the word 'interpolation' is used in connexion with the text of St. Matthew's Gospel. I am not sure that it is quite the right word. But, however that may be, it should be clearly understood that if there is interpolation, it is by the first Evangelist himself, and not by any later scribe. It would be well to bear this distinction in mind all through the inquiry.

"When it is borne in mind, it will soon be apparent that the questions of textual criticism, so far as they relate to the text of our Gospels, are really subordinate. If they were omitted altogether, no great harm would be done. Still, as it is well to work upon right data rather than upon wrong, it will probably be wished that I should begin by discussing the textual questions involved.

"The inquiry will fall under three heads or steps, in an ascending scale of difficulty and complexity: (I.) Textual Criticism; (II.) Synoptic Criticism; (III.) Higher Criticism and Exegesis. By the second I mean the inquiry into the relation of the different texts to each other. By the third I mean the discussion of the ultimate question as to what was really said, and what it really meant."

Perhaps I might be allowed to take as read this first portion on textual criticism. The upshot of it 38,482. Is that you take the Revised Version?—That we may take the Revised Version as it stands.

The following is the portion of the proof referred to:—

"I.—Textual Criticism.

"We begin with the simplest and easiest, the problem of Textual Criticism. The passages involved are four, or it is better to say five, if we include the passage from St. Paul, as I believe we ought: Matt. v. 32 or rather v. 27, 28, 31, 32; xix. 3–12; Mark x. 2-12; Luke xvi. 18; 1 Cor. vii. 10, 11.

"It will not be necessary as yet to set out these passages at length, because the questions of text affect them singly rather than in combination, and so far as three out of the five are concerned no substantial question arises, while in regard to the remaining two (both from St. Matthew) the substantial variants are confined to single verses.

"It may be convenient if I anticipate at once the conclusion at which I shall presently arrive, viz., that, for the purpose of the Commission, it will be safe to take the Revised Version and the Revisers' Greek Text as they stand."

I may pause for a moment to point out that this conclusion, if I am right in regard to it, is fortunate and satisfactory. Not only will it simplify the whole procedure of the Commission so far as this part of the subject is concerned, but it also seems to me that the evidence of the Revised Version is evidence of a kind to which the Commission would naturally attach the greatest weight. It may be taken to represent as nearly as it can be represented the great mass of scholarship throughout the English-speaking nations. Strictly speaking, it represents opinion as it stood in the year 1881. But I may note in passing, that the American portion of the Revision Committee continued its sittings till 1900, and when it brought out its separate edition in that year (N.T. 1900; "Standard Edition" of the whole Bible, 1901) the only change was the comparatively trivial, "Not all men can receive" for "All men cannot receive" in Matt. xix. 11.

It may perhaps be not altogether superfluous to suggest that, from the point of view of the Commission, the Revised Version has certain further advantages. Not only is it the work of a group of representative scholars from a variety of denominations and from the two great branches of the Anglo-Saxon race, but it may be also said to embody the principle of judge and jury. We might call it a sort of High Court of the English-speaking nations, with the democratic principle added. It will be remembered that the Revision Committee had the good fortune to number among its members the two leading textual critics of the time (for I believe that, if foreign opinion as well as English were canvassed, it would pronounce that, in the year 1881, Drs. Westcott and Hort had no superiors anywhere). In addition to these the Committee included such other experts as Bp. Lightfoot, Bp. Ellicott, Dr. F. H. A. Scrivener, Prof. Edwin Palmer in this country, and Dr. Ezra Abbot in America. But these experts were not able to give an uncontrolled verdict; they had to convince a considerable body of non-expert scholars as well. In other words, the final verdict was not that of specialism alone, but of specialism (for good or ill) tempered with common sense.

"For these reasons it seems to me that the Revised Version is just such an authority as a Royal Commission would like to have. All that I feel called upon to do is to point out how the verdicts of the Revisers stand at the present time, and, as nearly as I can, the exact shade of significance to be attached to the differences between the text and the margin.

"We are concerned at present more especially with the Greek original; and the only passages that really need comment are Matt. v. 32, and xix. 9. In the Revisers' Greek Text (as edited for the Oxford Press by Prof. Edwin Palmer) these verses stand as follows:—

"Matt. v. 32.—Ἐγὼ δὲ λέγω ὑμῖν, ὅτι πᾶς ὁ ἀπολύων τὴν γυναῖκα αὐτοῦ, παρεκτὸς λόγου πορνείας, ποιεῖ αὐτὴν μοιχευθῆναι· καὶ ὃς ἐὰν ἀπολελυμένην γαμήσῃ, μοιχᾶται.

"Matt. xix. 9.—Λέγω δὲ ὑμῖν, ὅτι ὃς ἂν ἀπολυσῃ τὴν γυναῖκα αὐτοῦ, (a) εἰ μὴ ἐπὶ πορνείᾳ, καὶ γαμήσῃ ἄλλην, μοιχᾶται· (b) καὶ ὁ ἀπολελυμένην γαμήσας μοιχᾶται.

"(a) παρεκτὸς λόγου πορνείας, ποιεῖ αὐτὴν μοιχευθῆναι. M.

"(b) om. καὶ ὁ ἀπολελυμένην γαμήσας μοιχᾶται. M.

"In saying that the Revisers' Greek Text might be safely followed, I did not mean that the best scholars at the present moment would exactly agree in all the minutiæ of wording, but only that none of the points that may be regarded as still in debate are such as to make any substantial difference to the sense. The Revisers expressly stated that they did not consider it within their province 'to construct a continuous and complete Greek Text.' Accordingly, the Oxford editor (Prof. E. Palmer) explains that he 'adhered closely to 'the text and orthography of Stephanus in all cases 'in which the Revisers did not express a preference 'for other readings.' Hence the framework in which the Revisers' deliberate corrections are set is simply a survival from the third edition of Stephanus published in 1550.

"Perhaps the best way to form an estimate of the present position of the Revisers' Greek Text will be to compare the relevant portions of that text as it stands with the results obtained by a few leading scholars. It will be better not to confuse the issues by giving the opinions of those who have not made to some extent a special study of Textual Criticism.

"TISCHENDORF, C.—The eighth edition of Tischendorf's Greek Testament, published in 1869–1872, is the quarry from which subsequent editors have derived most of their materials. It is a landmark in the history of the Greek Text.

"WESTCOTT, B. F., and HORT, F. J. A.—The critical edition of Westcott and Hort appeared almost simultaneously with the Revised Version in 1881, and has held a leading place among editions of the Greek Testament from that time to the present.

"WEISS, B.—The veteran scholar, Dr. Bernhard Weiss, published a continuous text of the Four Gospels in 1900, after many years of preliminary study, the first fruits of which appeared for St. Matthew in 1876. This edition probably does not allow sufficient weight to the evidence supplied by Versions and Fathers, but is based upon a close study of the Greek MSS. and of the classes of error to which they are liable.

"BLASS, F.—The accomplished classical scholar, F. Blass, towards the end of his life turned his attention to the New Testament and published texts of three Gospels and the Acts, that of St. Matthew in 1901. Blass was very fresh and independent in his methods, and represents a tendency rather opposed to that of Weiss.

"ZAHN, TH.—Dr. Theodor Zahn is perhaps the most learned of living commentators, and he has given considerable attention to textual criticism. His commentary on St. Matthew appeared in 1903.

"Comparing the readings adopted by these scholars with the Revisers' Text, we get the following results:—

"Matt. v. 32 (R.T.).—Ἐγὼ δὲ λέγω ὑμῖν, ὅτι πᾶς ὁ ἀπολύων τὴν γυναῖκα αὐτοῦ, παρεκτὸς λόγου πορνείας, ποιεῖ αὐτὴν μοιχευθῆναι· καὶ ὃς ἐὰν ἀπολελυμένην γαμήσῃ, μοιχᾶται.

"Blass and Zahn read ὃς ἂν ἀπολύσῃ for πᾶς ὁ ἀπολύων.

"Westcott and Hort bracket the last clause, καὶ ὃς ἐὰν ἀπολελυμένην γαμήσῃ μοιχᾶται, as possibly, though less probably, an addition to the original text.

"Both these readings, though not more widely adopted, deserve attention, because they are in accordance with tendencies at work in modern scholarship since the appearance of the Revised Version.

"Matt. xix. 9 (R.T.).—λέγω δὲ ὑμῖν, ὅτι ὃς ἂν ἀπολύσῃ τὴν γυναῖκα αὐτοῦ,[p] εἰ μὴ ἐπὶ πορνείᾳ, καὶ γαμήσῃ ἄλλην, μοιχᾶται. [q] καὶ ὁ ἀπολελυμένην γαμήσας μοιχᾶται.

"Marginal variants:—

"[p] παρεκτὸς λόγου πορνείας, ποιεῖ αὐτὴν μοιχευθῆναι.

"[q] Omit καὶ ὁ ἀπολελυμένην γαμήσας μοιχᾶται.

"All the scholars named above omit both ὅτι and εἰ: their other divergences from the text are all included in the two comprehensive alternatives offered by the Revisers in the margin. All omit the last clause, except that it has a place in the margin of Westcott and Hort. It will be seen that none of the variants, not even the last, materially affect the sense: and even if the possibility is recognised that the clause καὶ ὁ ἀπολελυμένην γαμήσας μοιχᾶται, as well as its equivalent in v. 32, should disappear from the First Gospel, it still remains standing in Luc. xvi. 18."

A. (cont.)—Then page 3, I might take as read—the New Testament passages.

38,483. Yes, I think we have all had an opportunity of reading them.

The following is the portion referred to:—

"II.—SYNOPTIC CRITICISM.

"At this point it seems desirable to set out in full the Revisers' text, which we accept with the slight modifications just mentioned, of all the passages under discussion. For convenience we add 1 Cor. vii. 10, 11.

"Mark x. 11, 12.—Ὃς ἐὰν ἀπολύσῃ τὴν γυναῖκα αὐτοῦ καὶ γαμήσῃ ἄλλην, μοιχᾶται ἐπ' αὐτήν· καὶ ἐὰν αὐτὴ ἀπολύσασα τὸν ἄνδρα αὐτῆς γαμήσῃ ἄλλον, μοιχᾶται.

"Matt. v. 32.—Ἐγὼ δὲ λέγω ὑμῖν, ὅτι πᾶς ὁ ἀπολύων τὴν γυναῖκα αὐτοῦ, παρεκτὸς λόγου πορνείας, ποιεῖ αὐτὴν μοιχευθῆναι· καὶ ὃς ἐὰν ἀπολελυμένην γαμήσῃ, μοιχᾶται.

"Matt. xix. 9.—Λέγω δὲ ὑμὶν, ὅτι ὃς ἂν ἀπολύσῃ τὴν γυναῖκα αὐτοῦ, εἰ μὴ ἐπὶ πορνείᾳ, καὶ γαμήσῃ ἄλλην, μοιχᾶται· καὶ ὁ ἀπολελυμένην γαμήσας μοιχᾶται,

"In the margin two alternatives are given: (1) for the clause εἰ μὴ ἐπὶ πορνείᾳ καὶ γαμήσῃ ἄλλην μοιχᾶται the alternative παρεκτὸς λόγου πορνείας ποιεῖ αὐτὴν μοιχευθῆναι: and (2) for the clause καὶ ὁ ἀπολελυμένην γαμήσας μοιχᾶται the alternative of omission of the clause.

"Luc. xvi. 18.—Πᾶς ὁ ἀπολύων τὴν γυναῖκα αὐτοῦ καὶ γαμῶν ἑτέραν μοιχεύει· καὶ ὁ ἀπολελυμένην ἀπὸ ἀνδρὸς γαμῶν μοιχεύει.

"1 Cor. vii. 10, 11.—Τοῖς δὲ γεγαμηκόσι παραγγέλλω, οὐκ ἐγὼ, ἀλλ' ὁ Κύριος, γυναῖκα ἀπὸ ἀνδρὸς μὴ χωρισθῆναι (ἐὰν δὲ καὶ χωρισθῇ, μενέτω ἄγαμος, ἢ τῷ ἀνδρὶ καταλλαγήτω), καὶ ἄνδρα γυναῖκα μὴ ἀφιέναι.

"Mark x. 11, 12.—Whosoever shall put away his wife, and marry another, committeth adultery against her: and if she herself shall put away her husband, and marry another, she committeth adultery.

"Matt. v. 32.—Everyone that putteth away his wife, saving for the cause of fornication, maketh her an adulteress; and whosoever shall marry her when she is put away committeth adultery.

"Matt. xix. 9.—Whosoever shall put away his wife, (3) except for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery: (4) and he that marrieth her when she is put away committeth adultery.

"In the margin there are the following notes:—

"(3) Some ancient authorities read saving for the cause of fornication, maketh her an adulteress: as in ch. v. 32.

"(4) The following words, to the end of the verse, are omitted by some ancient authorities.

"Luke xvi. 18.—Everyone that putteth away his wife, and marrieth another, committeth adultery: and he that marrieth one that is put away from a husband committeth adultery.

"1 Cor. vii. 10, 11.—But unto the married I give charge, yea not I, but the Lord, That the wife depart not from her husband (but if she depart, let her remain unmarried, or else be reconciled to her husband); and that the husband leave not his wife."

A. Then I go on at the bottom of page 3.—

"The relation of the first three Gospels to each other constitutes what is technically called the Synoptic Problem. And that problem is directly involved, in one of its more difficult branches, by the phenomena which the three Gospels present in the instance before us.

"Up to a certain point the verdict of critical scholars would be clear and practically unanimous. It is at the present time very widely held that our Gospel of St. Mark (or something very like it) lay before, and was used by, the other two evangelists. But if this position holds good, as the writer of this fully believes it does, its importance for the subject into which we are inquiring will be self-evident. It will follow that St. Mark represents the original which St. Matthew, and perhaps St. Luke, are (after their manner, i.e., not slavishly, but with a certain amount of freedom) reproducing."

I use the traditional names of the Evangelists, though I fully believe myself that Mark wrote the Gospel which bears his name and that St. Luke wrote the Gospel that bears his name. But with regard to St. Matthew, I think the Gospel incorporates what St. Matthew wrote but is not identical with it. It is a later editor who has made use of a document written by St. Matthew to which I refer below under its symbol Q.—

"So far as this relation extends, St. Mark is prior to the other two Gospels, and in authority takes precedence of them. But in St. Mark the prohibition of divorce is absolute, and in this respect the wording of St. Luke agrees, as also does the general tenor of the two verses of the First Epistle of Corinthians."

38,484. Need you read the next?—It is where they are derived from. I say the question as to St. Luke is the most complicated.

38,485. I think that is very clear?—Yes, I think that can be omitted.

38,486. Not omitted from the note but from your reading it?—Yes, if the members of the Commission will kindly bear in mind that there is some difficulty as to St. Luke, then the first conclusion is that where all three Gospels are extant the other two Evangelists are following St. Mark.

[The following is the passage referred to:—

"It is a question of considerable and unusual difficulty to determine exactly from what source St. Luke derived his brief precept. The chapter in which it occurs consists for the most part of matter peculiar to the Third Evangelist, and therefore, as we should naturally suppose, is drawn from a source to which he alone had access. The first thirteen verses of the chapter are taken up with the parable of the Unjust Steward and the discourse to which it gave occasion. The last thirteen verses are taken up with the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus. The intervening paragraph consists of five verses, of which the first two are peculiar and describe the attitude of the Pharisees. The remaining three (including the verse with which we are more immediately concerned, Luke xvi. 18) are as many curiously disconnected scraps, which appear to have broken loose from their original moorings. All three present a loose resemblance to passages from different contexts in St. Matthew. Only one—our verse—seems to have a direct parallel in St. Mark, though the not very common word εὐκοπώτερον, which occurs in the second passage, appears to be Marcan. In these circumstances it is not easy to be sure whether St. Luke is drawing from the same source as St. Matthew, or from St. Mark, or from neither of these but from some special source of his own. The difficulty of deciding is increased if we do not read καὶ ὃς ἐὰν ἀπολελυμένην γαμήσῃ μοιχᾶται in Matt. v. 32. Sir John Hawkins (in an essay as yet unpublished) has argued that in this part of his Gospel St. Luke does not make use of St. Mark, and that the parallel is to be sought rather in St. Matthew. But I do not think that he would regard the conclusion as stringent. I am afraid that with our present data the question must be left open."]

A. (cont.)—"The second main conclusion"—not so universally accepted as the first—

"which has a wide currency among scholars, is the existence of a further document which formed the common ground of those portions of St. Matthew and St. Luke which have no parallel in St. Mark. The symbol by which this hypothetical document is now usually designated is Q. It should be clearly understood that this second hypothetical document has not so large a consensus of opinion in its favour as the first. It may claim a majority of suffrages, but not an overwhelming majority. At the same time, a view which has the support of scholars so diverse in antecedents and tendency as Harnack, Wellhausen, and H. J. Holtzmann in Germany, Loisy in France, the Dean of Westminster, Sir John Hawkins, Professors Stanton and Burkitt, the late Dr. George Salmon, and Sir W. M. Ramsay in this country, is clearly one that deserves serious attention

I do not include in the list Bernhard and Johannes Weiss or W. C. Allen, because, although accepting the theory in part, they do so in somewhat different forms.

"Wellhausen and Harnack took opposite sides in their estimate of the historical value of this document; but by far the majority go with Harnack in rating it very highly. Many believe it to have been the actual work of the Apostle St. Matthew, the extensive use of which gave its title to the First Gospel."

Perhaps, I might say, it is rather a paradox, but still both Dr. Salmon and Sir William Ramsay have thrown out the idea, that it was written actually during the lifetime of our Lord. I am afraid that is a little too optimistic, but still I believe it to be very early and very valuable.

38,487. Which do you mean was written, according to their view, in the lifetime of our Lord—Q or the Gospel as we have it?—No, Q.

38,488. (Sir William Anson.) That would make Q anterior to St. Mark?—Yes, and I confess myself I think it is anterior to St. Mark—

"The starting point for the hypothesis of the existence of this document was the considerable amount of agreement between St. Matthew and St. Luke in sections not found in St. Mark, and the only sure ground for referring a section to this document is its occurrence in both Gospels. But just as in the case of the other document, a section might be wanting in one of the same two Gospels, St. Matthew and St. Luke, without disproving its presence in the original document—one of the two writers might for reasons of his own omit to use it—so in regard to this second document a section might drop out of one of the two later Gospels and be preserved only in the other. This might be the case, though it could not be so clearly proved as where the original itself is extant.

"This drawback exists in regard to the passage Matt. v. 31, 32. It cannot be proved, but the possibility should, I think, be distinctly contemplated, that these two verses (with or without the restricting clause) belonged originally to the second document Q. The discourse that we call the Sermon on the Mount was one of the most conspicuous features in this document. Now, the long section, Matt. v. 21–48 —a succession of paragraphs, each beginning 'Ye 'have heard that it was said to them of old time' (or the like) six times repeated—clearly hangs together. Only portions of the whole have direct parallels in St. Luke (Matt. v. 25, 26, Luke xii. 57–59; Matt. v. 39–48 = Luke 27–36, but in broken order). If this section did not come from Q, it came from a source very like Q."

38,489. (Chairman). Perhaps we might treat the small print as foot-notes as it were?—Yes. Perhaps I might just say that Sir John Hawkins, whose opinion is very valuable, gives a list of the portions where St. Matthew and St. Luke are parallel to each other, which is the main basis of Q, or of the reconstruction of Q; and then this very section of St. Matthew he places as next in order, as standing first with regard to the probability that it was part of Q. of all the other sections which occur only in one Gospel.

38,490. Is his work published with any title that we could ourselves see?—A work of his is published called "Horæ Synopticæ"; a second edition has already been issued. The reference in this document of mine to an unpublished book will soon not be applicable as it is nearly on the point of being published. It is a collection of essays bearing on the Synoptic Problem and it will be called "Studies in the Synoptic Problem."

The following is the Note referred to:—

"Of the writers who indicate the source of each section, Johannes Weiss assigns the whole to Q, and Allen to his equivalent for Q (with some suggestion of editing in vv. 22, 33–37). Harnack refers portions to Q, including v. 32—but without the crucial words παρεκτὸς λόγου πορνείας. Sir John Hawkins (in the unpublished essay of which I have spoken) 'would place Matt. v. 17–48 by itself as a section which we may 'regard as more likely to have formed part of Q than 'any other which is found only in a single Gospel'."

38,491. Then at the top of page 5—

A.—"I do not feel that I can press the point; but on the other hand I do not think that those who take a different view can exclude the possibility that the verses we are discussing belong to Q.

"If we apply the stricter method which is characteristic of cautious investigators like Sir John C. Hawkins, we must treat Matt. v. 31, 32 as coming under the head of matter peculiar to the First Evangelist. And, unfortunately for our purpose, this peculiar matter of the First Gospel is probably the part of the whole Synoptic Question which is at the present moment in the most backward condition. So far I have been able to appeal to a considerable amount of consensus, but at this point scholars are consciously feeling their way."

38,492. Then the next is chiefly footnote again, if I may call it so, which will all be printed. May we then pass on to No. III.?—If I may say so I am not clear if it would be right to omit some references to the portion that follows. The reason is, it is an attempt to form something of an induction as to the value of these insertions which we get in the First Gospel—of these insertions in the main tenor of the Gospel of St. Mark.

38,493. I did not mean it should be omitted. It will be printed, but I do not want to give you the trouble of reading it through. This will all be printed. Perhaps we might pass on to No. III.

(Lord Guthrie.) Sir Lewis points out that if he read the first paragraph and then the last one in small print on page 6 it might be better.

38,494. (Chairman.) Might I relieve you by reading the first paragraph and the last paragraph?—Thank you.

Chairman.—"The list of portions peculiar to St. Matthew is drawn out at length by W. C. Allen (Comm. on St. Matthew, Edinburgh, 1907), and occupies nearly three pages (pp. l-liii). The main point to be apprehended about it is that it is by no means homogeneous. A number of points, occurring especially towards the end of the Gospel (such as xxvii. 3-10, Judas and the blood money; 19, the message of Pilate's wife; 24, 25, Pilate washing his hands; 51b-53, the resurrection of the dead saints; 62–66, the sealing of the tomb; xxviii. 11–15, the bribing of the guard) are among those in which least confidence can be placed and which look most like the accretions of oral tradition. On the other hand, we cannot forget that the peculiar matter of St. Matthew includes much of the Sermon on the Mount and a series of parables (the Tares; the Hid Treasure; the Precious Pearl; the Draw Net; the Labourers in the Vineyard; the Two Sons; the Marriage Feast; the Ten Virgins; the Sheep and the Goats). Not all of these parables are perhaps quite on the same footing. Several of them are challenged, especially by continental critics. We cannot go into that question here. But, speaking generally, these portions of the Gospel carry with them a considerable presumption of genuineness. There is an intermediate class of passages, such as the two sections, xvi. 17–19, and xviii. 16–20 (the only places in the Gospels where reference is made to 'the Church') in which many critics suspect the influence of later ideas.

"It is to be observed that in Matt. xix. 9, the words 'except for fornication' are inserted in the course of a section taken generally from St. Mark. Insertions of this kind are fairly common. It may be worth while to give a few examples, so as to show their general character." (Then the examples are given.)

[The following are the examples referred to:—

"(a) In the incident of the disciples plucking the ears of corn (Matt. xii. 1–8 = Mark ii. 23–28 = Luke vi. 1–5) after the argument from the precedent of David, Matt. adds the following:—

> "'Or have ye not read in the law, how that on the Sabbath day the priests in the temple profane the Sabbath, and are guiltless? But I say unto you, that One greater than the temple is here. But if ye had known what this meaneth, I desire mercy, and not sacrifice, ye would not have condemned the guiltless' (vv. 5–7).

"This breaks the thread of the narrative in Mark; it is wanting in Luke, but is probably a genuine saying (or combination of sayings) brought in from another context. In favour of its genuineness may be urged, (1) the real parallelism with what had just preceded, which was the reason for the Evangelist introducing it here; (2) the comparison of 'One greater than the temple' with 'a greater than Jonah, greater than Solomon,' in xii. 41, 42 (Q); and lastly, (3) the resemblance of 'if ye had known what this meaneth' to ix. 13 'go ye and learn what this meaneth.' It is possible that the inserted verses may come from Q. If not, the substance of them is confirmed by its triple parallelism, to Mark, Q, and some other source unknown.

"(b) There is a very similar insertion in the next section, Matt. xii. 11, 12:—

> "'What man shall there be of you, that shall have one sheep, and if this fall into a pit on the Sabbath day, will he not lay hold on it, and lift it out? How much then is a man of more value than a sheep!'

"There is something very like this in Luke xiv. 5 (cf. Luke xiii. 15). We may infer that either the passage comes from Q or it is supported by Q.

"(c) The verse Matt. xv. 14 presumably comes from Q (= Luke vi. 39). It is preceded by two verses:—

> "'Then came the disciples and said unto Him, Knowest thou that the Pharisees were offended, when they heard this saying? But He answered and said, Every plant which my heavenly Father planted not, shall be rooted up.'

"So far as form goes, these verses might come from Q; but neither their source nor their genuineness can be verified.

"(d) In the story of the Syrophoenician woman three verses (23–25) are peculiar to Matt.:—

> "'But He answered her not a word. And His disciples came and besought Him, saying, Send her away; for she crieth after us. But He answered and said, I was not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel. But she came and worshipped Him, saying, Lord help me.'

"These verses are a problem, and a difficult one. In any case we may endorse Montefiore's comment 'If Loisy is right, and these verses are editorial, they 'show wonderful art.' But it is difficult in the extreme to regard them as simply editorial (i.e., inserted at the last revision, when the Gospel was sent out, after A.D. 70). What motive would an editor at that date have for interpolating such a sentence as 'I was not sent but unto the lost sheep of 'the house of Israel,' when the rejection of Israel was complete and the Church consisted mainly of Gentiles? On the contrary, the verse bears the strongest marks of antiquity and originality. Only during our Lord's lifetime and in the earliest years of the Christian community would it be possible to write in such a way. It is important to note the parallel to this saying in Matt. x. 5, 6 'Go not into the way of the Gentiles, 'and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not: 'But go rather to the lost sheep of the house of 'Israel." It is conceivable that the one insertion was suggested by the other. But we may be confident that one at least rests on good—the very best—authority. I should myself be inclined to say this of both.

"And then it must be remembered that the case is very similar to that more immediately before us. Matt. xix. 9 points back to v. 32 in exactly the same sort of way in which xv. 24 points back to x. 5, 6. This is of the greatest significance for the whole problem with which we have to deal.

"(e) Another important example arises out of the famous passage which contains the blessing pronounced on St. Peter (Matt. xvi. 16–19).

> "'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. And Jesus answered and said unto him, Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-Jonah: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven. And I also say unto thee, that thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church; and the gates of Hades shall not prevail against it. I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven.'*

"It is true that the passage contains what is supposed to be the tell-tale word 'church.' But, as Mr. Allen admirably brings out—

> "'The Jewish colouring in these sayings is very remarkable; 'flesh and blood,' 'my Father which is in heaven,' 'gates of Hades,' 'keys,' 'kingdom of heaven,' the 'binding' and 'loosing,' the literary contrast of 'earth' and 'heaven,' were probably all commonplaces of Jewish theological thought. The single word 'church' alone lies open to the suspicion of betraying Christian influence, and it may easily be explained as representing a more specifically Jewish or less Christian word.'"

"As to the last point, it is enough to note that the word occurs nearly a hundred times in the Septuagint. Not only is the rest of the vocabulary essentially Jewish, but it must come from a quarter in which the Jewish origin and relations of Christianity were strongly marked, i.e., from a source near to the fountain head.

"(f) The healing of the Epileptic Boy (Mark ix. 14–29 = Matt. xvii. 14–20 = Luke ix. 37–43) is considerably abridged in both Matt. and Luke. But Matt. ends—

> "'And He saith unto them, Because of your little faith: for I say unto you, If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place; and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible unto you" (where Mark has, "And He said unto them, This kind can come out by nothing, save by prayer.'"

"The additional saying in Matt. is a doublet with Matt. xxi. 21 (= Mark xi. 23). Comparing Luke xvii. 5, 6, we should naturally infer that it was brought in here from Q.

"(g) To the passage Matt. xviii. 6–9 (= Mark ix. 42–48 = Luke xvii. 1, 2) Matt. adds the beautiful saying Matt. xviii. 10—

> "'See that ye despise not one of these little ones; for I say unto you, that in heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven."

"Here again both idea and language are very Jewish.

"(h) The same may be said of the addition in Matt. xix. 28:—

> "'And Jesus said unto them, Verily I say unto you, that ye which have followed me, in the regeneration when the Son of Man shall sit on the throne of His glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel.'"

"This too has a very primitive look, and goes with (d), (e) above. Compare Luke xxii. 28–30, which is perhaps a similar passage from another source.

"(i) Nearly the whole of the following (Matt. xxi. 14–16) is additional or varied matter:—

> "'And the blind and the lame came to Him in the temple: and He healed them. But when the chief priests and the scribes saw the wonderful things that He did, and the children that were crying in the temple and saying, Hosanna to the

* All but the first four words of this passage is an addition to St. Mark (St. Luke has—"the Christ of God").

Son of David; they were moved with indignation, and said unto Him, Hearest thou what these are saying? And Jesus said unto them, Yea: did ye never read, Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise?'"

"This perhaps belongs (as may v. 11 of the same chapter) to the special tradition (which may have been oral) from which Matt. introduces added details in his narrative of the Passion.

"Mr. Allen notes a curious tendency in this Evangelist to substitute 'a statement of healing' for Mark's 'statement of teaching' (as in xiv. 14, xix. 2). This is a striking, and indeed an extreme, example of the freedom with which the later editor sometimes altered the text that lay before him."

Chairman (continuing).—Then we get to the last paragraph—

"All the above are cases of insertion or addition where the First Evangelist is following the general tenor of the narrative of St. Mark. As literary workmanship, the marks of suture are sometimes apparent; the Evangelist did not hesitate to transfer material from one context to another, and upon occasion, to squeeze it into its place somewhat roughly. But, upon the whole, if we examine the above examples one by one, I think that we shall form a favourable estimate of the quality of the new material. The most vulnerable point in his procedure is that which has just been mentioned, the laxity which allowed him to speak of 'healing' where the authority before him spoke of 'teaching.' There is quite a fair presumption that some of the material comes from Q, which is very probably the best authority we have. If it does not come from Q, it is supported by parallels from Q or from Mark, which is even better, because in that case we have two coincident authorities instead of one. I would not in all cases at once infer that the words as they stand were actually spoken by our Lord. In many cases I fully believe that they were. But even where one cannot be quite confident of this, the impression made is that the source employed is early and good. With that general impression we must perhaps be content.

"I have so far been trying to test analogous cases to that more immediately before us, of insertions by Matt. in the narrative of Mark. I must now go on to deal at closer quarters with the particular data that are the subject of our inquiry, and I shall have to try to answer the ultimate question whether, or how far, they can be traced up to the authority of our Lord Himself."

38,495. (Sir William Anson.) Might I ask whether these cases of insertion or addition is what is meant by interpolation on page 1, Dr. Sanday"?—They might be so described.

(Chairman.) Perhaps you would like to know how that word happened to be used. It was a letter which was sent originally to Dr. Turner, and then afterwards it was taken up by Dr. Sanday, in which the secretary wrote that a commission had been appointed, and giving the terms of its appointment, and stating that "certain points have now arisen as the result of "evidence that has been given or is about to be given "before the commissioners which renders it desirable "that the commissioners should have before them an "exposition by some person of pre-eminent authority "on the following among other points," and several points are set out, and amongst others, "The correct "view entertained by textual critics on the possible "interpolation, and the exception of adultery or "fornication in St. Matthew's Gospel." That was only using a word which had been used by one of the witnesses before. There are several points mentioned here on which Dr. Sanday was asked, later on, to give evidence.

(Witness.) I may say it is very common. It is often described as an interpolation, only I mean we ought to know exactly what is meant by it.

38,496. (Sir Willlam Anson.) Then it is an introduction by the Evangelist into the text of St. Mark?—Yes, an addition to St. Mark by the Evangelist himself.

38,497. (Chairman.) Then:—

"III.—Higher Criticism and Exegesis.

A.—"I need not say that this last step is the most delicate, the most difficult, and the most responsible of all.

"The position at which we stand is this. It is sufficiently clear that in St. Mark, one of our primary authorities, our Lord is represented as forbidding divorce absolutely. St. Luke has a single verse, the origin of which is not quite certain, to the same effect. St. Paul, who in this case is something more than a witness to the usage of the Christian community because he expressly quotes his master, also states the general principle without qualification. This leaves only the two passages of St. Matthew as evidence for the existence of any qualification. We shall have, before we have done, to consider how far in any case the four authorities can be reconciled. But as a preliminary to this, we must first ascertain what sort of weight is to be attached to the two clauses in the First Gospel standing where they do. The first passage, it may be well to remind ourselves, may "—

I confess I think, myself, probably it did—

"in the main come from Q—we shall have to consider that possibility somewhat further; the second passage is certainly in the main based on St. Mark. The qualifying clause in the first case is the expression παρεκτὸς λόγου πορνείας, in the second μὴ ἐπὶ πορνείᾳ.

"Now it would be true to say that most critical scholars regard these qualifying clauses as due to the Evangelist himself, and not found by him in his sources."

That is what is meant by "interpolation."

"This view is expressed by Mr. Allen with so much conciseness, clearness and precision that I shall venture to quote his comment in full, and to let it stand as representing critical opinion generally."

Would it be wished that I should read the next?

38,498.—Q. If you please.

A.—"λόγου πορν είας is probably equivalent to the Hebrew 'something unchaste,' which the school of Shammai decreed to be the only ground of divorce; cf. Gittin 90[1], 'No one shall divorce his wife unless there be found in her something unchaste. πορνεία defines the unchastity as illicit sexual intercourse. It is, however, open to question whether this exception is not an addition of the editor, representing no doubt two influences, viz., Jewish custom and tradition, and the exigencies of ethical necessity in the early Christian Church. A similar exception is made in xix. 9, and it will there be seen that the clause is clearly an interpolation."

The exact expression is used by Mr. Allen.

"There is, therefore, a presumption that it has also been interpolated here. Moreover, the teaching of Christ as recorded by St. Mark (x. 11) seems to preclude any such exception. And St. Luke represents His teaching as a simple prohibition of divorce without reservation (xvi. 18). The same may be said of St. Paul's account of Christ's teaching, 1 Cor. vii. 10, 11."

"It will be seen that the reasoning of this passage is very decided and very rapid; it takes a straight course, without much looking either to the right hand or to the left for other possibilities than those that are followed. And this characteristic hangs together with a general tendency in Biblical exegesis at the present time. This tendency is accounted for by the history of the study in recent years. When once it came to be understood that the Bible was to be investigated by the same methods as other books, Biblical students hastened to give proof of their fidelity to this canon by rather catching at the first explanation that suggested itself as being the most natural and the most probable. And yet it is matter of experience that this is by no means always the case."

I mean the primâ facie view is not always the true view.

"In deliberate work there has to be a good deal of weighing of competing probabilities. And it is a question whether such weighing ought not to be encouraged to a greater extent than it has been in the recent past.

"I will venture to illustrate what I mean by an attempt to apply the principle in the two cases before us—Matt. v. 32 and xix. 9.

"I must confess to a belief myself that at least the main body of v. 32 is derived from Q. We have not the advantage of access to a clear parallel in St. Luke; and therefore we cannot treat this as a settled conclusion. But I have argued above that the whole or the greater part of the lengthy section —Matt. v. 21–48—must be taken together as continuous and homogeneous. The successive paragraphs of which it is composed are all constructed upon the same plan; and this plan appears to be carried through simply and without forcing.

"But if that is so, then the first question that we have to ask is whether the clause 'saving for the cause of fornication' is to be taken with the rest or not. There are three possibilities: (i) that this clause was an integral part of the text of the document (Q?) from which the verse was taken; (ii) that it comes from some other (written or possibly oral) source; (iii) that it was introduced by the Evangelist at the last revision (when the Gospel was published) as a concession to Jewish usage and the pressure of human weakness. The last explanation, as we have seen, is that usually given. But I greatly doubt whether it deserves so clear a preference over the other two. What we have so far collected as to the habits of the Evangelist would be all in favour of his having some authority to go upon external to himself."

I might say the evidences of that were in the portions I did not read on pages 5 and 6.

"I quite agree that he has added the corresponding clause 'except for fornication' in Matt. xix. 9; and it would be quite in keeping with his practice elsewhere to make the insertion on the strength of some earlier passage like v. 32. It is clear that he himself attached considerable importance to the qualification; and I do not think that he would have introduced it without external warrant. It may be thought that this is a subjective impression; but it has at least a basis of analogy in the list of examples that we went through. And I am less ready than some are to believe that a private member of the Church (for the last editor of the Gospel was quite anonymous) would have inserted a condition of so much importance purely of his own motion.

"It is doubtless true that the parallel in Luke xvi. 18 may be used as an argument for supposing that the source from which the First Evangelist drew was originally without the limiting clause. But this inference is precarious on many grounds. It assumes not only that both Evangelists are using the same source, but that St. Luke had the source open before him, and is quoting from it verbally. It is by no means certain that this is the case. We have seen in what a curious way the three disconnected verses which present parallels to St. Matthew are introduced in the midst of matter that appears to have an altogether different origin.

I think that has reference to a passage omitted, but in the xvith Luke, which begins with a long parable and ends with a long parable, both peculiar to St. Luke, and which come from what I believe to have been the special sources to which he had access, and inserted in the middle there, are three rather disconnected verses, the origin of which is somewhat puzzling.

"But, even if St. Luke is quoting from Q and is not quoting from memory, he may be influenced by his recollection of Mark x. 11, 12. The saying in its Matthaean form is specifically Jewish, and it is characteristic of St. Luke in the main body of his narrative to pass over these Jewish touches."

He was a Gentile himself, and more familiar with the Greek world than the Jewish, as also his readers would presumably be—

"Thus, in the Sermon on the Mount, he omits such verses as Matt. v. 22–24 (Jewish expressions of anger, and the gift at the altar); v. 34, 35 (Jewish forms of swearing); vi. 2 (Jewish modes of almsgiving); vi. 16 (Jewish modes of fasting;)"

All that in the Sermon on the Mount; and in St. Mark vii., an important passage, he omits the whole section—

"on 'the tradition of the elders.'

"We pass on to Matt. xix. 9. Here 'except for fornication' is confessedly an insertion in the text of St. Mark. But I do not like, without more ado, to call it an 'interpolation,' because such a name begs the question by assuming that the Evangelist inserted it with no other authority than his own. It would, to my mind, be much easier to believe that he found his warrant in the source of v. 32."

38,499. Why is the word "confessedly" used there?—I mean that I should confess it myself, and I think all scholars would agree that the primary authority in that section is St. Mark—

"But there is another alternative; and it is upon this alternative that I desire to lay some stress. It seems to me that this verse (Matt. xix. 9) should not be separated from the three which follow immediately upon it (vv. 10–12). It may be well to print the whole passage continuously, bracketing those portions which come from St. Mark:—

9. "['And I say unto you,
'Whosoever shall put away his wife,']" that is from St. Mark—"except for fornication"—that is an insertion—

"[and shall marry another,
"committeth adultery:
"and he that marrieth her when she is put away
"committeth adultery.]"

that is from St. Mark. Then what follows is peculiar—

10. "The disciples say unto Him: If the case of
11. the man is so with his wife, it is not
12. expedient to marry. But he said unto them, All men cannot receive this saying, but they to whom it is given. For there are eunuchs, which were so born from their mother's womb: and there are eunuchs, which were made eunuchs by men: and there are eunuchs, which made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake. He that is able to receive it, let him receive it."

"We cannot help seeing that the added paragraph (vv. 10–12) is similar in moral tendency to the inserted clause. A new and profound question is raised; and in the answer that He gives to that question our Lord certainly does take account of human weakness. If He does in the one case, it is fair to presume that He would also in the other.

"The next question that we have to ask ourselves is, What are the probabilities that the added incident and saying are historical?

"I see that Mr. Allen refers the saying to the source which is his equivalent for Q; but the two verses which lead up to it he marks as supplied by the editor. But he does not seem to have noticed—what is pointed out by Wellhausen, though with a different motive—that there is a rather remarkable parallel to these verses a little later in the chapter. In the discourse about Riches (vv. 23–26) very much the same kind of objection is brought by the disciples, and very much the same kind of answer is given by our Lord. The principle is laid down that 'it is 'easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye, 'than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of 'God.' This too is a 'hard saying'; and the disciples ask in astonishment, 'Who then can be saved?' And just as in the previous case our Lord had replied that there were certain persons who had an exceptional gift from God, so here He replied that God could make possible, what with men was impossible.

"There is yet another parallel—also noticed by Wellhausen, though again with a different intention (W. regards the expressions in xix. 10–12 as invented by the Evangelist 'on the model' of the parallels quoted). This second parallel is between xix. 11, 'All men cannot receive this saying, but they to whom it is given,' and xx. 23, 'To sit on My right 'hand, and on My left hand, is not Mine to give, 'but it is for them for whom it has been prepared 'of My Father.' The second passage is an almost exact reproduction of St. Mark, and therefore contributes the high and independent authority of that Gospel.

"These two coincidences, taken with the deep originality of the saying, seem to put a stamp of authenticity on the verses in which they occur.

"But if we may accept the new material of xix. 10, 12 as authentic, some light is reflected back from this upon xix. 9. It is clear that, when the First Evangelist wrote this verse, he had other matter in his mind bearing upon a kindred subject. The question is therefore suggested to us whether there may not have been something in the same source which led him to insert the restrictive clause.

"Thus a second explanation becomes possible of the origin of that clause. It may be a paraphrastic repetition of v. 32, or it may be derived from the new source which the Evangelist is just going to use. Between these alternatives we have not the means of deciding positively. But it seems to me that in any case the probability is increased that the Evangelist had some definite authority behind him, and that he is not merely drawing upon his own invention.

"One more inference from this same paragraph appears to be of importance, viz., that (as I have put it) our Lord did condescend to take account of human weakness. He had not one fixed and absolute standard to be applied to all persons upon all subjects."

"He clearly contemplates three classes you see. 'There are eunuchs which were so born from their 'mother's womb; and there are eunuchs which were 'made eunuchs by men; and there are eunuchs which 'made themselves eunuchs,' which seems to imply different grades of obligations.

"No doubt it would be hazardous to lay too much stress upon this; the principles of morals cannot be raised or lowered at will. But there are certain great and elemental facts that a wise legislator will bear in mind. He will not strain the powers of human nature to the point of breaking.

"This consideration brings me to the last question with which in this part of the subject I feel called upon to deal. We are now confronted directly with the necessity of deciding (so far as it is possible for us to decide) upon the probabilities as to what our Lord really said and meant.

"Now, I am well aware that this is often treated as a sharp alternative. Did our Lord speak in the terms attributed to Him by St. Mark, St. Luke, and St. Paul? Or did he speak substantially in the sense of the two passages from the Gospel of St. Matthew? We are invited to make an absolute choice between these propositions.

"I may be wrong; I have been charged before this with a tendency to combine things that are really incompatible. I am certainly tempted to incur this risk on the present occasion. I ask myself whether it is not possible that our Lord might in certain circumstances and under certain conditions lay down a principle of general application, and in other circumstances and under other conditions state that principle with a certain amount of restriction. I should myself be inclined to answer this question in the affirmative. The difference seems to me to be between a positive rule and a moral ideal. To me it appears to be quite possible and not really inconsistent, on the one hand to state a principle in broad and general terms, and, on the other hand, when it became a question of translating that principle into a definite concrete rule to import into it a certain amount of limitation.

"But, indeed, when we come to look into the matter, there is no need to state this view tentatively and apologetically; it is absolutely forced upon us by the immediate context of one of the leading passages that we are considering.

"Matt, v. 27–32 deals with the question of Adultery and Divorce. The next section of the Sermon on the Mount, Matt. v. 33–37, deals with the question of Oaths. That which follows Matt. v. 38–41 (comp. Luke vi. 29), deals with resistance to injuries; and the concluding verse of the paragraph, Matt. v. 42 (comp. Luke vi. 30) is concerned with Borrowing and Giving. Now, it is universally recognised that the last two precepts cannot be literally and absolutely applied to present-day conditions. They represent the Christian ideal, the inner Christian spirit, not a literal rule of law. And as a matter of fact, the legislation, even of Christian nations, has been compelled to disregard them. And even St. Paul distinctly recognises that the civil magistrate 'beareth not the sword in vain: 'for he is a minister of God, an avenger for wrath 'to him that doeth evil' (Rom. xiii. 4).

"Similarly in regard to Swearing: the precept in the Sermon is not held to be inconsistent with the administration of an oath in courts of law. Our Lord Himself responded to the adjuration of the high priest (Matt. xxvi. 63); and again we find strong language in the mouth of St. Paul: 'I say 'the truth in Christ, I lie not, my conscience 'beareth witness with me in the Holy Ghost' (Rom. ix. 1); 'I call God for a witness upon my 'soul, that to spare you I forebore to come unto 'Corinth' (2 Cor. i. 23); 'As the truth of Christ is in 'me, no man shall stop me of this glorying' (2 Cor. 'xi. 10); 'The God and Father of the Lord Jesus, 'He who is blessed for evermore, He knoweth that 'I lie not' (2 Cor. xi. 31); 'Now touching the 'things which I write unto you, behold, before God, 'I lie not' (Gal. ii. 20).

"In all these cases we have the indubitable juxtaposition of a lofty unqualified ideal with the admission of a lower or different standard in practice. Can we regard the question of Marriage and Divorce as standing upon a different footing from these other cases which all occur in the same context? I do not think we can.

It may be well to remind ourselves that there are two distinct questions: (1) Does the use by our Lord of unqualified language on one occasion absolutely preclude the possibility that He should have used qualified language upon another? and (2) Does the recognition by Christians of a lofty and unqualified moral ideal of necessity prevent a Christian State from legislating (as it were) upon a lower level? For myself, I should feel compelled to answer both these questions in the negative.

"I am free to confess that this result is clearer and more decided than I had myself anticipated. I am also afraid that it runs more counter to the general feeling among conscientious Churchmen. It seems to me, however, to follow directly from the method pursued and from the state of the data. The determining considerations are two: (1) I have throughout felt that, even upon critical grounds, the form of the precept in the First Gospel could not lightly be put aside. And (2) this conclusion seems to be confirmed, and the whole question assumes a different aspect, when once we call to mind the nature of these elevated sayings and their relation to practice. They are addressed to the Christian conscience as such, and the appeal to them is an appeal to that conscience. But legislation by the Civil Power is a different matter; and obedience to the Civil Power comes under the head of rendering to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and does not clash with duty towards God. The individual Christian (whether cleric or layman) is free to apply, and ought to apply, the highest standard to his own conduct; he is free to use, and he ought to use, all his powers of persuasion to induce others to adopt for themselves the same standard. But when it becomes a question of passing judgment upon others and of enforcing that judgment by the arm of the law, the lower standard is the right one."

Of course I ought to say that is only my own opinion.

38,500. I do not think you need read the appendix; that will be printed?—It does affect the main issue in one respect, my Lord. An alternative view is given of the whole question by Mr. Montefiore in his recent book, "A Commentary on the Synoptic Gospels." Perhaps I might summarise it in this way. I have been trying to set the version in St. Matthew by the side of the version in St. Mark, and to maintain that they are not absolutely incompatible with each other. Mr. Montefiore would explain St. Mark practically on the lines of St. Matthew. It sounds a little paradoxical, but on this ground—on the ground that with the Jews at the time of course the proper punishment for adultery was not divorce but death. Of course that comes out in the paragraph on the adulteress which is an interpolation in the Fourth Gospel; "It is commanded of the law to stone such," so that Mr. Montefiore thinks that St. Mark put aside the case of adultery in the wife, and that he took it for granted, and therefore did not set it down.

The following is the Appendix referred to:—

"APPENDIX.

"It may be worth while to print as an Appendix comments by two writers, one of which presents an alternative view to that taken above, while the other illustrates the view taken with much force and precision.

"I observe that Mr. C. G. Montefiore (The Synoptic Gospels, i. 235 f.), having in his mind the methods of Jewish exegesis, does not regard the passages in St. Matthew as qualifying the general precept in St. Mark, but rather interprets this general precept in the sense of St. Matthew, supposing that the case of adultery is tacitly understood and excluded. He writes as follows:—

> 'The version of this section in Mark differs in important respects from the version in Matthew (xix. 1–12). In Mark the question is asked quite generally, "May a man divorce his wife?" In Matthew the question is, "May a man for any reason divorce her?" In other words, the question there is, What attitude does Jesus take up on the point at issue between Hillel and Shammai? The parallel passages (Matt. v. 31, 32; Luke xvi. 18) must also be taken into account.
> 'At first sight it might seem as if Mark can only then be supposed to give the more original and accurate report of what Jesus really said, if W[ellhausen]'s interpretation of Mark be accepted. That interpretation robs the difference between Matthew and Mark of any considerable importance. It assumes that Jesus did not mean to say that, even if a woman had committed adultery, she must not be divorced, and that in the lifetime of that guilty woman the guiltless husband must never marry again. It supposes that adultery was not in question. For though Shammai held that unchastity ought to be the only ground for divorce, there is no reason to suppose that the ordinary custom and law from the earliest period onward had not been in accordance with the opinion of Hillel, namely, that a man was able to send his wife away for a number of reasons unconnected with unchastity. Adultery was a separate affair, which was not dealt with by anything so mild as a mere bill of divorce. The penalty of adultery was death.
> . . . .
> 'On this view the discussion in Mark must be supposed to exclude adultery, though it does not mention adultery. Matthew, to avoid any unclearness, adds words which make adultery the exception to the general canon which Jesus lays down.'

"It must be confessed that this view seems to be also very tenable. According to it, St. Mark's silence would be due to the fact that the proper punishment for adultery was, not divorce, but death.

"The following is taken from a Commentary on the Gospels by Dr. J. B. McClellan (London, 1875). The italics and capitals are in the original:—

> 'Our Lord deals with the case presented in the cited Mosaic Law (Deut. 24. 1–3), viz., the case of the husband. He does not deal, except by inference, with the case of the wife. Moreover, he expressly excepts from the general sentence the ground of fornication. With this proviso he condemns first divorce on the part of a husband; next, marriage with a woman divorced by her husband. But, except, as we have said, inferentially, these decisions do not rule the distinct case of an innocent wife seeking and obtaining a divorce from an adulterous husband. Wordsworth therefore (like Jerome, Chrysostom, the Romish Church, al.) is not warranted in saying that "in "no case does our Lord permit a person to marry "a woman who has been divorced." Further, the decisions of our Lord ("causeth her to commit adultery, &c.") are based on the assumed fact that a new marriage of the woman, as well as of the man, is the natural and divinely permitted consequence of a divorce from the old cohabitation (cf. Mt. 19. 3–12; 1 Cor. 7. 2–9, 15). Fornication, then, of the wife is expressly declared by the Lord to be an allowable cause (albeit the sole one) for the husband's complete dissolution of the marriage bond: the guilty wife may be divorced, the innocent husband be thus set free, and, being free, as a matter of course, and by the original and unrevoked ordinance of God, may marry. Next, inferentially, we argue from the Lord's declared mind in the case of the husband to his undeclared mind in the case of the wife. On the general principles of divine justice and Christian equality, there being no special direction of the Lord to the contrary, there must be understood to exist the same law and the same permission for the wife as for the husband: the guilty husband may be divorced, the innocent wife be thus set free, and, being free, may marry (cf. S. Aug. de Conjug. Adult I., II.)."

"This comment, it will be understood, is based upon the highest estimate of the authority of the text as it stands in St. Matthew. That of Mr. W. C. Allen quoted above (p. 7) is more in accord with the general opinion of commentators at the present time. The Jewish view may be seen in Mr. Montefiore (ut sup.).

"A subordinate question may be raised in regard to which it may be well to give the opinion of Dr. McClellan. Bp. Lightfoot in his work On a fresh Revision of the English N.T. (London, 1872) p. 71 n., had criticized the A.V. of Matt. v. 32 for casting 'equal blame on the 'woman, thus doing her an injustice, for obviously 'she is not in the same position with the husband as 'regards guilt; but the Greek μοιχευθῆναι (not μοιχᾶσθαι), 'being a passive verb, implies something quite different. 'In this instance, however, the fault does not lie at the 'door of our translators, who instead of μοιχευθῆναι had 'the false reading μοιχᾶσθαι; but, the correct text 'being restored, a corresponding change in the English 'rendering is necessary.' It may be presumed that the R.V. takes account of this by substituting 'maketh her an adulteress' for 'causeth her to commit adulterry.' But Dr. McClellan objects—

> 'that μοιχεύεσθαι equally with μοιχᾶσθαι was certainly used to imply the criminality of the woman. See Jo. 8. 4, "This woman was taken " COMMITTING ADULTERY (μοιχευομένη), in the " very act." Aristoph. Pax. 978–985. Hermog. ap. Rhet. Graec. II. 137 (ed. Teub.), "A woman " revealed to her husband the way of access to the " Tyrant: he slew the Tyrant, and charged her " with adultery. Her condemnation will be mar- " vellous, even should she be convicted of having " COMMITTED ADULTERY (μεμοιχευμένη)." Dion Chrys. II. 328 (ed. Reiske), "This Legislatress gave " three laws to the Cyprians: first, That the woman " who COMMITTED ADULTERY (μοιχευθεῖσαν) should " be shorn and sent to the brothels. Her own " daughter COMMITTED ADULTERY (ἐμοιχεύθη), " and was sent to the brothels."'

(Chairman.) I think I have no questions on this to ask you because it is so very clear what you intend to convey.

38,501. (Sir William Anson.) Dr. Sanday, the difficulty is, is it not, whether St. Matthew in using these qualifying words put in something at the date when the Gospel was issued in conformity with the ethical ideas of the time, or whether he put them in from some earlier sources accessible to him, which would be as authoritative as anything in St. Mark?—Exactly.

38,502. That is the question?—That is the real question.

38,503. Then as confirmatory of the view that he went to earlier sources we have the concessions to human weakness which follow close on the repitition of this same injunction in this later chapter in St. Matthew?—Exactly.

38,504 "He that is able to receive it let him receive it"?—Yes.

38,505. And I suppose it may be taken that the passage about eunuchs representative of the life of chastity is the ideal?—Yes.

38,506. But that everyone cannot receive that?—Yes.

38,507. Then could those words "He that is able to receive it let him receive it" relate back to the passage about marriage; or would you confine it to the passage about the eunuchs?—Strictly speaking I think it should be confined to the second passage.

38,508. Then there is the earlier passage, "But He " said unto them, all men cannot receive this saying, " but they to whom it is given." That would refer to the passage about marriage?—I am afraid I think that refers to the second passage, and not the first.

38,509. If the case of the man is so with his wife, it is not expedient to marry. But He said unto them, " All men cannot receive this saying, but they to whom it is given." You think that does not refer to the question of putting away the wife, but to the later passage which refers to the question of virginity?—I am afraid it had not occurred to me that it could refer backwards, but I see that there is some primâ facie reason for thinking it might. I am afraid I had not put the question to myself as I should have done.

38,510. At any rate may I ask you this, that the juxtaposition of the two passages—that relating to marriage with the exception and that relating to virginity, also with the exception, would rather tend to show that the exception in the case of marriage in both cases is a genuine exception from an earlier source?—I do think that.

38,511. And, therefore, the absolute prohibition is the ideal?—Yes.

38,512. A principle which may be modified in the practice of human life?—Yes. I should be glad if I might be allowed to retract what I said on the spur of the moment in answer to your first question—whether " All men cannot receive this saying," and "He that is able to receive it, let him receive it," might also refer back to the question of divorce. I spoke too much on the spur of the moment.

38,513. You think it is possible that they might, or at any rate the first, "All men cannot receive this saying"?—It does look as if it did point back, but if I might say so, that is not quite a deliberate opinion. The difficulty of giving a decided answer to these questions arises from the fact that the literary conditions and the historical run up into each other; it is necessary to keep in mind and to adjust the complicated relationships of the Evangelist, of his source, and of our Lord as speaker.

38,514. There are two reservations: " All men " cannot receive this saying, but they to whom it is " given," which comes immediately after the disciples' remonstrance, "If the case of the man is so with his wife it is not expedient to marry;" and then the other, "He that is able to receive it;" so that the first might conceivably be taken to refer to the exceptions?—It does quite look so.

38,515. Then as matter of opinion, assuming your view that the Gospel points to a high ideal with possible exceptions in application, do you think that the grounds of divorce should be extended beyond adultery?—You ask that question in reference to the present state of things?

38,516. Yes?—Perhaps I may offer an explanation which I gave to the secretary when he first approached me on this question. I said that the whole subject was one that I had not studied—that I had rather deliberately not studied because I did not like it—and I would rather not express opinions outside this paper. On any question relating to the New Testament passages and their bearing I should be glad to express myself.

38,517. Then we do not go further than this, that it would not be inconsistent with your view of a just application of the Gospel rule to possibly extend the grounds of divorce?—That is an extension. Of course the Gospel gives one single cause of exception.

38,518. And that is the only departure from principle which the Gospel admits of as it stands?—As it stands.

38,519. We cannot really look beyond that?—Of course this is a very large question.

38,520. But you would not say we could take on any interpretation of these words or could get any authority for the extension of the grounds of divorce beyond the ground of adultery if we follow the lines of the New Testament rule?—I think we have justification for qualifying the absolute prohibition in this case of adultery, and it certainly is a question to my mind whether by parity of reasoning there might not be the other exception.

38,521. But you wish really to confine your evidence to what we can extract as the real effect of the disputed sentences in the Gospel of St. Matthew?—Yes.

38,522. (The Archbishop of York.) I want to ask you one or two questions on the textual authorities just to get your meaning clear. You would, agree I suppose, after what you have said, that the stricter intepretation of the New Testament passages—the one, that is, which looks upon the exception clause as a later insertion—as more in accordance with the primary textual authorities?—I am not sure that I am quite prepared to say that. It is more in accordance with the general tenour of modern interpretation.

38,523. Then certainly you would agree, I suppose, that it is much more in accordance with the language of St. Paul?—Oh yes.

38,524. Undoubtedly?—Yes.

38,525. And you would attach great importance—perhaps more importance—to St. Paul, who spoke in the first century than to later opinions?—Yes.

38,526. Would you say that that same stricter interpretation was more obviously in accord with our Lord's general teaching about marriage, of which, in two of the main passages, these words about divorce are only an illustration—namely, the general teaching "That those whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder"?—Yes.

38,527. You would agree the stricter interpretation is more in accordance with that teaching of our Lord?—I quite agree that that is the ideal that He evidently contemplated.

38,528. And that the stricter interpretation is more in accordance with what He said on that generally than the laxer?—The main point for which I have been contending, if I may say so, is that those two clauses in St. Matthew cannot be treated as if they did not exist.

38,529. I am coming to that; but obviously you have noticed (though in some of our discussion it has been altogether forgotten) that in two of the passages—Matthew xix. and Mark x.—our Lord's words about putting away his wife and committing adultery come more as an appendix to a much wider and more general teaching about the meaning of the institution of marriage?—Yes.

38,530. And, certainly, these appendices in the stricter form of St. Mark follow more naturally and simply from the general ideas laid down in the context, do they not?—Of course, there is a further insertion in St. Matthew. It will be remembered, the form of the question is rather different. "That goes along with "Is it lawful to put away a wife for any cause"? There is the insertion of "for any cause." That evidently anticipates an exception.

38,531. Yes; but my point is that in both passages in the context our Lord lays down certain broad principles about human marriage, of which the summary is, "Those whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder?"—Yes.

38,532. And I ask, would not a stricter prohibition of divorce and re-marriage follow more naturally, apart from other reasons, than the looser one would in that position?—Yes, I think so.

38,533. Then again, would not be the stricter view more in accordance with the circumstances which attended the question which our Lord was asked, that is to say, if He himself gave the exception except for the case of adultery, would not He then have been merely affirming one of two rival positions of the Jewish Rabbis. He would have been merely giving his sanction to the school of Shammai?—Yes.

38,534. Yet even in the position of St. Matthew v. 32, which on your own showing is more distinctly authoritative than xix. 9, our Lord's words come in in relation to a writing of divorcement being obtained. I will read the words, "It was said also, whosoever shall "put away his wife let him give her a writing of divorce-"ment; but I say unto you"—showing that our Lord represented Himself as coming in with a new teaching not familiar to the Jews and His hearers?—He would be endorsing the strictest Jewish view; Shammai represents the strictest Jewish view.

38,535. Do you think our Lord did nothing more than endorse one of two contending views?—Of course there were a number of views; it was not only two. There was the school of Hillel, and other extremes that went beyond Hillel.

38,536. Yes I know, but would not you be prepared to say it was more consistent with our Lord assuming the position of an independent judge and legislator that He should go beyond what even one of the schools of the Rabbis had asserted?—I am afraid I should not be prepared to lay stress on that.

38,537. Then would you say that at any rate the stricter form was more in accordance with the exclamation of the disciples as recorded in St. Matthew than if they had been listening merely to a re-assertion of the principles of Shammai which they were familiar with. It is natural they would have made the exclamation "Then it is not expedient for a man to marry?"—That would still represent the strictest view that was current about then.

38,538. Yes, I do not want to conduct an argument, but only to elucidate a point. I agree it is compatible, but would not it be more natural that that exclamation should follow the assertion of a principle that was not familiar to them?—There would be perhaps some à priori probability in that direction.

38,539. Then again, would not the stricter view be much more in accordance with the universal—I think almost universal—treatment of the subject in the first three centuries. Of course you are aware that, I suppose, no writer in the first three centuries accepting the text of St. Matthew ever used that as a justification for re-marriage after divorce, would that have been so if from the very first——?—I am afraid I am not sufficiently intimate with the history of the question.

38,540. Then summarising these questions, would you say it was at least reasonable to say that the stricter view was more naturally in accordance with the original authorities—with St. Paul, with our Lord's general teaching, with the circumstances in which the question was asked, and certainly with the universal teaching of the first three centuries?—I consider that is absolutely decisive as to what the Christian ideal ought to be, but I do not think it necessarily prejudges——

38,541. I only ask, is not that the reasonable line to take in interpreting what we are to make of these excepted causes in Matthew?—I do not like to explain away precepts so definite as that.

38,542. Then I will come to that. With regard to the explanation of these definite exceptions, would it be true to say that St. Matthew or the Evangelist—the writer of St. Matthew's Gospel—was mainly concerned with Jewish questions and addressing Jewish hearers and readers?—Yes, I think that would be true.

38,543. That therefore he, whoever he was, would be continually dealing with difficult questions that arose between the Jewish community and the early Church?—Yes.

38,544. Therefore there would be a natural disposition on his part to welcome anything that seemed to make an adjustment of these relationships easier?—Yes, I quite think so.

38,545. Then could you tell us at all what time in your judgment would elapse between our Lord's teaching and the publication of St. Matthew's Gospel as we have it?—Perhaps something like 50 years.

38,546. It might have been 50 years?—Yes.

38,547. So that within that 50 years it was quite possible that some of those who were writing and editing reminiscences of our Lord's teaching might have incorporated very naturally, from whatever sources, words which made it easier for the Christian Jews to adjust the Christian ideal to the practice of their own race?—I would not question that.

38,548. So that, without for a moment imputing any kind of design on the part of the latest editor of St. Matthew, some of the documentary sources or all the sources he had might have incorporated during that 50 years some such accommodation?—I certainly would not deny the possibility, but the question is, for instance, as to whether that is so in the case of a document like Q, which is the very best authority we have. If it was part of Q I should doubt whether that had happened.

38,549. As to its being part of Q, though I attach great weight to what you say, you admit the balance of critical scholarship is against you on that?—Hardly, I think. Many scholars would agree that Matt. v. 32 comes in the main from Q, though a rather large proportion of these would cast doubt upon the words "saving for the cause of fornication."

38,550. I will not press that question. Coming to your interpretation of the passage, you say: "It is "possible that our Lord might in certain circum- "stances and under certain conditions lay down a "principle of general application, and, in other cir "cumstances and under other conditions state that "principle with a certain amount of restriction." Now I should like to ask whether, as a matter of fact, the circumstances which from two of the Gospels we know surrounded our Lord when He made His pronouncement were not just those in which something like a definite statement would have been expected. In both cases, though in slightly different forms, a definite question was asked as to what our Lord's views were on a matter of current importance; in both cases it was in answer to that question that He made these statements. Do not those circumstances suggest that if our Lord would ever make a definite statement it would be then, rather than a general statement?—In the case of the Sermon on the Mount it is not an answer to a question, is it?

38,551. No, but in St. Matthew xix. and St. Mark x. it is?—True, but there is also that passage which follows, which I think has a retrospective effect.

38,552. True, but my point is, are these circumstances which would suggest that our Lord was making a definite statement here, and that afterwards He might qualify it?—If you take it exactly in the form in which it appears in St. Mark, I think one would say that; but if you take it in the form in which it appears in St. Matthew, and along with the following section, I should be not so clear.

38,553. Then, again, I venture to suggest this as a point of some importance. In St. Mark x. a further statement about marriage and divorce occurs as an answer to a distinct question asked by the disciples after our Lord's general words about marriage. "For "this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and "shall cleave to his wife; and the twain shall become "one flesh? So that they are no more twain, but one "flesh. What, therefore, God hath joined together, "let not man put asunder," a general statement; "and in the house the disciples asked Him again of this matter, and He said unto them 'Whosoever shall marry'"—is not that one of the circumstances in which the disciples asked a definite question about the meaning of that ideal and received in answer a definite statement?—That is a point certainly; but perhaps it should be remembered that the circumstances are differently stated in St. Matthew. "There came unto "Him certain Pharisees, tempting Him, and saying: "Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for any "cause?" It would not be otherwise than in agreement with the tendency of the Evangelist rather to conflate two occasions. You see his version of the circumstances is different from St. Mark's version of the circumstances.

38,554. I admit that, but all I wanted to get at was your opinion. In both instances in which the words occur in St. Matthew and St. Mark it is in answer to a definite question upon a definite issue. In one of these instances the passage about marriage follows as a distinct answer to a difficulty of the disciples—at any rate in St. Matthew and St. Mark, xix. and x. respectively, our Lord's words occur in that context of definiteness if I may say so?—Yes.

38,555. Do you think it would be natural to say our Lord might here have been laying down a principle for general application, but in other circumstances have been more distinctive. It seems to me to be just the circumstances in which definiteness was asked and given?—I admit the point.

Adjourned for a short time.

(Witness.) May I be allowed to add just one word to the last sentence. I said "I admit the point"; may I add to that "so far as it goes," just to qualify it a little.

38,556. (The Archbishop of York continuing.) Certainly. Now, passing, Dr. Sanday, to what I may call the general conclusions to which you have come, which is, roughly speaking, that you make a distinction between a positive rule and a moral ideal, you think that our Lord's words, however reported, expressed a moral ideal rather than a positive rule. This is the tendency of your evidence?—Yes.

38,557. How far would you go; that he intended it to be more than a mere moral ideal, and also a positive rule for His own disciples? I mean, admitting for the sake of discussion that He was not legislating for human nature in general, how far in your view was He in some sense legislating for His own disciples?—I think the passage in St. Matthew, with the restrictions, was intended to apply to His own disciples.

38,558. I am not discussing now the precise form of the text; but even admitting St. Matthew's account, do you say that with that explanation he was in some senses legislating for His own disciples, or His own society, putting before them an ideal?—Certainly. Not more than that. I think I should prefer to put it in that way.

38,559. Again I will ask what you think about the fact that certainly in St. Matthew and St. Mark a general ideal is laid down, and then there seems to come something in the nature of a positive rule; the ideal, namely, of the union of man and wife in one flesh, followed by the positive rule "Whoever" &c. You make no distinction between the two parts?—I should be quite clear that the exception was a positive rule; and perhaps I might refer to the last sentence of my paper which I added specially with a view to that point. I thought that for Christians what I call the ideal is the proper standard for their conduct—for their own conduct.

38,560. But, first of all, is it to the Christians only an ideal, or does it represent a positive obligation for Christians?—I think there are degrees of obligations in that passage in St. Matthew xix. distinctly recognised; not absolutely the same law for everyone.

38,561. But I noticed just now you said you regarded the exception as a positive rule; but, surely, if the exception is to be regarded as a positive rule, so must the rule of which it is an exception?—Only because the one is a general statement and the other is precise.

38,562. But is not the form of the statement in St. Mark and St. Luke quite precise?—It is as general as it can be. I think that the more general does not exclude the more precise; but I think that the more precise does not suggest the more general.

38,563. Then, may I take it that you think that even to Christians our Lord is only expressing the same kind of general idea as He does when He speaks about turning the other cheek also, and so forth?—I think the two cases are parallel.

38,564. You do, or you do not think?—I do think they are parallel.

38,565. Therefore, to a Christian, it would be left to him to judge for himself how far he ought or ought not to divorce his wife for, say, insanity, just as it would be left to him to judge how far he ought to speak back or resist evil?—I would refer to that passage in St. Matthew xix. 10 to 12, to the distinction that is there drawn; that some were able to receive the saying and some were not.

38,566. Yes, I must return to your main distinction; but coming to St. Mark x. and St. Matthew xix,, "If the case of the man is so with his wife, it is not "expedient to marry," the next verse goes on: "All "men cannot receive this saying but they to whom it "is given." Can we be quite sure that nothing may have been said between the words "It is not expedient to marry" of the disciples, and then our Lord's words, "All men cannot receive this saying." Judging of what follows as to the eunuchs, may it not refer to some words our Lord spoke about the general question of marriage?—I think that is conceivable, quite.

38,567. So the authority is not very strong for saying that our Lord's words, "All men cannot receive this saying but those unto whom it is given," refer to His views about marriage?—I should be sorry to say it did not include that reference.

38,568. Now I come back to the main point, which after all is this. You put, I understand, our Lord's words about marriage on the same level of obligation as the other precepts given, say, in the Sermon on the Mount?—Yes.

38,569. They are, are they not—these other statements— largely paradoxical and metaphorical?—Yes.

38,570. This on the other hand is quite explicit?—It would be paradoxical to a Jew at that time.

38,571. Forgive me. Would it be paradoxical to the Jew of that time if your view is right, that our Lord was only giving His guarantee to one of the Jewish schools?—That refers to the statement of exception?

38,572. Yes?—Yes.

38,573. Not paradoxical altogether; but is there not this further distinction—that our Lord in the other precepts is speaking of general moral attitude on the part of His disciples. Here He is speaking of a normal constant human relationship and expressing what persons ought or ought not to do with regard to the human relationship which is of constant and universal occurrence?—Yes.

38,574. Then does it not seem in this matter our Lord has not followed the line of His general teaching, but has made an exception, and has given a definite and positive direction?—Do you mean as to the general prohibition or the express qualification?

38,575. I do not much mind for the purpose of this question which; whether our Lord's words implied entire prohibition or prohibition only for the case of adultery. I am simply addressing myself to your most important point, that in this matter our Lord was only following the example of His ordinary moral precepts, and I suggest He can scarcely have done so because this is a question that affects concrete human relationship of constant and universal occurrence?—It certainly lays down what is normal—the normal state. But that does not exclude the possibility of exceptions.

38,576. Would you go so far as to say that at any rate there was a very real distinction between this precept of our Lord and others that you speak of, such as not resisting or not swearing?—I can see that there is a difference, and it would be a question—a problem, perhaps—what that difference should count for.

38,577. Supposing that our Lord's words had been regarded merely like the other precepts in the New Testament, as a statement of a general ideal, to which in deference to human weakness exceptions might largely be made, do you think (I just want to get your opinion) that such an interpretation of our Lord's words would ever have enabled the early Church to withstand the whole tendency of Roman society for four or five hundred years?—I suppose it is rather partial—the extent to which they did withstand it—especially in the East.

38,578. But at any rate for the first three centuries there was very considerable withstanding. What I put to you is that surely the hard cases would be extraordinarily frequent in the early ages of the Church where the whole basis of society reflected the Roman law which gave abundant facilities for divorce; and if the early Church had considered that this word of our Lord's about marriage and divorce were on the same level as His words about non-resistance to evil, would they have been able to resist the pressure of these hard cases as they did?—I am afraid I have not the facts definitely enough before my mind. Of course the evidence with regard to the first three centuries is imperfect.

38,579. You would rather I did not examine you about that?—Yes, thank you, I would.

38,580. How would you determine what are or are not exceptions to which this general ideal is to to be subject?—In the New Testament there is only one exception specified.

38,581. Then do you regard that as an exclusive exception, that is to say as excluding all others; or only as an illustrative exception?—I should not regard it necessarily as excluding all others. I am inclined to think that these general precepts of our Lord have been pressed rather too far as a basis of law.

38,582. Then admitting that the exception of adultery is only an illustrative exception, what is to determine what other exceptions may legitimately be made to our Lord's ideal?—I think that there is room for a statesman at the present day to consider what is best in the interests of the higher expediency.

38,583. But would the ground of pressing an exception be a weakness of human nature?—It might be put in that way, because I think in that second passage our Lord does distinctly take account of human weakness Himself.

38,584. I am not speaking now of that exception. I am going on what you said, that that might be regarded as only an illustration of exceptions that might generally be made as a concession to the weakness of human nature, and I think you said the point to determine whether further exception should or should not be made would be the weakness of human nature?—I would rather use the phrase I used just now—higher expediency.

38,585. But the expediency would occur because it was not possible to impose a law if human nature could not stand it?—Yes.

38,586. But has not human nature, apart from stringent provision, a tendency to become very unequal?—I think, in any case, we may apply to this as well as to other questions those words: "All men cannot receive this, but they to whom it is given."

38,587. But I only want to know how far we are to press that point which you made with great force before us. Does that mean that if only a sufficient number of persons can say that they find the Christian law very hard, that that of itself is a reason why they should have a relief from what they feel to be oppressive?—I think I explained that I had not thought out the whole question, and I would rather fall back upon that in answer to a question of that kind. I cannot say I have thought it out.

38,588. Then I will not press you further about it. I would only just ask this further question: Would you be in any way averse to at least leaving the Christian Church or the Christian society freedom to uphold that ideal for its own members strictly?—I should hesitate myself. To uphold it in the sense of putting it before them very strongly is one thing; but to uphold it by a definite law is another.

38,589. But you would attach great value to the consistency and vigour of the witness to the ideal given by the Christian Church?—Yes.

38,590. Do you think that consistency would be largely maintained or that witness more consistently given if no particular notice were taken of those numbers that paid very little regard to it or availed themselves of all kinds of exceptions to it?—You mean that it should be definitely expressed in discipline?

38,591. Yes. What I am asking you is, do you think a moral witness can be really maintained for any length of time against the tendency of human nature unless it is accompanied by some kind of discipline?—I think that the intention is in that direction. I mean I should myself much prefer to lay stress upon our Lord's teaching as representing an ideal that one ought to follow—that one is under a moral obligation to follow—than to lay stress upon the discipline. I think there has been a tendency to harden our Lord's sayings into definite rules.

38,592. I quite understand that as regards individual witness; but, if it is of value that the Christian Church as such should uphold the Christian ideal, and nothing whatever in the way of discipline happens with individual Christians who put their own interpretation on what that ideal means, then a great element in the maintenance of that ideal would surely gradually evaporate?—That is true. I should like to treat it as parallel to the second portion of the first section of the 19th chapter of St. Matthew.

38,593. You again fall back on that?—I think so.

38,594. (Lord Guthrie.) Dr. Sanday, I understand it is not your view that Christ taught that in all circumstances, and without any exception, marriage is indissoluble?—That is my opinion; at least my opinion is that those two passages of St. Matthew hold good.

38,595. That is to say that He did not teach that it is indissoluble in all circumstances?—Yes.

38,596. Now is it possible ——?—Perhaps I ought to distinguish. Of course as an ideal it is indissoluble.

38,597. Quite?—But as a law at least one exception is noted.

38,598. And as ideal, and normally, it is indissoluble?—Yes, quite so.

38,599. But that there should be at all events in one case a remedy for the innocent person?—Yes.

38,600. Is it possible, Dr. Sanday, to be reasonably certain whether Christ used the words "save for fornication" or not, or is it a matter left in doubt?—In the present position of criticism and opinion "reasonably certain" would be too strong.

38,601. I quite understand. Suppose He said so, suppose He did use these words, is it possible to be reasonably certain whether He meant them as exclusive, or merely as illustrative and typical? Is that also a matter in doubt?—I should say so myself; and, if I may say so, I am very glad I have been asked that question, because there has hitherto been rather an ambiguity between those two points and I am not clear in my own mind.

38,602. Suppose He did not use these words, is it possible to be reasonably certain or is it a matter of doubt whether, although He did not use them, He implied them?—I do not think we can be certain that He did not.

38,603. Then also, Dr. Sanday, supposing they were illustrative—assuming that for a moment—is it possible to be reasonably certain what other exceptions He would have included, and what others He would not have included. Do we get any guide as to that from any of Christ's teaching, or is it left to each Church and State to settle that for themselves?—My own judgment would incline that way, but at the same time valeat quantum.

38,604. The Archbishop put to you the case of individuals putting their own interpretations on Christ's words. I understand you contemplate the State and Church consulting on this matter, and, according to the necessities of the times, fixing certain rules to which individuals must stand?—That was not exactly present to my mind—not the consultation of Church and State.

38,605. Well, the State alone. Did you contemplate that individuals should be free to put their own interpretation and act accordingly, or that it was a matter for the State to determine?—Every State on the ground of the State, within the sphere of the State; every Church within the sphere of the Church. Certainly not for individuals.

(The Archbishop of York.) May I explain my question as Lord Guthrie refers to it? I meant individuals availing themselves of any regulations which the State saw fit to lay down.

38,606. (Lord Guthrie.) Quite. Is it your view that in any regulations the State lays down they must act in accordance with the general principles laid down by Christ?—That is my feeling.

38,607. If you came to be of opinion that it was reasonably certain that Christ had forbidden divorce in all circumstances, and without any exception, then I presume you would not advise the State to act on the other principle?—I am not so certain, as at present advised.

38,608. But if you were so certain, then I presume it would follow that the State ought to take the same line?—It is a very large and difficult question.

38,609. Assuming that the matter in your view was perfectly clear—as the Roman Catholics think, you know?—Yes, it is the whole question of the relation of the Church and the State.

38,610. Never mind the Church just now. Take one who acts as a citizen, keeping in view that he is a Christian also. If the teaching of Christ were perfectly clear that there could be no divorce, I suppose as a citizen you would act on the same line, would you not?—It is a very contingent state of things.

38,611. Very well. I will leave it there; I understand your view. With regard to the question of legislation as against general principles, if Christ meant to legislate and lay down a hard and fast rule in this particular case, do you know any other case where He did so?—I do not think He did with regard to this case.

38,612. I know, I am coming to that. Assuming that He did, do you know any other case where He did, or do they fall under the same view you represent about oaths and war and giving away one's substance, and so on?—I have not present to my mind any case.

38,613. Now, we had a very distinguished witness here who took the view that there was no other case, but that in this case Christ legislated; and his ground for saying so was that marriage lies at the foundation of society in a way that none of the other questions do. What do you say to that?—It seems to me at the first blush to be a tenable view.

38,614. Then take the question, not of war or of oaths, but of truth, "Thou shalt not bear false witness"; the same very eminent witness maintains that in order to save life it is allowable to tell an untruth. Do you think that truth is not as much at the foundation of society as marriage; is it not the foundation of everything?—Yes, I should be inclined to say so on the spur of the moment.

38,615. And I suppose it is at the foundation of marriage also, because fidelity is just truth in another form, is it not?—Yes.

38,616. So you adhere to your view that Christ was acting in this case as He did in all others, laying down great general principles to be applied from time to time?—That is exactly my view.

38,617. I do not know whether it enters into it, but do you reject the view that marriage is in any reasonable sense a sacrament? Does your view depend on that at all?—I asked to be allowed not to answer questions on the general question.

38,618. You were not asked that. I will ask this question: Does your view which you have stated at all depend on the answer to that question; or is it quite independent of it?—It is independent of it.

38,619. Have you formed any opinion on the question of equality—whether we can get any light on that from Christ's general teaching?—Between the sexes?

38,620. Yes?—I have not considered the question, but of course one's impulse is to say that there should be equality.

38,621. That in equality there would be nothing inconsistent with the general line of Christ's teaching?—I should say so, certainly.

38,622. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) Dr. Sanday, I gather your position is that, textually, we ought to think that the writer of the first Gospel, whoever he was, introduced the class of exception as to adultery?—That he introduced it; but I am inclined to think, myself, with some authority behind him.

38,623. Yes, I am putting it at the lowest?—Yes, quite so.

38,624. It is as old as that, I mean?—Oh, yes, certainly.

38,625. If that be so we are excluded, are we not, from supposing that that was done in bad faith by the author of the Gospel?—Certainly.

38,626. The whole fabric of our religion prevents our adopting that hypothesis; we, at all events, get a very strong contemporanea expositio?—I do think so.

38,627. Is not that a point of considerable importance?—I do think so.

38,628. That, if Christ did not say it, at any rate He was understood by his contemporaries to mean it. Would not that be a right way of putting it?—I think so, especially if one guarded oneself by saying a certain section of his contemporaries. There is a difference between the case of St. Matthew and St. Luke. St. Luke is a Gentile Christian coming, perhaps, from the west of Asia Minor; that would be one set of conditions, and a thing would sink into one mind that would not into the mind of another.

38,629. But, as far as the Jewish section of his contemporaries were concerned, he was understood to mean that the exception of adultery was to be read into the law of indissolubility of marriage?—That certainly applied to our first Evangelist, and perhaps to the document on which he was drawing.

38,630. Which may have been very much earlier?—I think it may be the actual words of St. Matthew.

38,631. The real St. Matthew may have written Q, and this may really have been from Q?—Yes.

38,632. As we are on the text; I did not understand quite the point the Archbishop of York put to you on the passage in the 19th chapter of St. Matthew. As I understand the answer you gave, I think to Sir William Anson, it was that the words in the 11th verse, "All men cannot receive this saying," applied to our Saviour's teaching as to marriage, which had just gone before, and not exclusively at any rate to what follows, the passage about the eunuchs?—I think it might do so; I am not quite sure.

38,633. That I followed. Then I understood the Archbishop to suggest to you that there might have been some passage, now gone, in between the 10th and 11th verses to which those words, "All men cannot receive this saying" would apply?—That is conceivable; it is quite conceivable.

38,634. What I, as an ignorant person, wanted to ask you is this; is there any authority, or are there any authorities or any evidence that there ever was such a passage?—Oh, no.

38,635. Then surely that is an argument by which you could get rid of the emphasis of any passage by assuming that another passage existed of which you had no evidence at all, and that if it did the words in question would apply to it. I mean it seems to be entirely gratuitous?—It is not a point I could press at all, not such a possibility as that, and perhaps that is putting it in slightly too concrete a form. I do not suppose that the Archbishop suggests that there was an actual passage in the writing or in the document which was omitted or ignored. You see it is only a very condensed record, and we do not know what was behind it, what the actual facts were behind it.

38,636. The suggestion is that there might have been something in our Lord's words, whether recorded or not, in between?—Yes.

38,637. But I do not follow that. As an ignorant layman, it seems to me absolutely gratuitous. You might get rid of any argument by assuming something else existed which accounted for it?—I should not quite describe it in that way. It is a real possibility——

(The Archbishop of York.) May I again interrupt, as Sir Lewis seems to be describing my question in his words to you? I think he has rather missed my point. It was whether the words which follow in the 12th verse about the eunuchs do not more naturally seem to indicate that our Lord may have been using some words about the general ethics of marriage to which the words there specially refer. I did not throw any stress on the fact that there might or might not be a passage, which we have not got, between verse 10 and verse 11; but that the context in verse 12 may seem to point to the fact that our Lord was discussing another aspect of the marriage question. I only want it put right.

38,638. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I am very much obliged to the Archbishop; it has made it much clearer to me. Is there any evidence, Dr. Sanday, of a passage such as the Archbishop suggests might have existed?—No; it is a matter of speculation. We are left in the dark as to the context on many things.

38,639. But if it were any other subject it would be such a narrow basis on which to ground an argument—that there might have been words which are not there. In any document such as I have to deal with such an argument would not be listened to for a moment?—I could not lay stress on it myself.

(The Archbishop of York.) I hope Sir Lewis does not think that is my argument which he is describing now.

38,640. (Sir Lewis Dibdin.) I am extremely sorry if I have misrepresented anything that you intended. I thought I had now represented what you intended. I am very sorry if I have misrepresented any view your Grace wished to put. Again, for my own information, Dr. Sanday, I have not quite followed your answers with regard to the differences between the broad general principle and the specific rule. As I read your paper, or as you read it and I listened to it and followed it, I thought that was your way of reconciling the two accounts in St. Mark and St. Luke on the one hand and St. Matthew on the other. I thought you suggested that the account in St. Mark and St. Luke were a statement of the principle in broad and general terms, but that the words in St. Matthew might be at any rate the principle reduced into a definite concrete form?—Yes, on another occasion—in another context.

38,641. If that is your view, as I thought it was your view, is not there much more difficulty in reading into the statement of the concrete rule with its exception, further exceptions, than there is into the statement of the general rule? I quite follow the general rule may admit of exceptions to any extent, but I do not quite follow you when you take the passage in St. Matthew and treat that as a statement of the concrete rule with an exception—I do not quite follow you in saying (as I think you did in answer to Lord Guthrie) that there might be other exceptions—that the exception was only illustrative. There seems great difficulty in adopting that view?—I should not like to commit myself so definitely as that. It is a point I cannot say I have really thought out.

38,642. But you do see, do you not, that there is greater difficulty in enlarging an exception to a concrete rule which gives an exception, than in importing exceptions into a general rule merely stated generally?—That is quite true. Perhaps I ought just to point out that what I put forward—that possible explanation, that both statements might stand together—was only my own opinion; and of course the view expressed by Dr. Montefiore that I have quoted in the appendix is quite an alternative view to that, and equally possible.

38,643. Yes, speaking for myself I am very much impressed with your view of it. I will not keep you a moment. I just wanted to ask you something on the very end of your paper. I do not quite follow the attitude you suggest with regard to the Church and the State. I see in the last paragraph you say this: "But legislation by the Civil Power is a different "matter; and obedience to the Civil Power comes "under the head of rendering to Cæsar the things "that are Cæsar's, and does not clash with duty "towards God." Now assuming for a moment that the rule laid down by our Lord is intended as a binding rule, then I suppose legislation by the State inconsistent with that rule would be clashing with our duty towards God, would it not?—I am not sure that it is an absolute binding rule for all future centuries.

38,644. But I mean assuming that it was. Assume that the Rigorist view is right—or anything approaching that—then I suppose legislation which is inconsistent with that would be clashing with our duty towards God, would it not?—It would not be what is called specifically Christian legislation.

38,645. Let us take something quite different. Suppose legislation were passed definitely repealing the Commandment, "Thou shalt not steal"; that would clash, would it not, with out duty towards God?—Yes, it would.

38,646. There could be no doubt about that?—No.

38,647. Then if you had an equally definite rule as to marriage and its indissolubility, or its limited dissolubility, and legislation is passed plainly contravening that rule, that also must clash, must it not, with our duty towards God?—On the surface it appears so, but it is a large question,

38,648. But assuming that to be the case, what ought to be the attitude of persons or the Christian society who accept the directions of our Lord as binding laws upon them?—I think, perhaps, I would rather not answer the question, only because I have not really thought it out.

38,649, I am very much obliged to you for answering any questions. I will not press it. I just want to put this point to you. Might it not be said that our Lord's teaching—this is an argument I suggest only could be applied to Christian people, people who believe in Christ—although not binding upon the State as religious teaching, but, because it is our Lord's teaching to Christian men, would represent what would be for the highest good of society? I am afraid I have expressed myself badly?—Not at all. I quite see the meaning. That would be a possible consideration to bear in mind.

38,650. That is all I am putting, that to Christian men as citizens our Lord's teaching is important, is it not, as representing something which, apart altogether from Christianity, represents what in our Lord's view is for the highest good of society?—Of course there are so many sides from which you can look at the highest good of society. It is propounding a very large question.

38,651. (Judge Tindal Atkinson.) Just one question on page 3 of your print. You set out the 10th and 11th verses of the seventh chapter of St. Paul's Epistle to the Corinthians, "That the wife depart not from the husband." You see the word "depart" there?—Yes.

38,652. Does that mean that she shall not divorce herself from her husband, shall not separate; because it follows, "But if she depart let her remain unmarried"; or does it merely mean she is not to separate herself?—I think so.

38,653. Separate?—I think so. Unfortunately I have not the Greek before me.

38,654. You have set out the Greek above?—Oh, yes, μὴ χωρισθῆναι: that is separation.

38,655. And also at the end, "That the husband leave not his wife"; that is, separate?—Well, 'αφιεναι is the word that would be used for putting away.

38,656. Divorce?—Yes.

38,657. As far as separation goes, is it conceivable that St. Paul could have meant that there were no circumstances that could exist which would justify a separation?—Oh, no, he certainly admits that.

36,658. (Mr. Brierley.) I should just like to ask one question. It has been suggested, as I understand, that it is hardly likely that our Lord would have introduced the words of exception in St. Matthew's Gospel, because He would be by that only expressing His approval of the doctrine of one particular school, namely, the school of Shammai. Historically, was it possible for our Lord to express an opinion as to dissolubility or indissolubility of marriage without expressing his approval of the doctrine of some particular sect of the Jews?—The school of Shammai went furthest.

38,659. We have had it that there was a school of Hillel that had lax views on the question of divorce?—Yes.

38,660. And the school of Shammai, that allowed it on one ground?—Yes.

38,661. And we have had it in evidence this morning that there was a school called the Zadokites which prohibited divorce on any ground?—I was not aware of that.

38,662. We have had that from Mr. Abrahams: and also the school of the Essenes which tooks a strong view. So that assuming our Lord gave his opinion as expressed in St. Mark, He would only be expressing the view which the school of the Zadokites then held?—Yes.

38,663. Therefore, if that is so, the argument would rather lack force that He could not have used the words of exception in St. Matthew, because He was thereby only expressing His approval of a particular school?—I confess I have not felt there was great force in it in any case.

38,664. But that would be so?—Yes, it would follow.

38,665. If there were schools prohibiting divorce altogether?—The Rabbi 'Aquiba went further in laxity than even Hillel.

38,666. Yes; but I was taking the other end of the scale, that there was a sect that absolutely forbade remarriage on any ground whatever?—I was not aware of that; it is news to me.

38,667. (Chairman.) Would you mind repeating what your view is as to the difference between the view of Mr. Montefiore and those which you have expressed in one part of your paper—as to the alternative, I mean. I should like you to put, in your clear way, what you understand to be the difference, the alternative he puts?—My point was that the two statements as we have them in St. Mark, and as we have them in St. Matthew, might both stand side by side. Mr. Montefiore explains St. Mark in the sense of St. Matthew by assuming that the question of adultery did not come in and was taken for granted, because the proper punishment for adultery was death.

38,668. Then one question in summary. At the end of your paper, page 10, I see you speak of those precepts or sayings. They are addressed to the Christian conscience as such, and the appeal to them is an appeal to that conscience. That I understand to be your considered view?—That is the way in which it presents itself to me.

38,669. Then that would leave the idea to be expressed in a matter of personal conduct?—I incline that way.

38,670. And that would again leave the State (if I follow the next sentence or two) to deal with the question of law on the basis which it considered the best in the higher expediency?—That is the opinion to which I incline, but I have only thought of it in reference to this paper. The whole subject is one which I had not considered.

38,671. But assuming it applies to this particular subject on which we are, that would logically follow; but the parity of reasoning, as you said, admits of statement of grounds which included something more than adultery?—My own view is—for what it is worth—that it is open to the State to take a broad view.

(Chairman.) I think I quite appreciate what you have said. Would you allow me, Dr. Sanday, on behalf of the Commissioners, to tender you our very best thanks for the very valuable assistance you have given in sending in this paper, and coming here to give us an explanation of it. We regard it as a very great privilege to have heard you.

Dr. WILLIAM RALPH INGE called and examined.

38,672. (Chairman.) Are you Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity at Cambridge?—I am.

38,673. How long have you filled that office?—3½ years.

38,674. Before that were you—— ?—Before that I was Vicar of All Saints, Knightsbridge.

38,675. You have been good enough to prepare a memorandum on the passages of the New Testament which bear on divorce; and, if you would allow me to suggest it, that should be taken as your evidence as a whole; and I would only, therefore, ask that you would kindly read some parts of it, because some are quotations, and we might treat it, if you will allow me to suggest it, as put in. That will enable you, if you assent to that view, not to read the first three pages.

The following is the portion of the proof referred to:—

" Two other passages, which might be referred to, throw no light on the subject. In Rom. 7. 2, 3, the normal conditions of marriage are stated, without thought of the exceptional conditions created by unfaithfulness; and in Mt. I., 19, the question is of breaking off a betrothal, not a consummated marriage."

I should like to ask you if you would commence at page 4, letter B?

" B.

" The probable Import of the Utterances attributed to Christ on the Subject of Divorce taken as they stand in our Texts.

" The chief problem raised by the passages quoted above from the Gospels arises from the fact that, in Mk. 10. 11, and Lk. 16. 18, Jesus forbids divorce absolutely, while in the two passages from Mt. He makes an exception. But, before discussing this discrepancy, it may be well to consider the meaning of the exception, as it stands in our documents. Two questions are here important: (1) What is the offence for which divorce is here allowed? (2) Is the remedy divorce with freedom to re-marry, or only separation?

"(1) The exception named is the case of fornication (Porneia). This word, in its proper signification, denotes intercourse with a prostitute, πόρνη being the ordinary contemptuous or plain-spoken name for harlot. A few critics (e.g., Döllinger) have argued that the ground for divorce here sanctioned is the discovery by the husband that the wife has been unchaste before marriage. This, however, is impossible, for the following reasons :—

"(i) The word (Porneia) and its cognates is commonly used in the Septuagint for unchastity in general (c.f. e.g., Hos. 2. 5 ; Amos 7. 17) ; and in the New Testament it has this sense in I. Thess. 4. 3 and I. Cor. 5. 1.

"(ii) None of the Patristic writers of the first three centuries adopted the explanation advocated by Döllinger, or even thought of it.

"(iii) The general sense of the passages in St. Matthew is against it.

(2) Roman Catholic commentators have maintained that Christ here sanctions separation from bed and board, in cases of adultery, but not divorce, a vinculo matrimonii, with liberty to re-marry. This, however, is impossible for the following reasons :— "

38,676. Could we take those three items as read?— Very well, my Lord.

The following is the portion referred to :—

"(i) The passage in Deuteronomy (24. 1–4), with which Christ is dealing, expressly permits re-marriage. It must therefore be assumed that this permission remains in force, if not explicitly repealed.

"(ii) The words "causeth her to commit adultery" or "maketh her an adulteress" assume that the divorced woman will re-marry. The exception, therefore, implies that re-marriage after divorce for adultery is not adultery.

"(iii) Divorce without liberty of re-marriage was unknown both to Jewish and Roman law ; and though at a later period a Christian husband or wife might, in certain circumstances, feel it a duty to get a divorce from the civil courts, while yet, as a Christian, feeling bound to abstain from re-marriage, these conditions did not exist in Palestine in the time of Christ.

" But it has been urged, in favour of the view here rejected, that, if the husband of the guilty wife may re-marry without incurring the guilt of adultery, it is inconsistent to say that 'he that marrieth a divorced woman committeth adultery' (5. 32). For adultery is a crime incidental to the marriage state, and if it be possible in either party, it must be because the bond of the marriage still continues ; and if the bond exists both are bound.

" To this objection, two answers are possible :—

"(i) In the clause he that marrieth a divorced woman we must understand, as if it were repeated, the exception about 'Porneia.' He who marries a woman who has been divorced for any other reason committeth adultery ; but the divorced adultress is free to re-marry. (So Meyer and Alford.)

"(ii) The clause in question indicates that the prohibition of divorce was intended to be absolute, and that the 'exception' is interpolated. (See below.)

" Our conclusion is that, taking the two passages in Matthew as they stand, we must admit that Christ allowed divorce, with liberty to both parties to re-marry, in the case of adultery. That is to say, the passages in Matthew, which contain the exception, are in sharp contradiction with the passages in Mark and Luke, which do not contain the exception.

" A third question, whether Porneia or its Aramaic equivalent, may be stretched to include any other kinds of misconduct, besides bodily unchastity, will be better discussed in connection with Jewish interpretations of the Deuteronomic legislation. (See F.)."

38,677. I think we ought to have the next, if you please?

" (C.)

" The possible interpolation of the "Exception" in the two Passages of Matthew.

"We have seen that if the two passages in Matthew are interpreted in their natural sense, which alone seems to be admissible, there is an obvious discordance between these passages and the parallel passages in Matthew and Luke. The question now arises, which report represents the actual teaching of Christ?

" Those who still cling to the old theory of inspiration will be compelled to follow the fuller report. The omission of the exception in one or more reports does not prove that the exception was not stated on another occasion ; the hypothesis of an interpolation of such importance in a canonical book could not be admitted without impugning the supernatural guarantee which, on this theory, we may claim for the trustworthiness of every detail in the Gospel record.

" But this theory of inspiration is no longer thought by scholars to be tenable. Modern critics endeavour to get behind the text of the Gospels to the sources from which the Synoptic Gospels were composed. If we follow the methods of investigation now generally approved, we find in the first place that no saying of Christ is better attested than the saying about divorce. It must have appeared both in the document generally called 'Q,' the main source of the non-Marcan part of Matthew's Gospel, and in the other primitive document which is, in substance, our Mark. (See Burkitt, The Gospel History and its Transmission, p. 148, sq.). Secondly, it is now felt that it is much easier to account for the discrepancy by supposing that there has been an unwarranted addition, or interpolation, in Matthew than by supposing that an important qualification has been suppressed in Mark and Luke. A motive for the alteration may be suggested in the desire to bring the legislation of Christ into nearer agreement with Jewish custom, and with what may have seemed to be a practical necessity in the Christian Church. Such alterations of the words of Christ are unfortunately not without parallel in Matthew, and in more than one case the insertion has been made since the date of our oldest manuscripts. For instance, Matthew 17. 21, is a verse interpolated from Mark 9. 29, which had been already corrupted by the insertion of καὶ νηστείᾳ ('fasting' as well as 'prayer' declared to be the means of expelling evil spirits). Again in Matthew 5. 22, the originally unqualified statement, 'he that is angry with his brother shall be in danger of the judgment,' has been thought too harsh, and 'without a cause' (εἰκῇ) has been inserted. In Matt. xix, 3-10, the interpolation seems to be prepared for by the words 'for every cause' (κατὰ πᾶσαν αἰτίαν) in verse 3 ; these words are not in Mark's account. Again, the hypothesis of interpolation is supported by the exclamation of the Disciples in verse 10 : 'If the case of the man is so with his wife, it is not expedient to marry.' Their surprise would be difficult to account for if Christ had merely affirmed the stricter Rabbinic interpretation of the law, with which they must have been familiar already. On the other hand, if the prohibition of divorce had for the first time been made absolute, their astonishment was natural. Lastly (see further, under F), the expression λόγος πορνείας seems to be a translation of the Hebrew words in Deut. 24. 1, the ambiguity of which gave rise to the controversy. To quote them (in Aramaic) without comment would explain nothing.

"It seems fairly certain, then, that the 'exception' was not found either in the original Q or in the Marcan document, though Q may have been interpolated before the evangelist whom we call Matthew used it. Can we decide whether the clause has been added to the text of Matthew by a later copyist or editor, or whether it is part of the Gospel as he wrote it?

"The two passages must be considered separately. In 5. 32 we have seen that the words παρεκτὸς λόγου πορνείας come in awkwardly, and have the appearance of a gloss; but there is no variation in the manuscripts. The natural conclusion is that Matthew either inserted the clause himself, or found it in an interpolated copy of Q, which he used.

"The case of 19. 9 is different. The variations in the manuscripts cannot be accounted for by any carelessness on the part of copyists. The text has been subjected to deliberate manipulation. There are no less than four variations in which the great Uncials differ among themselves. These are (i) μὴ ἐπὶ πορνείᾳ or παρεκτὸς λόγου πορνείας; (ii) καὶ γαμήσῃ ἄλλην omitted by B; (iii) ποιεῖ αὐτὴν μοιχευθῆναι or μοιχᾶται; (iv) καὶ ὁ ἀπολελυμένην γαμήσας μοιχᾶται omitted by ℵ C3, D. It would be rash to base any important argument on a passage where the text is in such confusion; and the most probable explanation of the confusion seems to be that the verse was not part of Matthew's Gospel, but is a later interpolation.

"The result of this examination has been to invalidate the alleged exception, and to reinstate the absolute prohibition of divorce in its unqualified severity. But it would not be right to close the inquiry without asking ourselves whether it was not Christ's method to make statements in a quite unguarded form, leaving it to the common sense of His hearers to add the necessary qualifications. The Sermon on the Mount contains several startling injunctions of this kind, such as that already quoted which forbids anger under all circumstances, and the command to turn the other cheek to the smiter, which Christ Himself, according to the Fourth Gospel, did not follow when He was smitten. It is quite a tenable view, that the prohibition of divorce is absolute in form rather than intention, the case of adultery not being in the speaker's mind at the moment. It is even possible that, to a Jew addressing Jews, the right of the husband to complete divorce for adultery might seem too obvious to need to be affirmed; and in this case the gloss containing the exception would correctly interpret the speaker's intention. But against this may be set the surprise of the Disciples (Mt. 19. 10); and also, I should say, the general character of Christ's teaching.

"It is a very significant fact that St. Paul, in the passage of I. Corinthians, first distinctly recognises the absolute rule as given by the Lord, and then proceeds at once to allow an exception, on his own authority. (See the passage I. Cor. 7. 10–15.) In so acting, he indicates that for him the absolute authority of Christ is to be claimed rather in the sphere of general principles than of particular legislation; and if we adopt this view, to which we are led by the whole character of Christ's teaching, it does not seem that the conclusion at which, on critical grounds, we have arrived, necessarily carries with it the further conclusion that it is ultra vires for a Christian church or state to sanction divorce under any circumstances."

38,678. I think, if you will allow me to suggest it, as the next is mostly quotation, it might be taken as read, and then you can pass on to "G"?

"D.

"The opinion and practice of the early Church has so obvious a bearing on the interpretation and even on the textual criticism of the passages of the New Testament concerning divorce, that I subjoin a brief statement on this point, taking as my limit the writings of Origen.

"The questions which I propose to try to answer are as follows:—

"In the Christian Church between 100 and 250 A.D.—

"(i) Was separation of husband and wife (a) allowed (b) enjoined, in case of adultery?

"Answer. — Hermas (about 140) says that a husband who continues to live with a wife whom he knows to be unfaithful to him, is a partaker of her adultery. (Pastor, Mand. 4.) Tertullian (about 200) says that the husband ought to put away his wife for adultery, and that a wife may put away her husband for the same cause; but he seems to contemplate cases where the sin is continued after discovery. (Adv. Marcionem 4. 34; De Patientia, par. 12.) Connivance is one thing; readiness to forgive after repentance is quite another.

"(ii) Were the parties to such a separation required to remain unmarried?

"Answer.—Hermas says: 'With a view to her 'repentance, the husband ought not, after sending 'his own wife away, to marry another. For this 'cause it is commanded to you both to remain single, 'both husband and wife, because that in such a case 'there may be repentance.' Justin Martyr (about 150) says that Christ taught that 'he who marries 'a woman who has been divorced from another man 'committeth adultery.' (Apol. Prima, par. 14, 15.) Clement of Alexandria (about 200) says: 'The 'Scripture lays down the law absolutely: Thou 'shalt not put away a wife except on the ground of 'fornication; and it considers it adultery to contract 'another marriage during the lifetime of either of 'the separated parties.' (Strom. 2. 23.) Again, referring to the words of the apostle: 'If the case 'of the man be so with his wife, it is not expedient 'to marry.' He says: 'They sought to learn whether, 'when a wife has been found guilty of fornication, 'and has been put away, it is permitted to marry 'another.' (Strom. 3. 6.) He, like Hermas, says that no obstacle should be placed in the way of the erring woman's repentance and return to her husband. Tertullian (about 200) assumes that all agree that there can be no re-marriage after divorce, and bases on this his contention that, since marriage is per se indissoluble, re-marriage is not permissible even after the death of the husband or wife. (De Monogamia, par. 9.) The obscurely worded passage, Adv. Marcionem 4. 34, probably means that Christ allowed separation, but forbade re-marriage; this was clearly Tertullian's view. Athenagoras (Leg. pro Christ, 33) takes the same view as Tertullian (De Monog. 9); he says that, 'second marriage is only specious adul-'tery, for Christ permits not to send away her 'whose virginity he has ended, nor to marry again.' In the 'Apostolical Constitutions' the clergy are forbidden to marry a divorced woman. In the 'Apostolical Canons' re-marriage is forbidden; but this may refer to divorce for lighter causes. The Council of Elvira (later than the limit we have chosen) enacts severe penalties for those who have been divorced without cause and have married again. Lactantius regards re-marriage as permissible for a husband who has divorced his wife for adultery.

"It is plain that there was no uniformity, either of theory or practice, in the early Church. The question is complicated by the existence of a strong prejudice against second marriage, a prejudice which was not confined to Christians. (On Pagan tombstones a woman is often given credit for having been univira.)

"(iii) Are there any indications that the prohibition of re-marriage, even if generally accepted, was not strictly enforced by the early Church?

"Answer.—Tertullian (Ad Uxorem 2. 1) speaks of 'certain women, who, when by divorce or by a 'husband's death an occasion of continency was 'offered, had not only thrown away the opportunity 'of so great a good, but even in marrying again had 'not chosen to remember the rule that they should 'marry in the Lord.' Origen (on Mat. 19. 9) says that 'certain rulers of the Church, contrary to the 'precepts of Holy Scripture, have allowed a man to 'marry a woman in the lifetime of her former 'husband,' and adds that such a concession to human weakness is 'not altogether unreasonable.' It is not unlikely, though it is not stated, that these were cases when non-Christian husbands had put away their wives for becoming Christians, or perhaps such cases as that mentioned below (vi).

"(iv) Was the 'exception' in Matthew recognised?

"Answer.—Yes. It is quoted by Theophilus (about 180); by Clement of Alexandria, by Tertullian, and by Origen; but as we have seen, it was not, by these writers, understood to sanction re-marriage.

"(v) Was there any doubt about the meaning of 'Porneia'?

"Answer.—No; all who mention the exception understand it to mean adultery. But Hermas, and some later writers, think that it may include spiritual fornication, i.e., (especially) 'worshipping other Gods,' which is called fornication against Jehovah in the Old Testament. Origen further suggests witchcraft, child-murder, and peculation, as possibly equivalent in guilt to 'Porneia.'

"(vi) Did Christians avail themselves of the civil law of divorce, except for adultery?

"Answer.—Yes; there is an instructive instance in Justin's Second Apology. A woman who was married to a heathen husband embraced Christianity. The husband, following a repulsive practice very common among the Pagans, wished her to submit to unnatural usage. After some time she sent him a notice of divorce (ῥεπούδιον) and left him. The divorce was not sought or granted on the ground of cruelty or immorality; the law required no reason to be given. The notice sent, she was legally free to marry again; as a Christian she would probably not be free to do so, but in such a case it is possible that some bishops would have sanctioned re-marriage; cf. (iii) above.

The Regulations bearing on Divorce in I. Cor. 7, where the Apostle quotes the authority of Christ.

(The passage is quoted in full above, in Greek and English.)

"St. Paul is here discussing mixed marriages, a subject which, however important in the mission field, does not concern the present inquiry. But his way of dealing with it is very significant. He quotes 'the Lord' as having forbidden a wife to depart from her husband. No exception is mentioned. And then, having apparently recognised the absolute rule as laid down by Christ, he proceeds, on his own authority, to allow an exception. If the unbelieving husband puts away his Christian wife, the marriage, which has never been a Christian marriage, is dissolved. 'The brother or sister is not under bondage in such cases.' These words imply, in all probability, permission to marry again (cf. Rom. 7. 3, where the widow is ἐλευθέρα ἀπὸ τοῦ νόμου [τοῦ ἀνδρός]; this is equivalent to 'not under bondage'). Grammatically, no doubt, it would be possible to translate 'If the unbelieving partner is for 'separating, let him go; the believer is not under 'bondage to live with him': but in most cases, if the Pagan husband wished to separate, he would leave his wife no choice; the permission therefore would be superfluous.

"In estimating this concession, it must be remembered that indissolubility was no part of the contract in Pagan marriage. Such a union, in St. Paul's view, was only 'sanctified' by the Christian party to it, who would interpret his or her vows in a higher sense. Verse 39 of this chapter, ('only in the Lord') is an express prohibition of marriage between a Christian and a Pagan (cf. II. Cor. 6. 14); the case contemplated in v. 15 would only arise when one partner became a convert after marriage. Further, it would appear that v. 16 partially retracts the concession just made. The marriage is legally (even from the Christian point of view) dissolved by the 'departure' of the unbelieving partner—the Christian wife or husband is free, no longer 'under bondage'; but where there is any hope of the return of the unbeliever, or of his conversion, which would naturally involve his return, there is a moral obligation for the Christian partner not to interpose any fatal obstacle, such as re-marriage would be. St. Paul hints rather than pronounces this precept, and adds (v. 17), 'As God hath called each, so let him walk.' The passage is not free from obscurity, owing to the apostle's elliptical style; but the thought seems to be that which I have indicated. If the abandoned Christian partner can endure to lead a single life, in the hope, however slight, that the other party may return and 'be saved,' that is the most Christian course; but St. Paul will not forbid re-marriage, only he lays down as a general principle (which he proceeds to illustrate by the cases of circumcision and slavery), that the Christian should be content to remain in the outward condition in which salvation found him.

"It is right to add in conclusion that scholars are not unanimous as to the extent of the concession here made by St. Paul, some holding that no permission to re-marry is implied in v. 15. My chief reason for dissenting from this view is that it would be meaningless to say to a deserted and divorced wife, 'you are no longer in bondage' or 'you are now free,' if she were not free to marry again.

F.

The state of the Jewish Law and Custom which may be material to appreciate the Passages in the New Testament which have been referred to.

"Dent. 24. 1–4 is the important passage in the Old Testament. According to Driver and other safe authorities, the translations in the Authorised and Revised Versions are both inexact. Driver renders: 'When a man taketh a wife and marrieth her, if she 'find no favour in his eyes, because he hath found in 'her some indecency, and he writeth her a bill of 'divorce, and delivereth it into her hand, and sendeth 'her out of his house, and she departeth out of his 'house, and becometh another man's wife, and the 'latter husband hateth her and writeth her a bill of 'divorce, and delivereth it into her hand, and sendeth 'her out of his house; or if the latter husband, 'which took her to be his wife, die; her former 'husband, which sent her away, may not take her 'again to be his wife, after that she is defiled.'

"If this is correct, the passage is not a law of divorce. The right of divorce is assumed, and restrictions are imposed. A husband who took back his wife after she had been 'defiled' would be wanting in proper self-respect.

"The phrase 'some indecency' (lit., the nakedness of a thing) was ambiguous enough to be very variously interpreted. The School of Shammai (1st century B.C.) interpreted it to mean unchastity, while the School of Hillel, laying stress (quite illegitimately) on the word 'thing,' and treating the words 'if she find no favour in his eyes' as if they had not been explained by the clause which follows, wished to allow divorce κατὰ πᾶσαν αἰτίαν (Matt. 19. 3). A man, according to them, might divorce his wife for being a bad cook, or even because he saw someone who pleased him better. This interpretation is plainly sophistical, and the absolute licence which it justifies was perhaps seldom claimed. On the other hand, the limitation advocated by the school of Shammai seems stricter than the language warrants. For (1) if the woman was divorced for unchastity, she would hardly become more 'defiled' by her second marriage. If the husband could overlook the earlier unchastity, he could overlook the second marriage; (2) since the legal punishment for adultery was death, divorce is presumably allowed for something short of the capital offence. 'Immodest behaviour' is probably near the meaning.
